It would appear that the publishers who were most anxious to cater for the entertainment of the children at Christmas have now set themselves the task of providing for the intellectual advancement of the young people. Hence we have before us ten small volumes dealing with several of the subjects included in the curriculum of the majority of schools.

We cannot say that we are altogether in favour of the history-book by Sara Melhuish, which is intended, we are told, to supplement and not supersede a good text-book. It consists mostly of extracts from books such as Asser's "Life of Alfred," the "Anglo-Saxon Chronicle," and Bede's "Ecclesiastical History." The archaic English of these volumes has, of course, in the majority of cases been revised and brought up to date, but, on the whole, we think we prefer a book which, although probably compiled from these sources, is presented to the student in the ordinary narrative form, especially when it is necessary, as in the present instance, to append a footnote often as long as or longer than the passage itself in explanation of what is contained in the extract.

In "Roman Britain" we have a new edition of Mr. Conybeare's book, which was previously published in 1903. To include in so small a volume such a mass of material as is available for a subject of this kind is no easy matter. Each division is dealt with in a way calculated to convey the actual facts as far as they are known in a readable and pleasant sketch of the growth and decay of Roman influence in Britain, and Mr. Conybeare is to be congratulated upon the concise and clear manner in which he has accomplished his task.

"The Story of England," although not intended for the absolute beginner, is written with a view to interest the youth of junior forms in the account of the fortunes of their country. Mr. Robinson has successfully grasped the difficulty of sustaining a child's attention while it is assimilating the necessary facts relating to the subject in hand, and has endeavoured, as he himself puts it, to make history a really living story. Great stress is laid upon the social life of the times, and the results upon the mass of the people of the various changes of rulers and alterations or modifications of laws. We understand that Parts III. and IV. are in preparation, which will bring the series up to and including the year 1910.

Another very useful little book issued by Messrs. Rivington is Part IV. of "Junior British History Notes," which deals with the period 1783-1901. These books must prove of great value to students and teachers, and are most handy to refer to when reading a more detailed account of any particular period. We think it is a pity, however, that sufficient care is not taken to see that they are issued without any subsequent errata being necessary. We have not read the whole of the present text-book, but we notice that for Parts I., II., and III. six errata have been made, as well as a correction in "Notes on British History" by the same author. The mistakes are simple and silly, and evidently have occurred through carelessness and not from lack of knowledge.

Book V. of "Black's Literary Readers" contains various exercises in prose and verse, several of which are extracts from such authors as Sir Walter Scott, Charles Reade, Longfellow, Matthew Arnold, and Charles Dickens, while a good many have been specially written for Messrs. Black's series of books. We do not think that the selection is the best that could have been made; in fact, we are inclined to the opinion that a book containing a story by a good author is far more interesting to and instructive for a child than any amount of selected pieces. But if done in the extract form surely it would have been better to have the "Spellings and Meanings" at the head of the chapter to which they refer instead of all together at the end.

"Great Britain and Ireland" and "The British Isles," both of which are issued by Messrs. A. and C. Black, contain several identical illustrations, but here the difference ceases, as the former book is intended as an elementary study of regional geography, while the latter deals with more advanced theories. Both books are well compiled and the information is set out in a pleasing and attractive form.

Only two books now remain to claim our attention—namely, "A Class-book of Chemistry" and "Elementary Algebra Exercises." In his book on chemistry Mr. G. C. Donington has combined a practical course of instruction with a theoretical and descriptive text which is a somewhat original method of arrangement, and one which must prove to be of great utility to students entering upon Matriculation and other examinations. The illustrations are numerous and clear, many of them having been drawn especially for the present book. Mr. Layng's "Text-book of Elementary Algebra" consists of no less that 500 exercises to which the answers are also given. Those who were familiar with Book I. will find that Book II. in no way falls short of the earlier work.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

ORIENTAL QUOTATIONS

A Dictionary of Oriental Quotations. (Arabic and Persian.) By CLAUD FIELD, M.A. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 7s. 6d.)

WE have here another, apparently the twelfth, volume of the useful Reference Series in course of publication by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co., which ought to be found complete in every public library and many private houses. The volumes are avowedly dictionaries, principally of quotations, but also of famous sayings, historical allusions, Indian biography, &c., which may be required at any moment. It might be objected that there is no demand for a dictionary of Arabic and Persian sayings. The reply is that the sayings, often proverbial, indicate and reflect the literature and character of a nation. England is always concerned with Oriental races, including Arabs and Persians : the study of their character is essential to success in dealing with them. They are slow in action compared with those of the West, but they are mentally active, and their contemplation is profound ; it would be difficult to surpass Oriental nations either in the fervour of their faiths or in the depths of their philosophies.

The sayings of this collection are the expressions of Oriental beliefs and practical philosophies. They cannot all be called proverbs, for their length in many cases deprives them of the epigrammatical crispness of a proverb. They read sometimes as commonplace truisms; it is impossible that they should all be illuminated with originality ; the original sayings of the world have long since been exhausted. Any one who has some knowledge of Persian and Arabic cannot help seeing that the force of Oriental languages has lost in the translation, both from the prose and the poetry, just as Virgil and Horace lose in the process. Who can translate adequately Sunt lachrymæ rerum? or Splendide mendax? So, too, the Oriental saying, dependent for its force on the collocation of words, or an alliteration, or a pun, loses its flavour in the English version. To any one writing a book about the East who wants a sententious motto for each chapter this book will be simply invaluable. He will find it teems with good things sorted to his hand, for the Index is full and well arranged. The list of eighty-seven authors consulted shows that the selection has been widely made, and among the translators appear the names of many of the best Oriental scholars, past and present.

We must be content with only a few specimens taken at random. Professor Margoliouth has the following from the Arabic :—

> Little use is wealth to a man when his throat rattles and the breath leaves his chest.
>
> God protect us from attending concerts and music.
>
> We only put on airs before strangers, not before relations, and before new friends, not before those of old standing.

While Sir Charles Lyall is responsible for :—

> If a man be old and a fool, his folly is past all cure,
> But a young man may yet grow wise and cast off his foolishness.

The Persian sayings are lighter, as might be expected :—

> Though many a rose in this garden is born,
> No mortal who culls one escapes from the thorn.
>
> Oft have they laid the vigorous 'neath the clay,
> While the sore wounded have revived at last.
>
> What the Unseen sends us cannot have defect.
>
> Am I united with my friend in heart,
> What matters if our place be wide apart?
>
> Prize not at all life that has passed without love.
> Love is the water of life : receive it in thy heart and soul.

And we might go on selecting and presenting extracts ad infinitum. This reference book should attract the notice of others besides scholars.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Les Maîtres de l'Art : Donatello. By PROFESSOR E. BERTAUX. (Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.)

PROFESSOR BERTAUX has presented us with an interesting and valuable study of the art of the famous Florentine sculptor who was one of the precursors of Michael Angelo. Very few examples of Donatello's work can be found in England, and they are relatively unimportant, and only two English writers, Lord Balcarres and Mr. Hope Rea, have devoted books to the realist master of the fifteenth century. The Germans, however, rediscovered Donatello forty years ago, and since then the output of their works concerning him has never ceased, as will be seen by the exhaustive bibliography which is included in the volume we are noticing. Italy, moreover, now rightly holds Donatello in far greater honour than formerly, and he well deserved a place in the admirable series of Les Maîtres de l'Art which Messrs. Plon are issuing, under the patronage of the French Ministry of Education and Fine Arts.

There is a particular reason, a sentimental one it is true, why Donatello should appeal to Englishmen. He was one of the very first sculptors to glorify our national patron—St. George. Those who have seen the famous statue, now in the Bargello Museum at Florence, will recognise in it a right worshipful presentment of a most Christian knight, a figure of ideal manly beauty which, in more than one respect, recalls the art of Greece. So famous was that statue in olden days that when the girls of Tuscany wished to commend the looks of some particularly handsome young man, they would remark, "He resembles Donatello's St. George." But the sculptor's art was a many-sided one, and there could be no more striking contrast to his St. George than those wonderfully realistic types of human ugliness, his "Popolano" and his "Zuccone," or his carving of the repentant Magdalen, whom he pourtrayed in her old age, withered and almost mummified. Admirable, too, though in another sense, is Donatello's equestrian statue of the Condottiere Gattamelata at Padua, which in its quiet, stately vigour seems to be far more true to life than the famous but theatrical Colleone of Venice.

Professor Bertaux's work is deserving of great praise. He follows Donatello's career step by step, examining in turn all his principal productions. A list of them showing where they are to be seen (they are, of course, mostly in Italy) is given in an Appendix, and there are four-and-twenty plates depicting the more famous examples of Donatello's art.

Catalonia and the Balearic Isles. An Historical and Descriptive Account. By ALBERT F. CALVERT. With 250 Plates. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. ALBERT CALVERT is certainly the leading and the most prolific of the popular authorities on Spain of to-day, and so accustomed are we to him that the lapse of six months without the appearance of a new book from his pen on some Spanish subject would inevitably lead to inquiry and concern. He is at present engaged in editing "The Spanish Series," the latest of which bears the above title. When one states that of the 363 pages to which the book extends 256 are occupied by photographs the nature of the present volume will be obvious. Both to the author and to the reader the graphic is apparently of far more importance than the literary art. The volume is apparently intended for the reader who has little time to read and perhaps less inclination, but who nevertheless wishes to know something of the subject with which the author treats.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

In fact it is a readable introduction to Catalonia and the Balearic Isles suitable for the superficial tourist who is anxious to be able, when he returns to England, to tell his friends something of what he has seen or ought to have seen, but who, however, thinks that he has no time to waste in acquiring the information on which he wishes to pose as an authority. It might be termed an elementary guide-book of an eminently readable character. The difference between the Catalans and the other inhabitants of the Peninsula is obvious to the most cursory observer, and it has been compared to the difference between the Welsh and the English or the Bretons and the French, and attributed to a similar cause. Mr. Calvert, however, points out that this view is quite incorrect. Racially the Catalans are Spaniards just as are their neighbours. The difference between them and the inhabitants of the other provinces of the kingdom is due to historical and geographical causes. It is to be regretted that in his historical account of the Balearic Isles Mr. Calvert makes no mention of the English occupation. That would have enhanced materially the interest of the book to English readers. An index also would have increased its value.

Letters and Sketches from Northern Nigeria. By Martin S. Kisch, Assistant-Resident. With an Introduction by Sir Percy Girouard. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)

Death, no matter when it comes, is always a form of tragedy; but when it comes in time of youth, at the opening of a career full of promise, it is also pathetic. Those into whose hands the present volume falls, even though the name Martin Kisch had hitherto been unknown, cannot fail to be saddened on behalf of the bright young life so suddenly and prematurely cut off, whose monument this volume forms. Martin Kisch was born in 1884. He arrived in Northern Nigeria, in order to take his share in the government of that region, towards the end of 1908. Before the close of the following February he was dead. The Empire demands her toll of her servants in distant climes, but to most it is given to attempt something, and perhaps to achieve it. To Martin Kisch not even this satisfaction was granted. Nevertheless, during the few months which he spent in West Africa he secured the admiration, the affection, and the respect of all with whom he was brought into contact, and to those whom his loss affects closely the words of the Governor of the Protectorate, Sir Percy Girouard, which appear as a Preface to the volume, must indeed give some consolation, although a sad one:—

> My personal acquaintance with him and his work was brief, but of sufficient duration to predict a brilliant future had he been spared. His early mastery of languages, his unfailing good humour and camaraderie, and his high mental gifts would have placed him anywhere in the Nigerian Service. . . . The young officer's name can be placed upon the roll of men given up by British mothers, wives, and loved ones to the service of their country.

The book is made up of the letters—natural, unpremeditated, full of freshness and charm, and permeated with a keen sense of humour—which young Kisch sent home from the day on which he left Liverpool. Mere personal domestic letters, their contents are slight, and go more to picture the character of the writer than of the country and the people to whom he had been sent. Nevertheless, there is much to be found in these letters which should prove useful to those who will follow in his footsteps. Through them all shines the zest which youth alone can give. The volume is plentifully illustrated by means of both photographs and pen-and-ink sketches, for the author was an artist as well as an administrator. Its value is increased by an Appendix, giving an account of the history of the region and a bibliography of the literature dealing with it. In addition, there are maps of Northern Nigeria and also of North Africa.

An Introduction to the History of the Assyrian Church, or the Church of the Sassanid Persian Empire. 100-640 A.D. By W. A. Wigram, M.A., D.D. (S.P.C.K. 5s.)

The subject of the Nestorian Christians has not been overwritten, and a work on this topic by Dr. Wigram, who writes from intimate knowledge, is therefore welcome. The author does not touch upon the interesting subject of the origin of the Nestorians. He devotes his attention to their history as a religious sect, declining the use of the term Nestorians and substituting for it Assyrian Church in preference to Easterns, Persians, Syrians, Chaldæans, or any other alternative. The difficulties under which the book was written can be understood when we are reminded that, apart from the necessarily limited library within his own home, Dr. Wigram had sometimes to wait almost three months before he could obtain a copy of some book which he wished to consult. Despite these drawbacks, the author has achieved his purpose and has provided an introduction to the history of the Church in which he is so deeply interested.

The Nestorians, who still retain their ancestral faith unalloyed, live for the most part intermingled among the Mahomedan Kurds, to whom they bear a considerable resemblance, not only physical, but also intellectual. To a still less extent there are to be found among them men and women of the same characteristics who profess a form of the Jewish faith, and these latter, indistinguishable in every other respect from the Nestorian Christians, are, it is contended by some, descendants of the Lost Tribes who remained steadfast to the God of their ancestors. Dr. Wigram, who knows intimately the people of whom he writes, has had almost an unique opportunity of describing the customs peculiar to them, and it is to be regretted, therefore, that in the interests of archæology, anthropology, and folklore, he did not make greater use of it.

FICTION

Lost Endeavour. By John Masefield. (Thomas Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)

Mr. Masefield is one of the few writers of the present day whom one may term on its higher plane an artist, on its lower plane a self-respecting craftsman. It is possible to disagree profoundly at times with the work he turns out, even as it is possible to complain not only of his conception of his art, but of the manner of its achievement; but it is quite impossible to neglect or disparage him. That is to say, if his work does not come to us carrying the reason of its being, its mien and manner at least declare it to have had some urgent cause of being in the mind of its author.

That is much—in truth, it is all; and in a day largely given up to the mere making of books it is the mark of an author that demands reading where so much may be safely neglected. Therefore this present book of his will, we fear not much enhance his reputation. It bears all the signs of having been scotched in the making to serve the purpose of the series for which it was intended. Not that Mr Masefield can deny himself, or the spirit that impels him.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

His mood will out, but it displays itself in one or two ill ways. Either the worthier element of the book is hushed to a subservient portion, a far echo of itself, or it usurps the action. All the tales of the earth are built on the same lines. It is the manner of their handling that marks the difference between worthiness and unworthiness. In the present instance Mr. Masefield has sketched his tale to fit the scope of his volume, and we often feel that it is demanding of him a larger treatment. He himself feels it, and therefore now and then indulges himself with things that do not belong to his story.

It is, frankly, a tale of adventure. Charles Harding is at school near Deptford towards the latter end of the seventeenth century. Being sent one day by Dr. Carter, who keeps this "Academy for the Sons of Gentlemen," into Deptford to procure his weekly portion of snuff, Harding, with Teodoro Mora, the foreign master at the Academy, is waylaid and captured for export as a slave. He is sold to a tobacco-farmer in Virginia, where Teodoro Mora, or "Little Theo" as he was anciently nicknamed at the Deptford Academy, is transported further south. It is to "Little Theo" that the main adventure comes. For his master soon dies, and, escaping thence, strange wanderings befall him—strange not only in themselves, but in the province in which he finds taut craft and obedient crews, till he can readily be forgiven the thought that a fatherly destiny had him in charge for the accomplishment of great ends.

Let us not spoil Mr. Masefield's story by telling it over in detail. Suffice it to say that Mora became initiated into the ancient mysteries and ritual of the Indians of the South. He is hailed by them as the Saviour of old prophecy, who is to bind them into a nation, and cast out the white men who have invaded their lands. So high a mission, with all that it means of power and glory, naturally inflames his imagination, for he knows it possible of realisation. To this end he is tutored and disciplined by their priests, and for a final consummation is taken by them to their holy island, where a special caste of priests resides, in attendance on their central temple, their Hierapolis of worship. None other may land but he, for the very earth is sacred. They leave him at the shore.

Having arrived, he has difficulty in finding the temple, for the vegetation is rank and the forest inextricable. When at last he finds it, however, death and desolation greet him on all hands. A plague has swept over the island, and all the priests are dead. Moreover, he is many miles from the shore, and thus he seems likely to learn the lot of a castaway. Indeed, this might very likely have been so but for the visit of a crew of pirates that discover him fever-stricken on the shore. He is taken by them, and, being competent to navigate, is made sailing master and led on a smuggling expedition to far Virginia. His plans and papers he guards zealously from his quondam comrades, and he will not let them extract from him what took him to the island.

Meanwhile Charles Harding has been serving his time as a slave. Being sent on one occasion on a distant errand for his master, what strange thing should befall him but that he should be captured by a band of smugglers, and that this band of smugglers should have as its chief no less a person than "Little Theo"! No sooner does this happen than two momentous events occur. First, "Little Theo" learns that his captain has ransacked his papers, and has fled to discover what of worth the island held for him. Second, their band is attacked by Indians. Thereafter it becomes a chase for the island.

The tale is well told; and yet the excellence of the form has its drawbacks. Charles Harding is in conduct of the first portion, telling all within his knowledge till his meeting with "Little Theo" and the fight with the Indians. "Little Theo" takes up the relation, saying what makes the captain's theft of his plans so important, and what urgent cause drives him to pursuit. Then Charles Harding continues the tale, telling of the pursuit to the conclusion. Thus the sequence of narration is deftly secured. But the conclusion! After so urgent a flagellation of the fancy, after so many difficulties encountered and furiously overcome, it is a little disconcerting to discover the temple on the island blown up by the errant captain and his comrades (dire iconoclasts!), and to see our heroes turn to the very mundane business of iron-ore merchants. Yet so it is! The endeavour is indeed lost; but more is lost than the endeavour. A good book has been lost; it has turned to barrenness in Mr. Masefield's hands. For it is not a short story tritely and fitly told; it is a tale of portentous scope crippled in the making. But there are passages that bear witness to the hand that achieved them. Such is Charles Harding's account of the fight with the Red Indians, a veritable masterpiece of strange and potent excitement. Such, too, is "Little Theo's" beautiful account of the island, and his discoveries there. But such passages are only proof that the hand that penned the book is worthier of better things than it offers us now.

The Lass with the Delicate Air. By A. R. Goring-Thomas. (John Lane. 6s.)

There is a faint air of newness about a heroine who makes a short-lived literary reputation on the strength of a plagiarism from an Elizabethan poet, but one wonders where the lady found her purloined lyric; we should have thought that the treasures of the British Museum had been ransacked o'er and o'er in that direction, and that any attempt to steal them would have been rewarded by instant discovery. In real life Benny would have been found out long before her husband lighted on her papers spread out invitingly on her desk in the reading-room. Naturally the discovery upset him greatly, and as he was rather a neurotic sort of person altogether, given to drugs and so on, we were not surprised when an over-dose of laudanum eventually carried him off. Benny then offered herself to an English author resident in Paris, but he would have none of her. So she took shelter with a rascally old Muscovite princess, and under her delicate guidance found a suitable destiny by marrying a wealthy American, an unusual and subtle type, for whose invention Mr. Goring-Thomas deserves great credit. These events take place in the second half of the book, the first being occupied with John Fitzgerald's discovery of the heroine in a Chelsea lodging-house, his wooing and his marriage. Mrs. Hicks, the drama-loving keeper of the lodging-house, is a bit of a character, as also is her husband, a temperance lecturer of intemperate habits. One or two other inmates of the place have a gentle eccentricity. But we have met them all many times before. Mr. Goring-Thomas is a capable workman who is at present engaged in worshipping false gods, but we think he will one day discover that art of writing which is chiefly an art of not writing the cheap and outworn.

THE THEATRE

"THE PRISONER OF ZENDA" AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE

The first performance of the Messrs. Melville's revival of "The Prisoner of Zenda" provided us with two sensations quite extraneous to the play itself. We found ourselves in the Lyceum Theatre for the first time since it left the hands of Sir Henry Irving. To drive up to it and to see its old familiar portico brought back many youthful recollections of what then appeared to be great and wonderful productions, which, in the light of more experienced eyes, remain infinitely more beautiful scenically and inconceivably more admirable histrionically than those of the theatres which attempt to carry on the work of Sir Henry Irving in regard at least to the representation of Shakespearean plays. Our first sensation came in the vestibule. Where was the old, dark, dignified, somewhat mysterious vestibule of the theatre once dominated by the greatest showman of all time? Alas, gone like its old master. We found it popularised, to use the cheapest and most gaudy of all words. Flaring electric lights and gold paint were everywhere. It was with reluctant feet that we adventured further. We dreaded to see the popularisation of the auditorium. Our expectations were more than realised. We recognised nothing of the old theatre. It seemed to us to be twice as large; it had the air of a great variety house. Its cheerfulness was that of the man who smacks one violently on the back; its audience was as different from the old-time Lyceum audience as is Russell-square of yesterday from Russell-square of to-day. Popularity stared down from the vast gallery, the enormous circle, the golden boxes, and gazed over the few lines of stalls from the gigantic pit. The very orchestra was popular, and the thought that came into our mind as we eyed the popular drop-curtain was whether the drawing-room drama-play which we had seen at the St. James's Theatre in our adolescence would be popular enough for this popular house and popular audience.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was the play itself which provided us with our second sensation. We dimly remember having left the St. James's Theatre after seeing "The Prisoner of Zenda" for the first time, with a suggestion of moisture on our smooth, boyish face. We remember to have followed the adventures of Rudolph Rassendyl with excitement and with a great stirring of the latent romance which lay hidden in our composition. We had fallen profoundly in love with the beautiful Flavia, and had a sneaking regard for the handsome Antoinette de Mauban. We could easily have killed the vile Rupert of Hentzau, and have lain in wait behind cover for Black Michael—duly supported. Ah, for the days when we were twenty-one! What can have happened to us since then? If the truth must be told, we confess that we watched the prologue with astonishment. We found it bald, flashy, unconvincing, melodramatic, and somewhat incoherent. We listened to the bombast and stereotyped language with amazement; surely, we thought, the play, like the theatre, has been popularised. Surely, Mr. George Alexander, Mr. Aubrey Smith, and the rest did not say and do these things at the St. James's Theatre. Yes, they did. We repeated this word surely to ourselves throughout the remaining acts of the play. Time had indeed not passed less callously over this romantic comedy than over ourselves. What we once found actual seemed now to be impossible. What was once romantic was now absurd. The play had aged. Or was it that in the hands of popular players who mouthed and shouted, glared and stamped, the vraisemblance of the play filtered out?

Mr. Henry Ainley, and the popular company engaged to support him, cannot, of course, be compared with the St. James's Theatre Company which included Mr. George Alexander, Mr. W. H. Vernon, Mr. Allan Aynesworth, Mr. H. B. Irving, Mr. Aubrey Smith, Miss Evelyn Millard, and Miss Lily Hanbury; nor, of course, can the huge Lyceum Theatre be compared with the comparatively small St. James's. A tune played by an efficient stringed orchestra sounds very different on the brass instruments of Sousa's band; and a song sung by Madame Clara Butt is not the same thing when it is ground out by a barrel-organ. Mr. Ainley and company barrel-organised "The Prisoner of Zenda." We found Mr. Ainley as Rudolph Rassendyl, the adventurous Englishman, rather like a Swiss valet hurrying to answer the bell. His dapper blue-serge suit and green Monte Carlo hat were very Swiss and very much like those of the efficient valet who does not dress from his master's wardrobe. As the pretended king, we found him still Swiss and still permeated with the desire to answer bells. As the real king, pale and dishevelled, grovelling at the feet of his captors and clinging to the Rue-de-la-Paix skirts of Mademoiselle de Mauban, he was still Swiss under the influence of bock. He had his moments. There were times when he was utterly un-Swiss, and peculiarly like an English actor who had been brought up behind the footlights of an old Surrey theatre. He even had his moments when he showed the effects of the theatre on the right side of the water which lies with a convenient nearness to the Carlton Hotel. He was, however, cheered to the echo, and he emerged from what we may suppose was an ordeal with great popularity, and without turning a hair.

Colonel Sapt seemed to us to have been degraded to the non-commissioned ranks. In the hands of his present interpreter he appeared to be a rather pushing sergeant. The English landscape painter—who was both English and a landscape painter when played by Mr. Allan Aynesworth—became a cockney black-and-white artist at the Lyceum; and the Rupert of Hentzau, made so cynical and analytically immoral by Mr. H. B. Irving in his comparative youth, was a quite impossible creature. We did not fall in love with the Flavia of Miss Rosalie Toller, although she was quite charming and girlish; nor would we have jeopardised our reputation for the present Antoinette de Mauban. The whole production, however, was received with rapture by a crowded house, so all is well. We are no longer young. In that sad confession lies our lack of appreciation.

"BABY MINE" AT THE CRITERION

This is an American writer's idea of what a French play ought to be. It is, as a matter of fact, what a great many French plays have been and will be; but although the idea is French, the treatment is American. That is to say, the comic situations are mechanical, and the characters are strident. Nevertheless it contains decidedly comic moments, the characters are drawn from life—American life—and its fun is distinctly laughter-compelling. To those who are more pained than amused when the comic man, with a moveable stomach, hits in quick succession the other three members of his glee-quartett on the head with a heavy club, "Baby Mine" is not to be recommended. Nor would those who can find nothing to laugh at in the almost miraculous gymnastic contortions of the Broadway nigger who goes on dancing until he appears to be on the verge of death to the air of a ragtime repeated ad nauseam, find anything laughable in the reiteration of babies in the latest American importation. "Baby Mine" is, however, it appears, a success at the Criterion Theatre, and the rafters of that little underground house ring nightly with Homeric laughter, which goes to prove that there is a large public in London for any play which contains a cunning mixture of obvious humour and farcical bustle. The regeneration of the London stage depends, it would seem, mainly upon beds. Already we have seen how successful the bed has been in "Inconstant George." In this Mr. Charles Hawtrey is tucked up very realistically, to be visited by one young woman in a somewhat diaphanous evening frock, and another in a skimpy shrimping skirt minus stockings. In "Baby Mine" the bed contains a pretty little person not in the

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Peter Pan pyjamas or those whose fashion was set by Mr. Cyril Maude and continued by Miss Marie Löhr, but in the ordinary nightdress, as advertised and beautifully represented on the shiny paper of all ladies' journals. There is a comparatively limited public for wit, fine construction, a well-considered story, or a play in which the mirror is held up either to all that is pleasant or pathetic in nature. The occasional play which contains these ingredients is welcomed with almost tearful enthusiasm by the critics, but if it is not advertised with modern profusion, if it has not among its cast a well-known member of the aristocracy, an actor who has earned a high reputation as an aeronaut, or a much-boomed and beautiful actress, whose acting is of secondary moment, it fades away in its childhood and passes into oblivion. If there is added to a bedroom scene a new-born baby, success is doubly assured. The American author of "Baby Mine," who had discovered the great commercial value of these ingredients, pursued the invariable methods of the American nation and did not stop at one baby, but plumped for three. The effect is Rooseveltian. The success is not great, but, to use the Niagarian term, colossal. "Baby Mine" is referred to as a "cinch"—a "lead-pipe cinch." It is a "sitter." It has "made good."

The English stage certainly owes much to Mr. Charles Hawtrey and Mr. Weedon Grossmith, to the French authors of "Inconstant George," and the American author of "Baby Mine." The future of the English stage looks more rosy. It is obvious that our popular dramatic authors have at last rendered the censor a harmless institution, and it is in all probability due to Mr. George Alexander that the London County Council sends its Pecksniffs no longer to the theatre to play the part of Peeping Tom. We are evidently broadening and becoming more Latin in our instincts. The English stage bids fair to take its place, in all the pride of health, shoulder to shoulder with that of France. It is true that we have already seen Malvolio in night attire. In his last production of "Twelfth Night" Sir Herbert Tree gave us an admirably comic "turn" in this costume. He is immensely ingenious in discovering the reasons for the introduction of apparent errors in chronology and little erroneous details which may add to the pleasure of his supporters.

To return to "Baby Mine" after this optimistic exaltation, we did not think that the play was very happily cast. It seemed to us that Mr. Weedon Grossmith would have evoked greater laughter had he cast himself for one of the babies. We think that he might have made himself up very well as that baby in "The Bab Ballads" who was born smoking a Henry Clay. Perhaps, however, we ask too much even of Mr. Weedon Grossmith. As it is, his peculiar methods find ample scope. He gives us his well-known mirthless smile, with all its old effect, and he introduces into the most farcical moments of this play that note of tragedy without which no comic piece can arouse laughter. Miss Iris Hoey wears her night-clothes charmingly, and Mr. Calthrop brings out very well the paternal instinct. But he lacks the restfulness and naturalness which his part demands. These little things, however, do not matter. There is the bed, and that is everything.

"A DOLL'S HOUSE" AT THE COURT THEATRE

The time is long past when a play of Ibsen excited the world of literature and set the dramatic critics wondering what to say; but, despite the levelling and tranquillising process of the years, the stern Northern tragedies still retain their hold upon a certain section of the public. Pleasure, in the sense of amusement, may be lacking. No music; humour of the grimmest kind, and that infrequent; situations which strain the nerves and wring the heart; yet, somehow, one feels that the opportunity for seeing such a play as "A Doll's House" must not be missed. Partly because of the relentless dissection of character, partly because of the chance of extraordinary acting, intellectual curiosity is aroused as soon as a work of Ibsen is placed on the London stage.

An additional motive influences us on this occasion in the presence of the Princess Bariatinsky as Nora Helmer, and we may say at once that those who missed seeing her rendering of the difficult part at the Royalty Theatre last month should make pilgrimage to the Court Theatre on some evening during the next ten days. That a Russian lady should expound Ibsen in English is something of a phenomenon; that she should do it so well is surprising. Her fire, her passion, the wonderfully rapid and convincing changes of her expression, her quick, lithe movements, make a sensation to which we are hardly accustomed in this country, and her accent seems to add an exotic charm to the unhappy story which is being unfolded. In her exhausting dance it was difficult to believe that she was merely acting—she seemed strung up to a hysterical pitch of emotion; her quiet arraignment of her husband in the closing scene was in the true spirit of tragedy.

Mr. Ben Webster as Torvald Helmer, egotist, and Mr. Halliwell Hobbes as Dr. Rank expressed their characters judiciously, but Mr. Rothbury Evans rather overacted his part of Nils Krogstad. He hissed and glowered too violently, and employed the vocal methods, the emphasis, the inflections of melodrama. His work would have gained tremendously in power had he continued to speak as he began—calmly, sneeringly, incisively. Upon his quiet, chilling entrance his deep tones and deadly, restrained manner, as of one who has his prey within springing distance, created quite a thrill. Miss Rosalind Ivan gave a good interpretation of Mrs. Linden, Nora Helmer's friend, although at times a little more energy would have added strength to the effect she wished to produce. It is all, however, serious and finely-conceived work, and the "Doll's House" should be seen by all who value a change from the light fare which draws the crowd to the ordinary theatre catering merely for the amusement of its patrons.

HARMONY AND PROPORTION IN ART

It is not generally realised how facile it is to produce contrast, or to create conspicuous objects, and how difficult to attain to harmony and proportion. Contrast and discord are the resorts of the charlatan and the uncultured, harmony and proportion the real ends of all art. The former strike the eye of the public by reason of their vividness; it is only the eye of the artist that can distinguish the subtleties of the latter.

The public always has been and always will be incapable of a true understanding of harmony and proportion. To take his place as a useful member of civilised society, a man is brought up in a rigid bent of thought, and in maturer life the exigencies of his business will not permit him to give flight to his fancy; his interests all tend in one direction. Seeing as he does only his own side of life, he is incapable of forming a really proportionate conception of existence. One portion only of his imaginative faculties is developed, and he fails to grasp the less conspicuous subtleties of beauty. Exploring as he does only one narrow tributary of the great stream of life, all its other varied channels remain unknown to him, and when the rumour of their existence comes to him on the wings of the Press, through his ignorance they appear a something utterly opposed to all that he has known. For this reason his sense of contrast, and not his sense of proportion, is developed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

This love of violent contrast and of the abnormal is shown by the strange popularity of glaring music-halls, gaudy public processions, and inharmonious uniforms. The tourist waxes enthusiastic over brilliant sunsets, which contrast the crimson of a dying day with the palour of the Alpine snows, and hastens back to his hotel insensible to the sober harmony of the afterglow. The Londoner, growing sentimental at the memory of glaring southern landscapes, ignores the beauties of a mist above the Thames. In their conversation also the generality of mankind lack all sense of proportion, the paucity of their interests leading them to wander with wearying persistence over the narrow circle of their lives.

The Early Victorian Age affords an illustration of our thesis. The industrial revolution of the eighteenth century directed most of the vital forces of our country towards the accumulation of wealth. This rush for the acquisition of gold and material goods engendered a love of the ornate, the massive, the ostentatious, while the grace of simplicity was lost sight of. All sense of harmony and proportion was lost sight of in this monomania for the material; hence the massive mahogany furniture, the dreary four-poster beds, and all the gold and purple of that lamentable period.

The comedian, the punster, or the man with a broad sense of humour, produces his effect by the facility of finding contrasts; but the wit by his sense of proportion. He mixes his words with such beautiful finesse as to bring to light hidden relations which exist between the objects of his conversation. The pure steel of the satirist is tempered with exquisite proportion; those who indulge in personal abuse are like men who wield a cudgel, hideous in its misshapen deformity.

The well-dressed woman is one who has sufficient sense of harmony and proportion to design pleasing clothes. For this reason a really well-dressed woman is generally unnoticed by the crowd who gaze in admiration on the vivid colours and distorted shapes of merely ostentatious garments, never for one moment realising that it takes genius to produce harmony, while discord is within the reach of all. This lack of a sense of proportion leads fat women, bound tightly in their skirts like sheaves of over-ripe corn, to pant wearily with curtailed steps about the thoroughfares of our great cities, vainly imitating the graceful glide of their more ethereal sisters.

Those whose position in society has enabled them to indulge their fantasy, develop, if intelligent, by reason of the variety of their impressions conceived, a certain sense of the real harmony of life. Hence their general charm of manner and dress. The cosmopolitan is generally a delightful person socially, because out of his peregrinations among the culture of many lands and Continents, the varied scenery which has passed before his eyes, and the multifarious types of humanity which have come within his mental vision, he has developed a sense of the proportion of life. He touches in his speech all the varied beauties of the universe. He may be called the artist of conversation.

In a further stage of mental development there are men who have so fine a sense of proportion that they can draw; others who understand the harmonies of colour; others who embrace the two faculties and can both paint and draw, and thus produce pleasing pictures. But the true master-artist is he who can drift upon the golden sea of his fancy towards the lands of his imagination. He passes from sentiment to sentiment, from emotion to emotion, plucking wondrous flowers of good and evil in his path; when his genius has penetrated the mysteries and beauties of life and Nature he combines them, through his sense of perfect harmony and proportion, in a masterpiece—a masterpiece probably unnoticed by the multitude of his contemporaries, but which is passed with loving care from generation to generation among the few who understand, until the strange persistence of their admiration attracts the notice of the many. Then is it hung with pomp and ostentation upon the walls of a gallery, or reproduced in a cheap edition, and thousands, led by fashion, tire themselves in futile contemplation of its subtle charms. Few ever find refreshment for the soul in the hidden purity of its composition.

A picture by Titian, Rembrandt, Turner, or Reynolds—to mention only four examples—is so in harmony and proportion with the every sentiment and mood of those who are artistic that it soon becomes an integral part of their intellectual existence. A Fragmard or a Boucher soon sickens by its disproportionate insistence on the sensual and the luxurious; a Greuse by its unceasing pourtrayal of the volupté of incipient womanhood; the sentimental dogs and romantic cattle of Landseer by the wide disparity between the artist's admirable technique and the poverty of his intellectual vision.

Art is art, and can be turned to no other uses. If the artist's creation aims at establishing the truth of sane doctrine or moral law, then sense of proportion is lost in the pursuit of his object. He ceases to co-ordinate the varied traits and phases of life and Nature. So-called didactic or moral poetry is never art. Shakespeare was a poet who had the sense of artistic proportion so exquisitely developed that his works can never fail to entrance those capable of appreciation. His characters do not embody one characteristic to the exclusion of all others, but are delightful and living pictures of the many sentiments which animate each human being. Corneille, on the other hand, had not the same sense of proportion. He was able to understand with astonishing force and clearness the leading passions which animate mankind, but could not mix them in the right proportions and make of the whole living men. In "Le Cid" he paints the sentiment of honour, in "Horace" patriotism, in "Cinna" clemency, and in "Nicomède" the strength of a soul to resist misfortune, in "Polyeucte" the sacrifice to a Divine ideal. Racine, on the other hand, has created human characters such as Bérénice, Athalie, Iphigénie, which will live for ever. Shakespeare and Racine were great physicologists; and what is a physicologist but one who can penetrate the veil which hides the motives of our actions, and whose sense of proportion enables him to mix the thousand traits and motives which he has observed in exactly the right proportions, and of the whole to create a living character?

It may be objected that the works of primitive artists, although lacking proportion in their drawing or carving, are nevertheless pleasing as works of art. But this is because the work of the primitive artist is so entirely in proportion to his mental development. The attempts of certain contemporary sculptors to return to the primitive are generally ridiculous, as they at once show the utter disproportion between the artist's intellectual development and the resulting work.

Such art then is the resort of the vulgar. The great masters of all times are those whose sense of harmony and proportion is all-embracing, and thus in their works co-ordinate all the varied ends of art.

S. A.-B.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SIR RICHARD SOLOMON ON THE UNION OF SOUTH AFRICA

When an expert like Sir Richard Solomon lectures on his own subject, he ensures, as he deserves, respectful hearing. As High Commissioner for the Union of South Africa, he is fully qualified to explain its resources and problems. His paper, read recently before the Society of Arts, was illuminating on both branches. A general knowledge prevails that the capabilities of the Union are very great; Sir Richard Solomon is able to give the facts and vast figures about the mineral resources, the gold reefs, the reliability of the deposits, the output, the diamond-mines, or pipes, coal, copper, iron, the railways, harbours, and public works, salaries and wages, the imports and exports—all showing the rapid development of the country and the trade resulting. It is not so well known, however, that an era of great agricultural prosperity has commenced; to this he could also testify. Scientific farming, the most modern methods of cultivation, pests and the diseases of animals, are being fully appreciated; the Government aims, by grants and supervision, at developing the agricultural features of the country. Wool, for instance, is exported to the value of four millions a year; cattle and horse breeding, ostrich-farming, fruit-growing, the cultivation of maize and cereals, have all increased enormously, in spite of the drawbacks of droughts and diseases; tobacco, cotton, sugarcane, viticulture, are all coming on, and occupy large numbers of labourers.

Important as the facts are regarding the material statistics, greater human interest attaches to political and personal questions. The Union of the four self-governing Colonies has only existed since the South African Act of 1909 formulated the constitution, and various matters, left unsettled, require determination—such as the Parliamentary franchise, whether every adult male European is to have the vote, whether coloured persons are to be voters, whether uniformity in native policy is to prevail. The organisation of an efficient and permanent Civil Service, independent of political parties, also needs settlement. Where variety has obtained hitherto in the four Colonies in legislation, customs, tariffs, &c., provision has to be made for uniformity. British manufactured goods are allowed a customs rebate of over half a million sterling a year. This question of preferential treatment is likely to be much discussed.

The wisdom of the proposed union of these Colonies was at one time hotly debated, and it was commonly thought that England was wantonly abandoning the advantages gained in the war by admitting the Dutch to equality of rights. The event is rapidly justifying the policy adopted. Sir Richard Solomon considers there is no longer room nor justification for racial antagonism. Some racial feeling remains, but it is disappearing, and will cure itself; and the cure will be effected the sooner by talking and writing about it less. The native question is the problem which overshadows all others. The European population within the Union numbers less than a million and a quarter; the coloured inhabitants exceed 4,000,000, of whom three and a half millions are aboriginal natives in different stages of civilisation. The coloured 4,000,000 are regarded with sympathetic interest, and the 150,000 Asiatics raise very difficult and delicate questions. Education is advancing among the coloured children, though barbarism prevails among the aborigines. The dual language renders the subject of elementary education specially difficult. The chief problem for decision is the relations to be established, socially, politically, and industrially, between the different coloured races comprised within the Union and the Europeans. Sir Richard urges that a sound native policy must be slowly and naturally developed, and that the only course is to adhere to the good, sound principles of justice, freedom, and toleration. These are good enough sentiments, but their efficiency depends upon their practical application. As the various races live together, the basis is native labour, but they compete in all skilled occupations. The problem presents itself in such matters as the framing of railway regulations, Parliamentary and municipal legislation, education, and the daily administrative work of Government; in fact, in all the relations of their common citizenship. Sir Richard declares that no one who has not lived in South Africa can appreciate the difficulties of the native problem; but surely similar questions must have arisen in India, and the experience acquired there in treating coloured peoples would be useful in South Africa. Time and gentle handling are the main factors in such matters.

The question of Defence is much more pressing. South Africans recognise their responsibility for contributing to the strength of the Imperial Navy. But local forces for the preservation of internal order, when the British troops are removed, will have to be organised; the existing militia, volunteers, and police are insufficient; a system of National Defence, involving universal service in some form of universal training, has been foreshadowed, and requires elaboration. With so able an exponent of the Union's affairs as Sir Richard Solomon available, they ought to receive full attention in England.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

II.—Little Paris

When children are pulled through picture-galleries by enthusiastic adults they have a pleasant way of turning their backs on the pictures and looking with an absorbed interest at the other students of art in their neighbourhood. It is possible that the children are right; indeed a not very thorough study of the question leaves me convinced that the people one meets in picture-galleries are more interesting than any pictures. But that is beside my point, which is that it is not the fault of the individual if he is impressed by the wrong things. Thus at Brussels there are some very good pictures and some very good architecture. A Belgian friend assured me that there are three things that Englishmen always go to see—the Palais de Justice, the Wiertz pictures, and a certain little Rabelasian fountain that would, my friend said, have been pulled down years ago if it did not please the tourists to find the Belgians "shocking." To my eyes the Palais de Justice lacks dignity, and Wiertz was an artist with a touch of that madness that is not akin to genius; but I doubt whether my principal impression of Brussels is at all more dignified than that of the average tourist. Brussels, having wide streets and being moreover hilly, is a windy city, and if I had to make an allegorical drawing of the city and its inhabitants I think I should draw a picture of a cynic running after his hat. Everybody one meets here who is at all intelligent is proportionately cynical; but their splendid phrases of disillusionment are always spoilt by the malevolent genius of the place, which sends them running after their hats like children after butterflies. It is only indoors that they can bring their witty condemnation of life to a joyous conclusion.

This Belgian cynicism seems to me to cut far deeper than the delicate phrases with which many Frenchmen express a scepticism that they do not feel. It seems as if they had been endowed with a gift of destructive introspection that is fortunately rare among nations: "Geographically and racially, Belgium does not exist; we are a mixture of two races, speaking the language of a third. Brussels is a suburb of Paris, a kind of ambitious music-hall. We have a King by grace of England and France and Germany. He is like the Wiertz Collection—good to amuse the tourists. All our principal artists and men of letters live in Paris, for we are content to do everything a little less well than they do it there. At one time we hoped something from the Socialists, for they had some clever men at their head. But these men, who had once been rich, had only turned to Socialism in order to become rich again, and now that they have succeeded, the Socialists are as stupid as any one else. The inhabitants of Brussels are all monkeys—when they are not mimicking Paris they are copying some other place; but more Englishmen come here every year, so that we have a future. Meanwhile we are pulling down all the old houses to make room for them. They are very nice, and they spend a great deal of money, but the place will be too dear for us to live in it soon. Of course they call us names because we provide them with the kinds of amusement that they expect to find in wicked foreign countries; but we know that they always do that and don't really mean any harm." That is the sort of thing that I have heard twenty times during the last few days, and it is not less suggestive because the cynics take an obvious delight in coining their cynicisms.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In reality this kind of good-humoured bitterness is no new thing in Belgium. The attitude of the Belgians towards the late King Leopold was a case in point. The King disliked his subjects intensely because they were unambitious, and thwarted his very genuine desire to increase the importance of his kingdom. In revenge they laughed at him to their heart's content. I was in Brussels some years ago when a very scurrilous pamphlet was published attacking the King's too notorious private life. The pamphlet was bound in red, and for a week the whole city blushed joyously. The pamphlets were sold openly from one end of the place to the other; everybody bought them, and everybody laughed. Now the Belgians laugh no more at the late King Leopold, because they think that in his death he has robbed them of the millions they paid, very unwillingly be it said, for the Congo. Money is the one thing this very thrifty nation takes seriously. In some subtle way it is an additional offence that the King should have entrusted the defence of his will to a Socialist advocate. On the other hand, the new King is rather popular, and has, it is said, a smile for every one; but at heart the country is lazily democratic.

As for the people who do not think, I should say they were quite as happy in Belgium as anywhere else. They eat well and drink well, and Brussels at all events is materially prosperous. One sees very few men and women whose poverty is below the level of self-respect. One sees no drunken people at all, though the facilities for drinking are extraordinary and beer is very cheap. Yet for all their economic welfare I do not detect that growth of intelligence that English Socialists would have us believe is the necessary consequence of cleanliness and good food. The London street-arab, with his dirt and his empty stomach, is far more alert than the relatively prosperous gamin of Brussels. In the poorer-class cafés the men drink beer with heavy tranquillity, or play solemn games of cards; there is very little talk. They have, it seems to me, very little to talk about, so far have they narrowed their interests down to the immediate satisfaction of their senses. To eat well and drink well and smoke well, to have a good wife, une femme pot-au-feu, as some one defined it to me, and, above all, to have a stocking full of money for the bad days satisfies them wholly. They have no pride in their country or even in their city. Their local patriotism confines itself to grumbling at little details in the management of the trams or railways that interfere with their after-dinner comfort. At best they achieve an unenlightened materialism, at worst an unenlightened individualism.

This, of course, is a general impression rather than a reasoned study. But it is at least more generous than that formed by many intellectual Belgians. It is as pleasant as it is unexpected to hear those who have visited England praising the general popular intelligence at the expense of that of their own country. The best Belgians, they say, are Frenchmen, and this is true enough if we can conceive a France without illusions and without patriotism. Brussels is contented, and even proud, to call itself Little Paris; it intends to be a great deal more like Paris before it has done, modern Paris, the Paris of café-chantants, and music-halls, and other week-end delights being understood. I shall have something to say concerning this aspect of Brussels in my next article. Meanwhile I would qualify my impression with the observation that intellectual Brussels does not extend its cynicism to matters of art. On such matters it is charmingly enthusiastic and agreeably catholic. It reads Kipling and Wells, Frank Harris and Chesterton, and discusses them with real interest and intelligence. The city is flooded with English books, and it is pleasant to reflect that they are not only read by English visitors.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

INDIA: CONCLUSION

VIII.—SINCE THE MUTINY

PROGRESS. A SURVEY

THE history of India since the Mutiny of 1857 differs from that of the country before it by the absence of war from the entire peninsula. The great convulsion cleared the air; calm succeeded the storm. British supremacy was then confirmed; the Pax Britannica was introduced and has been maintained; its preservation is ample justification for the presence of an alien Power. Should that Power ever commit the folly, the crime, of withdrawing, the country would immediately become the scene of internal disorder, very possibly the goal of external invasion. The numerous peoples who inhabit the land are bound by no ties of nationality, religion, or language: the component races differ from one another in every respect, in circumstances, character, and civilisation, and it is hardly conceivable that their religious and racial differences will ever be accommodated sufficiently to admit of their amalgamation. The tranquillity that has been secured, and the justice administered everywhere, have conduced to great progress being effected, material, political, and administrative; but no one dreams that anything like finality has been attained. The Governor-General must take for his motto the line applied to Cæsar by the Roman poet: nil actum credens, dum quid superesset agendum.

The Governor-General is here deliberately mentioned by his designation. The Viceroy is only an alternative appellation, signifying that the individual represents the Sovereign of Great Britain, which has been true only since the assumption of the Government of India by the Crown in 1858. It is on the Governor-General in Council that the responsibility rests, and to him the honour of successful government and the blame for failures belong. The character of the administration depends on the personality of the Head. He has immense power of initiative, and can veto anything of which he does not approve. He can overrule the Councillors, though they may record their dissents. But he is not omnipotent. He has a master in the Secretary of State in England, who, exercising his powers under Parliamentary statutes, is the final authority. Since the construction of telegraphic communication between England and India, such independence as the Government in India enjoyed in former times has been greatly reduced. Where previous rulers would not have brooked minute interference from England, the Parliamentary system, as now enforced—though the supremacy of Parliament always existed—requires practical compliance, or resignation as the only alternative. Lord Morley has shown how, in keeping one eye on Parliament, he has only been carrying out the existing law. The result has been the diminution of the prestige and position of the Governor-General. But there remains enough to leave him the possessor of very considerable power as the head of the Government in India. Still, there are various matters, such as famine, plague, frontier outbreaks, financial and economic changes, of which he cannot prevent the occurrence, though he can mitigate their consequences.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

To British rule India has presented itself as a great national property to be developed. If it was originally exploited by commercial adventurers and a trading company for their own advantage, the later policy has now been adopted that it is be governed for the benefit of its peoples. The interests of the masses have therefore been regarded by keeping the land-revenue assessment light, by the reduction of the salt-tax, by keeping taxation low, by introducing irrigation where possible (it now secures crops worth forty to fifty millions sterling a year), and by scientific assistance rendered to agriculture. The opening-up of communications, by the construction of railways, roads, and canals, by telegraphs and postal facilities, has added enormously to the comfort of the people, has increased trade and commerce manifold, has given an outlet for surplus produce, and permitted the introduction of food in times of famine. Since the completion of the Suez Canal in 1869, and the improvement of the Indian ports, the trade and commerce of India, taking advantage of the developments just mentioned, have advanced by leaps and bounds, and have not nearly reached their limits. Factories, mills, and workshops have increased the out-turn of produce and the national prosperity. The condition of all classes has greatly improved, and they are better able than before to resist famine and pestilence. The rise of prices has benefited producers and exporters, but not the consumers. Briefly, the material interests of the country have been fostered wherever possible, and no opportunity of advancing them is neglected. A vigorous policy of public works is essential.

In no aspect has India changed more in the last fifty years than in the acquisition of political power by Indians, mainly the result of English education, adopted in 1835, the Education policy since 1854, and the institution of Universities in 1857. Almost all the subordinate appointments, and a considerable proportion of the higher posts, in the Government services are held by Indians; they occupy many of the highest judicial positions, and of executive appointments almost the highest. The Legislative Councils are composed so largely of Indians that they have ample scope for the expression of opinions and for influencing the policy of the Government. Constitutional reforms have provided for the expansion of the Legislative Councils, for the better representation of Mahomedans and other classes, and for giving greater opportunities to Indians to share in the management of their own affairs. Local Self-Government was introduced nearly thirty years ago, but, being unsuited to the country, has failed to flourish as was hoped. The liberty of the Press has led to such licence that some check has been required, but there is ample freedom remaining for the diffusion of political sentiments. An Indian National Congress has unceasingly applied political pressure upon the Government.

The administration has become much more elaborate. The business to be transacted has more than doubled. Many more departments and offices have been created to deal with the new needs and interests that have arisen. In all branches the utmost care is taken to make the administration conformable to principles of humanity and civilisation; the path of progress has been consistently pursued, though not always at the same pace; and mistakes have sometimes been made, and admitted. The maintenance of the high British standard of efficiency has occasionally been disregarded in order to admit Indians to a larger share in the administration. But no relaxation of British rule in its highest qualities of justice, strength, and liberty has been permitted, or is likely to be allowed. The military forces are and must be disciplined in sufficient numbers to provide for internal peace and to repel a foreign foe; the relative proportions of British and Indian troops, and the distribution of arms, are arranged so as to minimise the possibility of another military revolt; the Native States have been invited to send their quotas to the Imperial Service Corps. Of recent years the police forces have been reorganised at considerable expense, and measures have been taken to compete with the machinations of the criminal classes. It must be admitted that unrest has shown itself in parts of the country, and that anarchical methods have been practised in outbreaks of violence, outrage, and murder. The policy of combined repression and conciliation has been invented to meet the requirements of the situation, and there are indications that the policy has already had a good effect.

The question is often raised, Where is all this tending; how is it to end? The extremists among the political agitators will not be satisfied with reforms. They aim at Nationality and the termination of British rule; but their idea that British troops should still be retained to keep the peace and protect India from invasion shows the extravagant nature of the proposal. The evacuation of India by the British would be the signal, we must repeat, for disorder within and attack from without. So long as England retains her sea-power India is safe from aggression by sea, and her land-frontiers have been made strong enough to resist any attack until reinforcements can arrive from Europe. Diplomacy has been applied to give greater solidity to the frontiers, and the Native States are now favourably disposed to the British Râj. India's real danger consists in (1) the possibility of no reinforcements being available if England happens to be engaged in a European war, and (2) advantage being taken of such an occasion by agitators and anarchists to rouse the whole country to rebellion. Vigilance and foresight, sympathy and firmness are required in the Government. Sedition must be suppressed whenever it appears. Co-operation is sometimes looked for from the Indians, but they have yet to learn the meaning of the term. The concessions already made to their successful agitation for political power will assuredly lead to further demands. The Indians aim at power for the sake of the material benefits to be gained thereby. Their object hitherto has been not to advance British rule, but to thwart it. The transfer of political power to their hands will both make India more difficult to govern and retard the rate of progress. The conservatism of the East must act as a drag. The Europeanisation of India will be retarded, while her material resources increase. Antagonism between European and Indian policies must arise, and it is rapidly becoming apparent—in the demand, for instance, for protection for India in trade and commerce. Where the policies clash one must give way, and a continuation of discontent may be the result. As education advances—and education must be extended—the higher classes may become more difficult to influence as to the true interests of India.

No one can foretell the end; there is no need to try to anticipate it. The rate of progress, which has been more rapid in India since the Mutiny than during any previous period of the same length, cannot always be maintained. It is sufficient for the time to consolidate British rule in spirit and in strength, while giving the Indians such a considerable share in the Government as will enlist their interest and loyalty. Lord Curzon spoke of "the elementary fact that the rule of India is still, and must for as long as we can foresee remain, in British hands." In other words, it has been said that "we may safely assume as the basis of our policy that the supreme Government of India must remain British, and that it will continue to be of the absolute type, tempered by consultative Councils of a representative character, and by a steadily increasing measure of purely local autonomy." The acceleration of communications between England and India should make for peace, but, as Lord Minto has recently said, India must be governed in detail in India. Principles may be enunciated from England, but constant interference will only lead to danger and disaster. We must, again, with Lord Curzon, "remember that India is still the great touchstone of British character and achievement, and with a high heart and sober self-reliance go forward, and persevere to the end."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MUSIC

If, in these days of Competitions, literary and otherwise, Messrs. Bechstein were to offer a prize to the habitués of their Concert Hall for the most probable programme of a violinist, pianist, or vocalist "on his promotion," a vast number of papers would be submitted, and almost all the examinees would qualify for the reward. One programme telleth another, and one young artist certifieth another. We know by instinct born of experience what we shall hear, and how gladly do we welcome any exceptions to the established order of things.

When we read that a Miss Helen Sealy, greatly daring, proposed to play a Concerto of Bach, and cause it to be properly accompanied by its strings instead of by the intrusive piano, so that we might know how the composer meant it to sound, nay, more wonderful still, that she had engaged seven of London's most capital players, and intended to lead them in Schubert's Octett, we could hardly credit the announcement. Rhoda-like emotions overpowered us. It was as if Peter had knocked at the gate. What ambition, what spirit, what enterprise on the part of Miss Sealy! It could not be expected that she would give us Bach with the art of a Kreisler, or lead Schubert like Mme. Neruda at a "Monday Pop"; but the proverb about gift-horses is a wise one, and could any thanks be too warm to any one who would let us hear that Octett? We think not, and beg Miss Sealy to accept the expression of our sincerest gratitude.

Now, gratitude, of course, is an expectation of favours to come, and we will not deny that we have a boon to ask of the young violinist. Will she, in future programmes, strive to make them more perfect by the omission of music which is quite unworthy to sound beside that of the masterpieces? Her prelude to the Bach and the Schubert was Grieg's G minor Sonata, a work in which sugar is the ingredient of strongest flavour, and her epilogue was composed of pieces which cried aloud to be spared the humiliation of being made to tinkle while the notes of Schubert were yet in our ears. Schubert's is music "such as should be played before lovely ladies when they walk abroad," and these pieces might have suited the promenade on the pier of Brighton endimanchées. How would not our faces fall if, when invited to a banquet of wine, we found that our first cup was to be of fizzing lemonade and our last of cowslip-wine negus? Would these potions make us love the donor of the feast and enhance the bouquet of the rare Hermitage (such as that vintage drawn from the cellars of Gaunt House with which Becky warmed the cockles of Pitt Crawley's heart) or deepen the delight of Windsor Castle Sillery?

In truth it was a pity that Miss Sealy had not drawn up her scheme with more regard to Mr. Crummles' great doctrine of the "unities." We note that at her remaining concerts, Brahms' Horn Trio is placed cheek-by-jowl with—with Wieniawski's "Légende"! She will very likely reply to our comments with Voltaire's "You may have preferences but no exclusions;" but even if she does, we will still beg her to exclude from her programmes music which does not harmonise with the grand and noble compositions which form her principal contributions to our enjoyment. Miss Sealy's playing was marked by much intelligence, and that she has qualities which should make her a good artist in chamber-music there can be little doubt. Mr. Hamilton Harty's share in Grieg's Sonata made one ask why that admirable musician does not allow us to hear him as a solo-pianist. We cannot but think that he would be a great deal more agreeable and satisfying to hear than many prominent performers on the piano.

Another violinist who has given a concert is Miss Margery Bentwich, and though she did not resist the temptation to conclude with the best-known display of Wieniawski's fireworks, her programme was otherwise "in character," and she had constructed it with no little skill, since although she placed together not less than eight specimens of eighteenth-century composers, these were so varied in style that no effect of monotony was felt. She led off with the revised version of Brahms' B major Trio, one of his most beautiful things, and this was very well played, though Mr. Epstein, the pianist, was correct and solid rather than poetic. Miss Thelma Bentwich, a sister of the concert-giver, surprised and delighted us by the excellence of her violoncello-playing. We understand that this young lady is a scholar at the Royal College of Music. She should make a notable addition to the ranks of fine violoncellists, and so should her sister to those of the violinists, for she has a fine warm tone, first-rate technique, and a particularly smooth and pleasant style. Her Concerto by Nardini was delightfully played, and in a group of Kreisler's arrangements she made one think that she must have been Kreisler's pupil.

The Klingler Quartett from Berlin played again at the most recent concert of the Classical Society, and gave a really beautiful performance of Schubert's G major Quartett, which has been a good deal heard this season. Of Schubert, as of Bach and Mozart, the words which Berlioz once said of himself are strictly true: "I did not search for ideas, I let them come." And he who would play Schubert must play with an air of impromptu, as if the music was just then flowing for the first time from his fingers. This is what the Klingler Quartett was successful in doing. They were animated, tender, lyrical, exuberant, not as if they were trying to be so, but because they could not help it, and the technique of their performance was as perfect as its spirit. We liked Mr. Klingler and Mr. Rywkind for not being afraid, in these modern, impatient days of playing one of the once popular violin duets of Spohr. No one would say that this is great music, but it is very melodious and elegant, and quite remarkable as a specimen of pure violin-writing. It is the fashion now to sneer at Spohr, to call his music effeminate, &c. He is to be put away, with Mendelssohn, by the uncritical spirits of the times, as something too weak and even unwholesome to be put up with. He was once too popular, and we heard too much of him, and so there has come a reaction. But the best of Spohr's music will always be worthy of an occasional hearing.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Miss Kimpton, the energetic organiser of the Orchestral Concerts for Young People, will soon have to migrate from Steinway Hall to a more spacious room, so large is the audience she has come to attract. Her choice of Brahms' Academic Overture, two movements of a Concerto by Mozart, German's "Gipsy Suite," and some of Schumann's songs (charmingly sung by Miss von Glehn), was suitable enough; but we cannot think Dr. Ernest Walker's playing of Mozart likely to recommend that composer to the love of budding pianists. The charm of Mozart is probably too subtle for the comprehension of the schoolroom, and it would appear that it is also too subtle for some, at least, of the young people's instructors. Dr. Buck, of Harrow School, was to have lectured on "What is Meant by Form," as well as on "Tones of the Instrument" (with which subject an earlier lecturer had already dealt); but he did not tell us much about form.

Kreisler played Elgar's Violin Concerto once more at Queen's Hall on Saturday. The combination of composer and interpreter is still sufficient to fill every seat in that large building. His playing of the difficult music is not less marvellous than it was; but neither he nor Sir Henry Wood's orchestra is able to convince us that in the first two movements we have really great music. The Finale may almost be great; at any rate, it is exceedingly picturesque and effective and novel. We know the work well by this time; but we cannot accept the vaunted "nobility" of the Allegro, brilliantly as its themes are dressed up, unless it is as we accept the nobility of Louis XIV. in his robes of State, and Thackeray's twin portraits of that monarch are recalled as we listen to, or play, the swelling periods of the movement. Nor can we believe that the "divine simplicity" of the Andante originated in a cottage among pure unsophisticated folk. It is very pretty, no doubt, this Andante; we wish it were uglier, and had more "grit" in it.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

M. Paul Reboux, who combines the functions of literary critic of the Journal and President of "l'Association des Critiques littéraires et Bibliographes," is also a distinguished novelist. He has already given us "La Maison de Danses," "Le Phare," "Josette," &c., and, in collaboration with Charles Muller, those curious volumes entitled "A la manière de . . . ," which contain exceedingly clever imitative compositions of the leading writers. In his latest work, "La Petite Papacoda," he guides us through the populous quarters of Naples, and reveals to us the peculiar morals of Neapolitan curio-dealers.

Don Gennaro Visotti is a middle-aged antiquary, who sells curiosities he declares to be authentic: he easily persuades his clients of the veracity of his statements. In reality the objects they buy are only cleverly imitated duplicates, the work of an ingenious, but poor, young artist, Lorenzo Silvestri, who contributes willingly to the systematic swindling in order to earn the few lire he sadly needs. Gennaro lives among his real and false antiquities, his sole companion being Orsola, his sister-in-law, a withered bigot, who spends her leisure hours in orisons, which do not seem, however, to mollify in any way her acrimonious character. One day he catches sight at a friend's house of a young girl mending some lace, a remarkable beauty, and Gennaro finds his heart beating faster as he looks at her. He contrives, by an artifice, to have "la Petite Papacoda" come to his house in order to repair some lace. The more he sees her the more deeply he becomes enamoured of her. At first Luisella Papacoda does not notice his infatuation. She is the daughter of a fried-fish dealer of the Via Lavinaio—a picturesque but filthy street, where all the inhabitants seem to live on the sidewalks, and pursue their multifarious professions in the open air. She is happy to find in Gennaro a kind, elderly friend. But Orsola becomes infuriated when she discovers Gennaro's growing tenderness for Luisella—for Orsola has ever nourished the secret hope that she might eventually replace her poor, dead sister in Gennaro's affections. She succeeds in driving away Luisella under a false accusation, and the scene which depicts this episode is extremely vivid.

Gennaro soon discovers, however, that, far from having stolen anything, Luisella has one night defended the shop at the risk of her life against some burglars, including her sister Teresella and this sympathetic young person's lover. In his contrition Gennaro rushes off to the Via Lavinaio, where Luisella receives him with open arms, and he becomes the intimate friend of the whole edifying Papacoda family. With the profits he has realised from the sale of a statue discovered in the neighbourhood of Pompeii he sets up a flower-shop for Luisella. Until then he has only been a kind friend to her; but the inevitable soon follows, and from that moment all his sorrow begins. Luisella certainly cares for him, but he might be her father in age. So when one day a fine young man, with an irresistible moustache (the same Lorenzo Silvestri already mentioned) passes by the flower-shop, and notices Luisella, she is conquered by his soft words and flashing eyes, and soon responds. When Gennaro learns the truth he enters into a truly Neapolitan fury. He goes at once to the country inn where the lovers are to meet, but seeing them together, so young, so handsome, so deeply enamoured, his rage abates. He realises bitterly that he has passed the age of playing the part of a lover, and that it would be cruel to separate them. He turns and goes slowly away, solitary and old, lamenting over his lost youth.

The members of the Papacoda family are well depicted, with their joviality, and more than accommodating morality, which is both amusing and disconcerting. Gennaro's character is cleverly drawn: artist, yet withal utterly unscrupulous, passionate, yet kind at heart, he is, despite his numerous defects and absurdities, sympathetic. And from his personality emanates a subtle melancholy which finds its dolorous expression in the fine passages consecrated by the author to the mercilessness of Time and Age. Especially to be remarked are the pages dealing with the falsification of antiques. M. Paul Reboux certainly excels in depicting the manner in which the most ordinary bibelots are given the appearance of authentic ones. Indeed, "La Petite Papacoda," besides being a most agreeable recreation, will prove of real value to those travellers who are apt to allow themselves to be deceived by the eloquence of dishonest antiquity-dealers.

"En Allemagne: La Bavière et la Saxe," by M. Jules Huret, is the sequence of the author's preceding studies on Germany. It is a very serious volume, containing the results of personal inquiry made by M. Huret, and contains information of the most heterogeneous kind. There is even, perhaps, a too great profusion of ideas and statements. The reader is at first slightly bewildered. It also appears to us that M. Huret has insisted rather too much on the beer-and-sausage side of the German character. Are there not a great many other questions which might have proved more entertaining? "La Bavière et la Saxe" contains, nevertheless, some extremely amusing observations on the mixture of idealism and materialism to be found in most German souls. Among the chapters to be especially noted is the one dealing with the "Simplicissimus" of Munich, narrating the struggle this celebrated satirical periodical had to go through before attaining its present colossal success.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The book contains a very detailed study of "particularism" in Germany. M. Huret declares that he "does not believe in a permanent secession between the different states composing the German Empire," nor in the "actual existence of a particularism." He esteems that each year the national sentiment of solidarity augments, and that it is the interest of the different states to remain united, as their prosperity came with the Empire. "They are Imperialists by reason," he observes. Nevertheless, he recognises that there exist social animosities and religious dissensions, which continue, despite even the interest which unites the different parts of the Empire. M. Huret has also gathered many amusing anecdotes on German thought and character, some of which relate to the person of the Kaiser. No doubt it must have been these "Notes et Croquis," in particular, which caused the censor to prohibit the sale of M. Huret's work on German territory. They are really not very malicious, and the prohibition to sell his book seems to be the best proof that a great many of M. Huret's observations are correct—perhaps even too correct, in fact, for German amour-propre. English people will surely read this volume with real attention; those who have travelled in Germany will be particularly interested to compare their impressions with those of the celebrated French writer and essayist.

Mme. Jehan d'Ivray's last work, "Au Cœur du Harem," transports us to the Egypt of twenty-five years ago. We penetrate into the most intimate life of the Egyptians of that epoch, and a great many of the innermost thoughts of the Egyptian woman's rather primitive soul are revealed to us. Mme. Jehan d'Ivray has written in the form of an autobiography; she retraces, in the first person, the impressions of a young Frenchwoman, married to an Egyptian, when first brought into contact with her new family and surroundings. The contrast of thought and morality existing between the European girl and the women of her Egyptian uncle's harem is extremely well observed. Numbers of strange customs are recorded, all seeming to prove the infinite advantages the Egyptians—and especially the women—must have derived since the era of English influence. Ceremonies strangely incomprehensible to European thought are also described, such as the wedding festivities and the rites relative to funerals. From Mme. Jehan d'Ivray's account the palaces of the pachas and the princes of a quarter of a century ago must have been the centres of innumerable base intrigues, and the refuges of a considerable feminine population, whose highest aim in life was to win the master's favour in the hope of being elevated to the dignity of princess if they had the good luck of presenting their lord with an heir.

Some of the most interesting pages of "Au Cœur du Harem," which is written in an agreeable style, though occasionally marred by phrases a trifle too familiar, are consecrated to curious anecdotes of the reigns of the ancient pachas. In the sombre dramas which occurred in the silent crumbling palaces the women appear to have taken a no less active part than the men. These stories of the past give to Mme. Jehan d'Ivray's work a real historical value. Without doubt this book will prove specially entertaining to all who take an interest in the thought and customs of exotic life.

MARC LOGÉ.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS

THE spring-tide of books is still in the height of its flow. February has seen many interesting and valuable additions to literature; but March bids fair to outdo it numerically and intrinsically. Under the heading of Letters and Poetry there are shortly to appear "Greek Love Songs and Epigrams," a charming book by Mr. J. A. Pott, published by Messrs. Kegan Paul; "Japanese Poetry" is a volume published by Mr. John Murray, which, profusely illustrated by Japanese artists, gives the key to the understanding of the Oriental mind in poetry; the author is Mr. Basil Hall. Mr. Havelock Ellis, through the well-known firm of Messrs. Constable, is at last bringing out "The World of Dreams," a work upon which he has been engaged for a considerable time. He treats the subject from a very personal point of view, and quotes only those incidents which have happened to personal friends or to himself. Messrs. Constable also announce a volume entitled "Nietzsche and Art," by Mr. A. M. Ludovici. From Messrs. Blackwood is shortly to come "A History of English Criticism," written by Professor George Saintsbury; while "Lectures on John Ruskin," by Mr. A. C. Benson, are announced by Messrs. Smith, Elder, and Co. The inevitable whisker-man, Mr. Frank Richardson, is responsible for a volume of verse entitled, aptly enough, "Shavings;" this is to come out under the auspices of Mr. Nash. "The Ashes of God" is the title of a book by Mr. F. W. Bain, published by Messrs. Methuen.

The list of fiction is distinctly promising. Mr. R. W. Service, the Kipling of Canada, has turned his attentions momentarily to prose. If his book "The Trail of '98" is as strong as his two previous books of verse, it should indeed prove worth looking out for. It is to be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, who is also bringing out Mr. Marion Crawford's "Uncanny Tales;" "A Reconstructed Marriage," by Miss Amelia E. Barr; "Leslie's Lovers," by Mrs. Anne Warner; and the "Hand of Diane," by Mr. Percy J. Hartley. Messrs. Arrowsmith announce Mr. A. Quiller-Couch's "Brother Copes." Lucas Malet has written a new novel. Its title is "Adrian Savage," and Messrs. Hutchinson are bringing it out. From Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. is to come Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "Brazenhead and other Epic Sections." Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. have on their list Mr. Justus M. Forman's "The Unknown Lady;" "Mother and Son," by Mrs. L. T. Meade; "The Big Fire," by Mr. Ambrose Pratt; "Rogue in Ambush," by Headon Hill; and a book by Mr. Tom Gallon, entitled "Dead Man's Love." Mr. St. John Adcock's new novel, "A Man with a Past," is being published by Messrs. Stanley Paul and Co. This enterprising firm is also bringing out Matilde Serao's "The Desire of Life;" "Two Girls and a Mannikin," by Mr. Wilkinson Sherren; and "A Woman's Honour," by Mr. Christopher Wilson. Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop's name, as the author of "Perpetua," is in the list of Messrs. Alston Rivers, which list includes "The Reign of the Saints," by Mr. John Trevena. The writer of stirring travel-novels, Mr. Stanley Portal Hyatt, has written "The Land of Promises," and it will be published by Mr. T. Werner Laurie. Messrs. Methuen have secured the following works: Mr. Robert Hichens' "The Dweller on the Threshold;" Mrs. Maude Annesley's "Shadow Shapes;" Archibald Marshall's "The Eldest Son;" and Mr. Martin Swayne's "Richard in the Pantry." Marcelle Tinayre's "The Shadow of Love" is being published by Mr. John Lane. Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton's list includes "Love in Pernicketty Town," by Mr. S. R. Crockett; "The Woman in It," by Mr. Charles Garvice; "The Falling Star," by Mr. E. Phillips Oppenheim; and "Poor Emma," by Miss Evelyn Tempest. Mr. Martin Secker, whose books are so artistically finished, is bringing out, among others, "The Hoof-Marks of the Faun," by Mr. Arthur Ransome. Messrs. Hutchinson and Co. have for early publication a new novel by Mr. Cosmo Hamilton, who has broken fresh ground. The psychological study of such a man as was the hero of Mr. Hamilton's "The Infinite Capacity" finds no place in this new novel, whose title is "The Princess of New York." It concerns the misadventures of an American girl in London who falls into the hands of a band of aristocratic sharpers, from whom she is only saved by the intervention of an Oxford man.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Of interesting travel books there may be picked out especially from a copious list Dr. Jean Charcot's "The Voyage of the 'Why Not' in the Antarctic," which is being brought out by Messrs. Hodder and Stoughton; "The Danube with Pen and Pencil," by Mr. Granville Baker (who is not the translator of "Schwitzler" at the Palace), published by Messrs. Swan Sonnenschein and Co.; "Letters from Finland," by Mrs. Rosalind Travers, through Messrs. Kegan Paul and Co.; "Belgium of the Belgians," by Mr. Demetrius C. Boulger, published by Sir Isaac Pitman and Sons. Amongst General Literature may be included Mr. Keble Chatterton's "The Story of the British Navy" (Messrs. Mills and Boon); "The Suffragette," a history, by Miss Sylvia Pankhurst (Messrs. Gay and Hancock); a study of social life in South London by Mr. Alexander Paterson, entitled "Across the Bridges" (Mr. Edward Arnold); "German Influence on British Cavalry," by Erskine Childers (Messrs. A. and C. Black); "The Evolution of Sea-Power," by Mr. Horace G. Hutchinson (Messrs. Longman and Co.).

MAGAZINES

THE appearance of a new magazine is in itself a sufficient recommendation to primary attention; that such a magazine should be called the Irish Review makes the recommendation imperious. The lover of Art in the British Isles is learning—if indeed he has not learnt—to look appreciatively to Ireland for a certain earnest progression that is not manifested elsewhere. It is very manifest in Dramatic Art—in fact, much of the impact of progress in Dramatic Art has come from Dublin, and in connection with that there has arisen a literature which has produced J. M. Synge and Mr. W. B. Yeats. In the pictorial field Dublin has not yet drawn attention to itself, but it will do so during the next few years. Therefore we picked up the Irish Review with more than ordinary interest, and were disappointed. Not that there is not good matter in it. Mr. Orpen's frontispiece, "The Fairy Ring," is both distinctive and characteristic. Also Mr. George Moore's story is good; and Miss Mary Maguire's article on Synge, if not as complete as we should like it, is yet excellent. The poetry, perhaps, is the most disappointing, being neither pure nor unaffected. But there are deeper-seated faults. For example, it is very slight—so slight, indeed, that there is not room in it for much matter. The price (the modest sixpenny-piece) is largely responsible for this, of course; but even so, this is only to put the charge of slightness on a different ground. For twice that sum could very easily have been paid, and the magazine thereby more than doubled in size and importance. Moreover, we notice certain signs in it of what may be called "the rapier-touch" that lead one to diagnose internecine cleavage, which, however lamentably characteristic of the Hibernian, is nevertheless unfortunate from the standpoint of united literature. Such a review is needed so greatly that it should be authoritative and weighty.

Among the ordinary magazines the Fortnightly is an interesting number. Mr. H. F. B. Lynch takes priority in place and importance with a timely article on "The Baghdad Railway." In the first earnest flush of a rapprochement with Germany it would be obviously easy to concede unwise advantages in the matter of the railway through the Mesopotamian plain. For the right understanding of the problem a clear statement of its difficulties is necessary, and this Mr. Lynch does admirably. He shows that, whereas the main line of the railway is to proceed through the Mesopotamian plain to Baghdad and the Persian Gulf, a branch line will diverge at Killis to link up with the Aleppo-Damascus Railway, turning away at Damascus south-westerly towards Egypt. In this way a vast scheme is projected, the inevitable result of which would be to give Asia Minor, and therefore the German predominant influence in Asia Minor, a strong strategic hold on Egypt and the Suez Canal, on one hand, and the Persian Gulf on the other, and thus in its turn give it the key to India and the East. That Germany is not indifferent to this he shows by apt quotation. Mr. Ford Madox Hueffer has a well-informed and yet wholly uncritical article on "Christina Rossetti." One of the best contributions is that by Mr. Filson Young on "The Musician as Composer." It is one of the most genuine contributions to original musical thinking that we remember having seen for some time. It is not criticism, strictly conceived as such; it is, as we have put it, musical thinking. Mr. Young opens out the inner methods of musical composition, and traces the lines of descent in the various composers with extraordinary illumination and interest.

The "Declaration of London" leaves its influence through all the Magazines, and it is as well to treat of the several articles together. It is significant that the voices are in favour of it, Rear-Admiral Montague being the only dissentient. Mr. Frederick Harrison has the most popular of the articles in the English Review. He points out (as was necessary) that however the arguments are to proceed, the main matter to be remembered now is not whether our advantages are as great in the Declaration as they might be, but whether they are or are not greater than in the status quo. He instances one or two points in which the Declaration concedes advantages that are not only relative, being more distinct, but also positive, being of the nature of substantial gains. In the Nineteenth Century two voices are heard: Mr. Wilson Potter's in favour and Admiral Montague's against. Mr. Potter's article is in some sort an analysis, whereas Admiral Montague's is a short and undetailed protest. The most detailed of them all, however, is an article in the Fortnightly, entitled "A Defence of the Declaration of London," and signed "Excubitor." This is additionally valuable as it traces the historical growth of the late Convention. The most necessary of all articles yet remains to be done, to wit, an examination of the root of all the present matter: Nelson's brilliant blockade of France, together with an analysis of the Declaration of Paris, 1856, and the present Declaration. Only thus can Mr. Gibson Bowles' spirited objection be met, for it is true that he does not desire the status quo, but the status quo ante 1856. His is a vigorous appeal for the Nelson splendour.

Other articles in the Fortnightly are "The Théâtre Français in the Fifties," by Francis Gribble, and a sketch of the life and work of Björnstjerne Björnson by Robert Mackray. In the Nineteenth Century is an interesting article by Bernhard and Ellen Wishaw on "The Copts in Spain," tracing the substrata of Copts dating from the invasion of Andalusia, by Musa Ibn Norier. Professor Jastrow in "The Will to Believe in the Supernatural" deals with a perplexed question in rather a safe way by postulating special senses for the perception of the supernatural; and in rather an obvious way, too, perhaps. An admirable and excellent paper, the scope of which is well stated by its title, is that by M. André Beaunier on "Charles Baudelaire et l'Esthétique de la Décadence."

The poems in the English Review are always interesting, even if they are not often distinctive. Mr. Robert Bridges breaks a long silence with a poem curiously unlike much of the rest of his work. In "The Ballad of Iskander" he endeavours to catch, but does not succeed in catching, the mystical wonder of "The Ancient Mariner;" nor does his scheme of rhyming (quatrains rhymed in couplets) aid in producing the true ballad colour. "The Dead Dryad," by Wilfrid Thorley, is good as a far echo of Swinburne. Among the prose articles "Diplomatist" deals with the very perplexed question, "What is the Dual Alliance?" a question that has excited attention since the Potsdam meeting of last November. "On Fairies" is the tempting title of a curious essay by Mr. Maurice Hewlet. The matter of fairy-vision and fairy-intimacy in certain parts of the West of Ireland is one thing; to read it in Saxon, misbelieving England, is quite another. This adds greater zest to the article, not the least charm of which is its wise acceptance of the fact, and an exposition of it in the light of that acceptance. The much-debated Mr. Neil Lyons has a short story in this number, for which we prognosticate considerable misunderstanding and raised eyebrows. As a dramatic setting of imbecility of formidable processes of law with those that have not yet had an opportunity of learning what weighty things are life and death, it would be hard to rival. Brief as it is, it is remorseless and terrible. It is perhaps too much of a cameo, seeing how great its subject is. Yoshio Markino continues, and concludes, his "My Idealed John Bullesses," while Mr. Richard Whiteing has a characteristic story in the same review.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Rarely do we find an excellent short story, and, when found, it is worthy of a note. Such a story will be found in Harper's, entitled "Man and Dog." It is by Mr. Laurence Housman.

THE FIVE FREE LIBRARIES

"I HAVE the good fortune," said Wilkinson, "to live within easy reach of five Free Libraries. Or, rather, it is not good fortune. For, being of a studious turn of mind, I deliberately chose that central spot in order that I might in my sufficient leisure before bedtime take full advantage of all five. There was nothing else there to attract me. The district was like a desert with five oases, or a broad field planted with five noble trees. For me, however, the five libraries were enough. I thought fondly, even in the great, great labour of moving, of the fine times that were before me. How I would wander from one to the other in the cool evenings! What an intimate knowledge I should gain of their five characters! How I should be able to balance one against two, three against four, and, having exhausted these in vain, triumphantly discover the very book at last in five! What an expert knowledge I should now gain of every shelf in each—being almost on nodding terms with every volume! It might really have been a fairy-story. I could have imagined myself to be the Wizard with Five Fair Daughters—the King with Five Rich Jewels. I felt myself to be the equal of all men, however fortunate. I had met with opportunity at last. I determined to waste not a moment of my precious time. I planned therefore, after deep thought, a comprehensive scheme of study—down to the last half-hour. It gave me a deep pleasure even to read it over. 'On the evening of my ninety-second birthday,' said I joyfully, 'I shall be able to lean back suddenly in my chair and cry out, 'I am Master of all Knowledge.'

"At the beginning things went famously. I began to exult at the rapidity of my progress from the very first day. I had seven weeks of absolute triumph. And then came the pitiful crash.

"I discovered one evening that I had exhausted Library Number One upon my special subject. I had mastered the twenty volumes it contained, and must seek deeper knowledge somewhere else. I ask you to believe that I was not troubled by this necessity. Without misgiving, I went gaily, even carelessly, to Number Two. And then did the tragic truth suddenly strike me stupid! For Number Two was an exact duplicate of Number One. The books in Numbers Three and Four were almost precisely similar. In Number Five I could find nothing but an echo.

"Oh! my revered friend the shelf-room that was occupied by Marie Corelli! Oh! the elementary books already read and multiplied five times! Oh! the unattainable fat guinea quartos! . . . Out of my despair came an idea. I sat down on the top of Hampstead Heath, and I evolved a scheme, and saw a vision.

"How easily might these libraries be co-ordinated, worked together! It is, of course, impossible to concentrate in every parish the whole wisdom and knowledge of all ages. But suppose an annual conference, and an amiable partition? Spheres of influence, my boy, and all that? So that we could count on finding in every free library the general classics and such indispensable works as all must have; and after that, in some quiet room, or corner of a room, a specialist collection of books on one subject or even one branch of a subject. In every parish there would then be available a complete and easily accessible collection of literature on some special subject—feeding the desire for disciplined knowledge, giving it direction and an impulse. And around each of these collections there would slowly gather a little group of students. Think of the potent possibilities in the influence of that little circle! The subject they studied might eventually become almost a part of the life of the borough. Imagine the debates in the Council over the purchase of some rare and costly work. We should find the Marylebone pundits electing a man Mayor because of his deep knowledge of the Early Heretics. The eldest student of the graphic and plastic arts might come to be revered throughout all Putney.

"Then should Paddington's large knowledge of political principle breed disputes in the public-houses; and all Chelsea men be learned in Church matters. Around Westminster would grow up a school of history. The Brixton theories might come to astound the world. Fulham should be the famous home of all philosophers.

"A man's library-ticket would in those times become a sort of literary passport. I imagine the hungry student wandering rapturously over London, sure of a cordial welcome, franked by the local librarian's pasteboard. We can see in the dim future the whole staff of the Hackney Library lined up on the pavement to cheer the advent of yet another scholar. A locality would derive honour from the number of the students working within its confines; and steps would be taken to maintain or increase this number by the enthusiasts of the districts. We may yet live to see a sort of literary press-gang visiting the schools with a view to the early capture of possible mathematicians, and the man who has proved his worth at Sanskrit will surely be struggled for and almost torn to pieces.

"In these days," concluded Wilkinson, "we might become learned at little cost by mere expenditure of effort. Meanwhile we live in London and read the monthly magazines five times!"

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE NEW ERA IN RUSSIA

By LANCELOT LAWTON

THE jubilee celebrations just held in St. Petersburg in connection with the emancipation of the serfs have been the occasion of a striking demonstration of peasant loyalty towards the Throne of the Tsars which is not without its special significance at the present moment. The friends of Russia see in this, and in other equally remarkable signs of the times, material evidence that internal strife on any serious scale is now finally at an end, and, without laying themselves open to the charge of excessive optimism, have come to the conclusion that the Empire has entered upon a new era of genuine and abiding progress. Since the liberation of the serfs by Alexander II., fifty years ago, Russia has undergone many weary tribulations. On the whole, however, it can truthfully be said that Nicholas II. has continued, in the same wise spirit of toleration and with equal success, the noble work inaugurated by his illustrious predecessor. Practically all traces of the black period of war and revolution have now disappeared. Recently the Emperor has several times emerged from the isolation of Tsarskoe Selo, and in the open thoroughfares of the capital has been joyously acclaimed by his people. Throughout the length and breadth of the land peaceful development is everywhere manifest, and at no stage in history were the State finances so flourishing as they are at the present moment.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Events have proved that the hour brought forth the man. In spite of all evil prophecies to the contrary, M. Stolypin has shown himself capable of handling a situation as complex and difficult as the imagination can conceive. It has fallen to the lot of few statesmen to guide the destinies of a nation through times more troubled than those which existed in Russia when the present Premier assumed office. An almost senile autocracy still clutched, although in a death grip, the reins of Government; while a new-born democracy, its lungs filling with the fresh air of freedom so long denied its parents, cried aloud with infantile vigour and irresponsibility for the right to rule in all things. M. Stolypin has succeeded, so far, in steering a middle course. His tenure of office has been marked by steady reform, which has spread contentment throughout the Empire by the sure process of creating prosperity, and which, moreover, has had the effect of raising the credit and thus restoring the prestige of Russia in all quarters of the world. Gathered round the Premier are a number of brilliant statesmen of whom it is no exaggeration to say that their constructive work in the grand scheme of State reorganisation is destined to allot them a place of honour in history. And prominent among these stands M. Kokovtsoff, whose financial genius has proved one of the determining factors in the establishment of a new era of national prosperity.

In 1905-6 Dr. Rudolph Martin, the German economist, labouring, so he said, under a sense of great responsibility, published certain sensational books in which he boldly predicted the imminent State bankruptcy of Russia. Needless to say, these books created some stir thoughout Europe, and Dr. Martin, boasting that his statements had the effect of lowering Russian credit in all directions, even went so far as to attribute to their influence the refusal of Germany to participate in any more loans to Russia. At the time M. Kokovtsoff somewhat contemptuously termed Dr. Martin's elaborate series of deductions "twaddle," but the German publicist vigorously protested the accuracy of his assertions:—

> We are often told (he wrote) that the future of Russia is wrapped in darkness, that no one can foretell how it will develop during the next few years. This view is incorrect. The first year of the Russian Revolution, which came to an end on October 27th, 1906, has made it plain that the Russian Empire is slowly but surely approaching a reign of terror, a State bankruptcy and dissolution. . . . A recovery from its political, social, economical, and financial injuries is impossible, since there is not even the serious desire for reform. . . . The position of the peasants is growing worse instead of better. . . . The debts of the State are growing, and its credit is beginning to suffer.

In certain circumstances prophecy becomes an entertaining and a perfectly harmless pastime, but when it is employed with the avowed object of impairing the credit of a great State and scaring investors in Government-guaranteed securities, then it may reasonably be submitted to critical examination in the light of subsequent events, so that, if the results afford justification, the credit, in turn, of its author may, too, be "impaired" and his readers "scared" of his writings. A critical examination of this kind in the present instance compels the conclusion that Dr. Martin, in spite of his position as a Government Councillor at the Imperial Statistical Office in Berlin—a position which suggests some qualification for the task he undertook—has so woefully mishandled figures that he has entirely perverted the lessons to be learnt from those figures. Far from bordering on bankruptcy and strife, Russia is to-day, as I have already said, both prosperous and tranquil. At the close of the war with Japan there was an actual deficit in the resources of the country to the extent of fifteen or sixteen millions sterling. Early in the post-bellum period, however, a balance on the right side came into existence, and this, increasing largely as a result of the widespread prosperity which has followed the bounteous harvests of the last two years, now stands at nearly £33,000,000. As four-fifths of her population gain a livelihood from agriculture, it is upon this branch of industry that the stability of Russia is founded.

The accumulation of an enormous reserve in State funds creates an insurance against calamitous results in the event of the failure or partial failure of crops. Moreover, it provides ample means for the extraordinary expenditure required for the restoration of armaments, and for the development of railways on a gigantic scale, development which includes, among other huge undertakings, the doubling of the great Siberian system and the building of the Amur line, which is to establish communication through all-Russian territory from Moscow to Vladivostock. And, finally, the generous balance in hand dispenses with the need for further loans to meet the demands of the annual Budget. I have given merely a single, though perhaps the most striking, illustration of the present-day affluence of the Russian Empire, but it is permissible to say that in no department of State finance or in no sphere of activity that bears relation to the country's welfare are any save the most gratifying signs of real progress to be observed. Thus we find the National Debt is diminishing, the State revenue and the volume of trade increasing; bank transactions are growing and deposits accumulating; the capital of joint-stock companies has expanded enormously, and the price of shares and securities gone up by leaps and bounds until to-day Russia offers some of the soundest and most tempting investments to be found in any part of the world; and, finally, the State is devoting large sums of money to extending educational facilities and promoting productive undertakings, the transference of land from communal to private ownership is being conducted with conspicuous success, and the peasants are responding to encouragement in the direction of adopting improved methods and machinery in agriculture, all of which, by multiplying the annual yield, must ultimately enhance the prosperity of the country.

The gold reserve at the State Bank has reached the enormous sum of £147,000,000, and during the whole of the last corn season the discount rate of this institution was, for the first time, lower than that ruling in Germany. What has Dr. Martin to say to facts such as these—Dr. Martin, who in 1906 so confidently predicted the collapse of the Russian gold-standard and the cessation of payment of all dividends to foreign bondholders? "When, presently," cried Dr. Martin, in his panic, "Russian State securities have fallen some 30 or 40 per cent., there will be intense dissatisfaction in all German capitalist circles. . . . The crisis will spread to trade and industries." As a matter of undisputed fact, whereas the price of English Consols and the German Loan has shown a distinct tendency to decline since 1906—the year, it will be recalled, when Dr. Martin framed his frantic indictment—Russian State securities have risen steadily, until now they indicate a credit which compares favourably with that enjoyed by any other country. All the civilised world will rejoice ungrudgingly in that Russia, whose heavy burden of national debt was increased one-third by the ravages of war and revolution, has regained her financial buoyancy, and returned to the fulness of her powers as a great State. Thus are the critics confounded—the critics who, ignoring the fund of brilliant statesmanship at her disposal, her wonderful capacity for recuperation due to the possession of illimitable resources, and the qualities of patience and courage inherent in her people, sought in the hour of her tribulation to add to her embarrassment by departing from the canons of fair criticism to indulge in damaging speculation founded upon malignant distortion.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

Business is dull. The tone is good, but no one wants to speculate, and the investor does not seem inclined to come into the market at the moment. The new companies are not going well, and promoters are nervous. The public has had variety. It has been given a wide choice—a pulp and paper mills with certified profits; a speculative debenture is a contradiction in terms, but it catches some people; an oil venture in California, with contracts ready made for all the oil, contracts at a higher price than that now ruling, which contracts will have therefore to be enforced at the point of the law. I do not believe in contracts upon which one side makes a heavy loss; they often end in trouble. Messrs. Dunn, Fischer and Company offered some second mortgages on the Rio Trams, but who ever panted for a second mortgage? The British and Continental Tea Plantations and another smaller enterprise in tea also came before us. The City does not understand tea, and very properly leaves it to those who do. The average human being thinks tea shares fully valued to-day, and dislikes the puffs that punctuate the City articles of our evening press. Messrs. Barings, in conjunction with the Banque de Paris et de Pays-Bas and its ally, the Société Générale, have offered 4 per cent. bonds in the Central Pacific—a sound security. I hear Salisbury Jones has a rubber company on the stocks, the Tirucalli. It intends to extract rubber from a species of Euphorbia—the latex yields 10 per cent. rubber and 50 per cent. resin. So why I call it a rubber company I don't know. It reminds me of a visit I once paid to New Zealand. I spent a day crawling through the levels of the Woodstock Gold Mine. Then I asked to see the assay map. "But it's a silver mine," I remarked. "Oh, yes," replied the then manager, "but if we had called it a silver mine no one would have bought the shares."

Money is cheap, and we shall get another fall in the Bank Rate. This will help the gilt-edged market, and, despite the sneers of the City, Consols will gradually regain their old values. Lord St. Aldwyn has lent his powerful aid to those who agitate for a £5 bearer bond with coupons attached. Once we can get Consols distributed throughout the country and locked away in money-boxes the price is bound to rise to 90, and may even see par. The procedure would be simple; it would aid thrift and improve the credit of the nation. It is no new thing. It has been tried on the Continent and found successful.

Foreigners are dull on the whole. But the extremely cute are picking up all the Central American Government bonds. They are a little previous, but it is well known that the United States does not intend to allow these Central American republics a free hand very much longer. She will gradually acquire a financial and political control, for she is determined to be master of the whole of northern South America. I hear bad reports of the Argentine. The drought has been serious, and the farmers have sustained losses. The country is not in a position to stand two or three bad crops in succession, for it does not save, and all its wealth is in land. It has borrowed heavily on the Continent. A good harvest next year would set everybody upon their legs again, but a bad harvest would be dangerous. Therefore wise people should get out of Argentines. They will have plenty of chances of buying back if all goes well in South America.

Home Rails are still the best market in the House, but a bull account is being built up, and we might get one or two reactions during the next few months. Nevertheless, the main tendency will be upwards. Investors must bear in mind that all first-class securities will rise during the present year and that the fashion in stocks has changed. A year ago we all desired to place our money abroad. Now we prefer Great Britain. The trade returns show large increases, and the imports of cotton should draw the attention of investors to Lancashire and Yorkshire, which still remain under par, and are therefore undervalued. Speculators buy the cheap stocks because the contangoes are less heavy, but such stocks do not appear to me worth attention at the moment, for the bull account is large. A gambler who can wait two years might purchase Great Central deferred and double his money. Great Easterns are also certain to rise. As a sound investment, Great Western and North Eastern are the best stocks, for I cannot follow those who think Midland deferred worth 90.

Yankees, although supported by the great banking houses, have not yet got over their shock. Elliot has been secured for the Missouri Pacific, and Kuhn Loeb will take this railway in hand; the speculators jumped in, and may have to jump out again, for big bankers do not like to be forestalled. However, we may rely upon all the great houses remaining optimistic, for they have many large loans to place, and their operations require a steady market. There is no bull account here, and very little in New York.

Rubber.—The jobbers are idle. The public has evidently satisfied its appetite and considers the present level of values unattractive. They bravely decline to purchase the fancy stocks which some writers call cheap. None can deny their cheapness, the only point is their quality. I am not aware of any Malay plantations, well planted, well managed, and upon good soil, which have been neglected during the recent rise. If rubber holds, and at the moment it looks a little weak, then all the shares will be cheap. But a strong market in raw rubber depends upon the Bank of Brazil and its clients, the Aviadoring houses of Para and Manaos. This combination is probably at the moment engaged in fighting dealers like G. A. Witt, Heilbut Symons, and Alden and Company, whose whole interest lies in keeping down the price of Fine Hard Cured Para. Both sides are wealthy and bold. I am inclined to back the dealers. Technically the market in the Stock Exchange is hard.

Oil.—Notwithstanding the apathy of the public, oil shares remain very steady. The good Maikop companies, and there are not many, want money. They will get it. The bad ones also want money, but only an oil boom will save them. I see little chances of any boom. Oil as an industry, given a good field and plenty of capital, is sound; but the majority of the oil propositions now dealt in on the Stock Exchange are doubtful gambles, and cannot under any circumstances be called sound industrial propositions. The sanguine George Macdonald having failed to interest the British public in his Ferghana Oilfields has put the shares on the Coulisse in Paris. But the French are unlucky in oil. The Paris Rothschilds are deeply interested in Russian oil, Austrian oil, and Dutch oil. This has lured the Frenchman into the oil market, and he is likely to lose his money. Spies look a rising market.

Kaffirs.—The jobbers are so detestably pessimistic that one might almost suppose them short of shares. In which case we might see a rise. But the public is not inclined to speculate in Kaffirs, and it does not find even the bait of 7 per cent. attractive. It can get this, and allow 4 per cent. for amortization. But it remains cold.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

RHODESIANS.—Giants crushed 10,533 tons for just under 20s. a ton profit. But no one buys mining shares. The account was not heavy, but many holders have taken their shares off the market and pawned them. This has not helped us, for pawned shares are, if anything, more dangerous than those openly carried.

THE JUNGLE.—One does not often speak of Jungle shares. They have been dead these many months. Yet the week began with a smart spurt in this neglected market. I imagined a few jobbers had sold short and had become stale bears. Edmund Davis may have given them a twist. Assuredly the public did not buy. The move was entirely professional.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The main incident in this market has been the news that the electric light companies intend to amalgamate. They will require the consent of Parliament, but no one anticipates any difficulty. I again repeat that all the shares in this market are much too low.

THE LONDON AND SOUTH WESTERN BANK.

I congratulate Mr. H. H. Hambling upon his promotion. Not so many years ago he was managing a branch in the wilds of Kilburn, then he became manager of a new branch in St. Paul's Churchyard. He did not remain longer than was necessary to make the branch a success, but was promptly moved up to Head Office. Now he becomes manager. The careers of Sir Edward Holden and Mr. H. H. Hambling are a proof that great business capacity is still recognised in banking circles and quickly meets with its reward.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"CARLYLE AND MR. FRANK HARRIS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR—In your issue of the 25th of February your critic has attempted to justify his sneer at my paper on "Carlyle," in the English Review. His words were: "Mr. Frank Harris has an interesting article on 'Talks with Carlyle,' some of which is a little difficult to reconcile with internal probability." He now explains that the outrage on "internal probability" is to be found in my statement that Carlyle should have "grumbled at not receiving employment under the man (Disraeli) he detested." This criticism shows, in my opinion, an astonishing ignorance of Carlyle, and an even more astonishing ignorance of English political life. Let me deal first with its relation to Carlyle.

In my article Carlyle was manifestly thinking of the mission confided to Froude. Froude, it will be remembered, was sent to South Africa to give judgment on the dispute about the diamond-fields at Kimberley. The British Government had annexed the diamond-fields; the Orange Free State protested. Froude was sent out as a sort of Imperial Commissioner to determine the rights and wrongs of the case. He gave judgment in favour of the Orange Free State and against us. Evidently THE ACADEMY critic imagines that allegiance to a party chief is involved in the acceptance of such a mission? I believe, on the other hand, that Froude was selected chiefly because he was held to be above that party bias so dear to your critic. Froude went out to South Africa rather in the spirit of Browning:—

> Here and here did England help me; how can I help England—say,
> Whoso turns as I, this evening, turn to God to praise and pray
> While Jove's planet rises yonder, silent over Africa.

I can only explain your critic's astonishing denseness by assuming that he is rather a student of literature than a student of politics. He talks of "Sartor Resartus" and "The French Revolution;" he probably knows them better than Carlyle's political writings, or he would have recalled Carlyle's praise of a certain Governor of Jamaica, and realised the fact that men like Carlyle and his especial "hero" Columbus care little who gives them the task so long as they get the chance of doing "God's work."

Your critic's view of English political life, too, is lower than the reality. Does he believe that all English Governors of colonies or islands only accept employment under people they like and admire? Such a doctrine would be news to our great Pro-Consuls, news to Lord Cromer, news to every great ruler from Grey to Hercules Robinson. We have not yet in England embraced the American idea, that a man only accepts office under his political friends. Sir Alfred Milner, I believe, was supposed to be a Liberal when he was given power in South Africa by a Conservative Government. Though Lord Grey was sent to Canada as Governor-General by the Conservatives, he was not displaced when the Liberals came into office. Lord Selborne, Lord Salisbury's son-in-law, was appointed to the highest post in South Africa by the Conservatives, but he continued in place under the Liberals.

Kissing of course goes by favour in England as elsewhere, and a Liberal Premier usually appoints Liberals to high office as a Conservative usually appoints Conservatives; but no one in England would dream of criticising a Carlyle for accepting office offered by a Conservative Government, and the best men of the time would hold that any Government had honoured itself in honouring such a man. Our party bias goes deep in England—all too deep; but it does not yet go to the root, as your critic appears to think.—Yours truly,

FRANK HARRIS.

THE INFLUENCE OF WOMEN

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Machen does not seem to me to see far, even as a controversialist. He complains that I took his argument that politics would poison woman as implying that woman would herself become a poisoning agent. My reply is that if women were to be poisoned, corrupted, and destroyed by entering into politics, how could they avoid spreading this corroding contagion?

Mr. Machen forgets, although he probably believes, as I do, that men and women are not negative forces in this world, but that the influence of each life is for ever emanating from it, either for good or evil. I maintain that politics can be, and must be, raised from the sham and selfish scramble which Mr. Machen describes to the high level of a real science of government, carried on by principle instead of faction, and based on unselfish ideals.

The "ideal" of to-day has a way of becoming the reality of to-morrow, and if men have lost heart about this sorry delusion of politics, I myself, in common with very many other women, have confidence, hope and faith in the thought that our influence will ultimately bring about a better state of things.

E. MONEY COUTTS.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Machen says:—"Popular politics degrade all who meddle with them; therefore it would be a pity to degrade women by bringing them into the political cesspool, more especially as we owe reverence to womankind as the source and inspiration of all art."

I confess I do not understand such an argument. What is meant by "popular politics"? Politics I understand to be the name given to a communal method of seeking a common weal. If it is a cesspool I should like to know who has made it a cesspool.

I am reminded by such an argument of the man who declines to take an interest in local affairs because he believes Councillor So-and-So to be a thief, and of another who holds that religion is another name for roguery because a priest his grandmother knew was unfrocked for immorality. Because the world contains a great admixture of evil, does Mr. Machen say, with Hamlet, "We will have no more marriages"?

No, Sir, we as individual members of the State have a responsibility which cannot be thus easily brushed aside. If "popular politics" be a cesspool, then our children's children will cry upon us that we did not lay down wholesome drainage.

Women have a responsibility in this matter which is being recognised at last. They will not shirk it because men say "It is hard work, and we have made our hands very dirty over it."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Why, if it is such a "degraded business" as this, surely common sincerity will make us abhor the society of its practitioners!

It may be pleasant to be so oblivious to "The United States of Gehenna" (Mr. Machen will remember—I do, with gratitude) that for us they do not exist, but it is wiser and more pleasant to believe that the States contain a body of honest and active citizens who are determined that the word "politician" shall not for ever remain an epithet of contempt.—I am, Sir, yours obediently,

MAX PLOWMAN.

Lochnagar, Bycullah Park, Enfield, March 3rd, 1911.

"FROM GREENLAND'S ICY MOUNTAINS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Though it is a small matter, please let me explain that it was Bishop Heber's correction of "Ceylon" to "Java," not the posthumous collection of his hymns, which I meant to say had failed to find favour. I am responsible for the mistake, whether mine or the printer's, since if I had written "alteration" instead of "correction" it could not have happened.

T. S. O.

"WHO" OR "WHOM"?

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The most flagrant and common instance of the misuse of "whom"—indeed, it seems almost universal—is in the phrase "than whom," this being quite as unjustifiable as "than him" or "than her," which no educated person would say. Even Milton is guilty of this solecism—which must therefore be of old standing—in the lines

Satan, than whom
None higher sat, thus spake . . .

but that does not render it any the more correct.—Respectfully,

EVACUSTES A. PHIPSON.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Master Wit: A Story of Boccaccio. By May Wynne. Greening and Co. 6s.
The Patrician. By John Galsworthy. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
Tales of the Uneasy. By Violet Hunt. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
A Reconstructed Marriage. By Amelia E. Barr. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
The Vision of Balmaine. By G. B. Burgin. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.
Trevor Lordship. By Mrs. Hubert Barclay. Macmillan and Co. 6s.
The Unknown Lady. By Justus M. Forman. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
Cantacute Towers. By Cecil Adair. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Lonely Road. By A. E. Jacomb. Andrew Melrose. 6s.
John Merridew. By Frederick Arthur. Longmans, Green and Co. 6s.
Isabel. By Dorothy V. Horace Smith. Mills and Boon. 6s.
Jane Oglander. By Mrs. Belloc Lowndes. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
An Odd Situation. By Henry Grey Graham. John Ouseley. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Champions of the Crown. By Lucy Sealy. Illustrated. Methuen and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

VERSE

The Odes of John Keats. Edited by A. R. Weekes, M.A. W. B. Clive. 1s. 6d.
Poems. By Marjory Mines. Frontispiece. A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.
Faith. By Charles Robert Smith. A. C. Fifield. 2s. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Manual of Library Bookbinding, Practical and Historical. By H. L. Coutts and G. A. Stephen. Illustrated. Libraco, Ltd.
Notes on Wiltshire Names. By J. C. Longstaff. Vol. I. Place-Names. Wm. Dotesio, Bradford-on-Avon. 3s. 6d. net,
Mysticism: a Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness. By Evelyn Underhill. Methuen and Co. 15s. net,
The Temple of Life: an Outline of the True Mission of Art. By Ernest Newlandsmith. Longmans, Green and Co. 3s. 6d. net.
The German Menace, and How to Meet It. By an Englishman (F. E.). Constable and Co. 6d. net.
The Starlit Mire. By James Bertram and F. Russell. Illustrated by Austin Osman Spare. John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.
The Coronation Regalia: an Excursion into a Curious Bypath of Literature. By W. H. Stacpoole, B.A., LL.D. Illustrated, Whitaker. 1s. net.
A Coronation Souvenir. By the Rev. S. Baring-Gould. Illustrated. Skeffington and Son. 6d net.
How and Why King George will be Crowned. By Joseph Hammond, LL.B. Illustrated. Skeffington and Son. 1s. net.
Hymns for the Coronation of His Majesty King George V. Words by the Bishop of Durham, &c. Music by Sir Frederick Bridge, &c. Skeffington and Son. 1s. net.
Non-Governmental Society. By Edward Carpenter. A. C. Fifield. 3d. net.
State Socialism and Anarchism; How Far they Agree and Wherein they Differ. By Benj. R. Tucker. A. C. Fifield. 3d. net.
British Rights at Sea under the Declaration of London. By F. E. Bray. P. S. King and Son. 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

Religion of the Civilised World and Judaism. By H. J. Kisch. George Routledge and Sons. 1s. net.
The Two Saviours of the World: Joseph Typical of Jesus. By Timothy Shepherd. Illustrated. Simpkin, Marshall, and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

The Book Monthly; Irish Review; Deutsche Rundschau; The Antiquary; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; The Vineyard; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; The Author; The Bodleian; The School World; The Educational Times; The University Correspondent; The Literary Digest; The Quiver; The Journal of Education; The Periodical.

SAARBURG MOSELLE
GUTTA CONTRA GOUTTE

THE SAARBURG MOSELLE Co.
LIMITED

London Office:
28, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', S.W.

Cellars:
TRIER A/D MOSEL AND GEISENHEIM

Speciality
STILL AND SPARKLING SAARBURG MOSELLES

The Moselle Wines are grown on a dry, sandy soil; contrary to Clarets and Hocks, which are grown on chalk or slate. Therefore this Wine is recommended by the Medical Profession specially to those subject to Gout, and consequently forbidden to drink other Wines.

We can specially recommend the three following Wines: "White Label," "Mauve Label," and "Green Label," which are now in very fine condition.

Samples and Price List on application.

Supplied to all First-class Hotels and Restaurants.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service via Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SAARBURG MOSELLE

GUTTA CONTRA GOUTTE

THE SAARBURG MOSELLE Co. LIMITED

London Office:

28, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', S.W.

Cellars:

TRIER A/D MOSEL AND GEISENHEIM

Speciality

STILL AND SPARKLING SAARBURG MOSELLES

The Moselle Wines are grown on a dry, sandy soil; contrary to Clarets and Hocks, which are grown on chalk or slate. Therefore this Wine is recommended by the Medical Profession specially to those subject to Gout, and consequently forbidden to drink other Wines.

We can specially recommend the three following Wines: "White Label," "Mauve Label," and "Green Label," which are now in very fine condition.

Samples and Price List on application.

Supplied to all First-class Hotels and Restaurants.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25 Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY
AND LITERATURE

No. 2028 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MARCH 18, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY
THE PENNSYLVANIA STATE COLLEGE
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-cab.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4·4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p.—BOTH 6 CYLINDERS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh.
LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby.
AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C., will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

EDINBURGH MERCHANT COMPANY SCHOOLS.

DANIEL STEWART'S COLLEGE FOR BOYS.

HEAD MASTERSHIP.

Owing to the approaching retiral of Mr. W. Wallace Dunlop, M.A., the Merchant Company Education Board invite applications for the position of HEAD MASTER at Daniel Stewart's College for Boys, one of the Endowed Secondary Schools of the Edinburgh Merchant Company. The yearly salary has been fixed at £600. Candidates must not be over 45 years of age, and must be Graduates (with Honours) of a British University. The successful applicant will enter on full duty on 3rd October next, but is expected to assist in making the arrangements previous to the opening of the session. Applications, with testimonials (26 copies of each, which will not be returned), must be lodged with the subscriber on or before 24th April. Applicants must state (1) Professional Training; (2) Nature of University Degree; (3) Experience; (4) Age; and (5) Present position.

Candidates are specially requested not to call upon members of the Board.

ALEX. HERON, Secretary.
The Merchants' Hall, Edinburgh,
24th March, 1911.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post. Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

SHEPHERD'S EXHIBITION OF EARLY BRITISH MASTERS includes works by

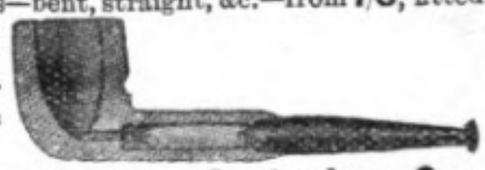
Gainsborough	Wilson	Cotman
Raeburn	Crome	Chandler
Lawrence	Constable	Downman, &c.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY,
27, King Street., St. James's, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific Manuscript carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science).



GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

HIBBERT LECTURES ON THE HIGHER ASPECTS OF GREEK RELIGION.

The FIRST COURSE of a NEW SERIES OF HIBBERT LECTURES will be given by L. R. FARNELL, D.Litt., Wilde Lecturer in the University of Oxford, on "The Higher Aspects of Greek Religion."

The Lectures will be delivered in the UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, South Kensington, on TUESDAYS, April 25th, May 2nd, 9th, 16th, 23rd, and 30th, at Half-past Three o'clock in the afternoon.

Admission by ticket without payment. Application for tickets should be made to Messrs. Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, not later than April 15th, and as soon as possible after that date tickets will be issued to as many persons as the Hall will accommodate.

FRANCIS H. JONES,
Secretary to the Hibbert Trustees.

"The Book Monthly is now enlarged and makes an exceedingly pleasant and readable publication."—CLAUDIUS CLEAR, in the British Weekly.

THE BOOK MONTHLY

You know the "Book Monthly" by name—you very often see it quoted in the papers. It is a brightly written, brightly illustrated magazine about the books and the literary affairs of the day. But as yet you have not taken it in! Well, you are missing something, and you should at once arrange to get it regularly. It is an instructing, entertaining "guide, philosopher and friend" for the reader near the centre of things or far away. Being now seven years old, and so grown up, it has just been enlarged, and made more popular and practical in contents and style. Read it and you will know what to read; what's what, and who's who in the book world.

THE BOOK MONTHLY is published on the 1st of each month, by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd., Stationers' Hall Court, London. It costs Sixpence, and it can be ordered from any Bookseller, Bookstall, or Newsagent. The Publishers will send it, post-free for a year, inland or abroad, on receipt of eight shillings. You can have a copy of the current number posted to you by forwarding 6d., or a specimen back number for nothing.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)
For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,
The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld.,
147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	379
A Heart's Cradle Song	380
The Sloth of the Income-tax Payer	380
The Gospel of Exaggeration	381
Talks with Paul Verlaine	382
Town Drama	383
Reviews :—
Sir William Butler	384
In Clubland	385
"Tant vaut l'homme, tant vaut la terre"	386
The Last Stuart Queen	387
The Nagas of Manipur	388
Neapolitan Art	389
Shorter Reviews	389
Fiction	391
Reference Books	395
The Theatre	395
The Great Quest—II.	397
The Poet's Holiday—IV.	398
The Procession	399
Aspects of Tragedy—III.	400
The Royal Society of British Artists	401
An Exhibition of Lithographs	401
A Song of the Motor: A Series—II.	401
Foreign Affairs	402
New and Forthcoming Books	403
The Great Oil Octopus	404
In the Temple of Mammon	405
Correspondence	406
Books Received	406

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

An INDEX to VOLUME LXXIX. (July-Dec., 1910) of THE ACADEMY will be forwarded post-free for ½d. to any address on application to the Publisher, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

AFTER a period of comparative quiescence, the strikers in the mining district of South Wales, which was the scene of so many lamentable disturbances last year, have again broken into open defiance of law and order. Rioting has been rife during the last week; eighteen constables have been incapacitated, and the extreme course of placing the locality under martial law has been seriously discussed. In this connection the publication by the Home Office of Major-General Macready's report seems to us a most regrettable blunder. Immediately upon its appearance the rioting was renewed, and it was actually utilised as a justification for behaviour which should be impossible, and is almost incredible, in a civilised country. To loot a man's shop and make a bonfire of his books in the street savours more of the days of civil war or invasion. Bearing in mind the recent outcry against Mr. Runciman for permitting a circular to be issued from the Education Office without his personal inspection and sanction, we cannot help holding the opinion that the authorities of the Home Office are deserving of grave censure for allowing the premature publication of Major-General Macready's report on the strike question. It was a confidential document, and should have been held back until its appearance could in no way prejudice the position of affairs in the area affected by the strike. Tact—to say nothing of common sense—seems a quality strangely lacking in those at the head of our public departments, and we are not surprised when we hear earnest desires expressed, even from those whose political opinions differ from our own, for a return to the days of high statesmanship and judicious administration which now seem so far off.

With all due respect for whatever opinions two such distinguished actors as Sir Herbert Tree and Mr. George Alexander may think it fitting to express, we tremble at the idea of theatre stalls filled with a public "in tweeds and sailors' knots." Those who advocate the disregard of the custom of evening dress for the best parts of the house forget, perhaps, that a certain sense of comfort and well-being pervades the assembly of faultlessly-dressed men and women, a sense which greatly conduces to the enjoyment of the play, and which spreads subtly to invigorate the other parts of the house where a less rigorous attire prevails. But there are other considerations hardly less important. What, we may ask, would the population of the pit find as a theme of conversation were its members deprived of the solemn joy of criticising the dresses and coiffures so near, and yet so far, during the entr'acte? What would become of the genuine thrill of pleasure engendered by the spectacle, considered merely as a beautiful picture, of a crowd of English men and English women of the best type in evening dress, gay and contented? We do not say that the theatre-goer who by emergencies of time or distance is compelled to present himself in ordinary garb should be cast into the outer darkness, since such emergencies happen at times to us all; but we do say that as a custom evening dress should be maintained for certain parts of the theatre. One never knows what the gradual slackening of such a rule will lead to; it may be that some day we shall see the stalls full of people who have rushed up to town fresh from a bout of energetic gardening, with straws in their hair and sweet-peas on the brain, clad in costumes which will be varied and picturesque but somewhat unappealing to the sense of beauty. Then will come the pipe, and the lowering of prices, and through a haze of incense ascending from well-seasoned briars and a penetrating smell of surreptitiously sucked oranges the actors will behold the final triumph of the blouse, the sailor's knot, and the tweed as "the real, right thing" for evening wear.

The list of lectures to be delivered at the Royal Institution after Easter is exceptionally comprehensive and interesting. Mr. J. E. C. Bodley will discourse upon Cardinal Manning, the Decay of Idealism in France and of Tradition in England, and the Institute of France, in a series of three addresses. Professor F. W. Mott takes for his theme the Brain and the Hand; Dr. W. N. Shaw discusses Aviation from a scientific standpoint, and Mr. Thorne-Baker will expound the latest practical developments in Wireless Telegraphy. Those who have had the pleasure of listening to Professor Selwyn Image will be glad to see his name down for three lectures on Ruskin, William Morris, and Walter Pater; Mr. W. L. Courtney takes the classical side with two lectures entitled Types of Greek Women. Phases of Bird Life will be treated by Mr. W. P. Pycraft. Other distinguished names figure in the list, among whom Professors Flinders Petrie, Gilbert Murray, R. W. Wood (of the Johns Hopkins University), and William Stirling may be noted.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A HEART'S CRADLE SONG

Grieve not, poor heart, that daffodils are dead
And summer grasses withered 'neath the sky,
Grieve not that every golden hour is fled,
That murmuring in the darkening tops of trees,
Where brown leaves die,
Borne on each plaintive breeze,
The song of Autumn, poignant with distress,
Makes a sad minstrelsy,
Bewailing Summer's loveliness
Too soon gone by.
Grieve not, poor heart.

Grieve not, poor heart, that love hath taken a sword
And severed each strong tie that bound us twain,
Grieve not, for seeing that the spoken word,
Once spoken, like the fateful chance gone by,
Comes not again,
Though hours of ecstasy
And vows of passion, born of Love's delight,
Are barren and in vain,
Though radiant day is turned to night
And joy to pain,
Grieve not, poor heart.

Grieve not, poor heart; the magic birth of Spring
Would come less welcome but for Winter's blight.
Grieve not, each hour of gladness Time must bring
Will be but lovelier, free from sorrow's stain,
When put to flight,
As sunshine scatters rain.
Joy conquers sorrow, and the grief of years
Fades like the night
When morn from out the East appears
Crownèd with light.
Grieve not, poor heart.

C. S.

THE SLOTH OF THE INCOME-TAX PAYER

In our issue of January 14th of the present year we called attention to the probability of a large surplus at the close of the financial year, and we asked, "Is that surplus to be devoted to the relief of those who have produced it?" We endeavoured to furnish a rallying cry whilst there was yet time, the import of which could not be overlooked by any Government. The Income-tax payer has remained absolutely cold; he glories in his abasement and hugs his chains. Peel and his progeny—Free Trade and Income-tax—are apparently the fetishes of those who are too lax or too craven to make their power felt. What the men of 1816 revolted against and secured the abolition of, the supermen of 1911 tranquilly accept and kiss hands for.

Maudlin sentimentality has so gripped the nation that notions of fair treatment and common honesty are immediately surrendered when some Socialistic nostrum is put forward to be financed by the methods of the footpad.

There is an estimated surplus of not less than £8,000,000. Not a suggestion is put forward that the Income-tax payer is to receive any relief. On the contrary, hare-brained schemes are shadowed forth on absolutely unsound actuarial bases to swallow up the surplus, and to impose in the future further burdens on the patient draught animal. "An ass endures his burden, but not more than his burden;" the super-ass will endure any addition to his load.

In January last we wrote:—

> The Income-tax payer has shown extraordinary laxness in not protesting against being regarded as a milch-cow to provide sustenance for the support of Radical-Socialistic legislation. A body which is now called on to provide one-quarter of the total revenue derived from taxation is strong enough, if rallied and efficiently organised, to command attention to its protest.

Is the Income-tax payer inclined to submit cravenly to the absorption of the surplus he has created in order to finance, for the moment, the Bill which the Government promises to aid and stereotype imposture and malingering?

A few years ago the Peers committed a terrible crime: they positively delayed the passage of the Budget! Fire and fury raged through the land. All the rich imagery of the East-end was expended in denunciation of the too-daring hereditary legislators. The only excuse they could urge for their action was that it was adopted in the interests of sound finance and honesty. We now hear that postponement of the Budget is really a matter of no importance, and as the Government have been ordered by their Socialist taskmasters to remodel their measure of insurance so that relief may be provided for everybody, the Budget may stand over. It really does not matter.

In our previous article we traced the history of the Income-tax from its first imposition by Pitt as a temporary measure to cope with the enormous expenditure incurred in the Napoleonic wars. We noticed the abolition of the tax in 1816 in consequence of popular resentment. We showed how Peel reimposed the tax in 1842 as a necessary concomitant of the blessed policy of Free Trade. We showed how Mr. Gladstone in 1874 promised the total abolition of the tax if he were returned to power; how Mr. Disraeli was victorious, and retained the tax on the basis of 2d. in the pound.

In these days, if a Socialist is reminded that the Income-tax—essentially a tax on enterprise, employment, and success—has never been defended on other grounds than as a war tax, a smile puckers his face. According as he has command of language, he explains that it is as a war tax that he desires to use it—to wage a Jehad against prosperity capital, industry, and all that is valuable, responsible, and reputable in the land. He is a man of definite views, and is sufficiently forceful to brush aside the halting temporisers who pose as Moderates. He knows that the Income-tax payer is a poor creature with scarcely sufficient virility to utter even a feeble protest, incapable of combination, a negligible quantity.

Such has been the truth in the past—What of the future? Will Income-tax payers organise and combine? Will they send members to Parliament, whose first care shall be to guard them against spoliation, to secure fair-play, and to balance the demands of extortion as an equivalent for votes?

Cecil Cowper.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE GOSPEL OF EXAGGERATION*

Poor old England, according to the tremendous arraignments of Mr. Bernard Shaw, is the most unfortunate country on the face of the earth. She is the home of a desperately immoral set of people, most of whom are either unhappily married or suffering from the "amatory infatuations of the adolescents"—which is Mr. Shaw's pleasant little way of referring to youthful love. They are people, too, who when they have time to struggle free from "the influence of the most violent, most insane, most delusive, and most transient of passions," are anything but nice in their behaviour or their code of ethics. The medical profession, for instance, in this pit of iniquity, "has an infamous character." "I do not know a single thoughtful and well-informed person," says Mr. Shaw, "who does not feel that the tragedy of illness at present is that it delivers you helplessly into the hands of a profession which you deeply mistrust." We are tempted to hazard the comment that Mr. Shaw does not know a single "thoughtful and well-informed person." The reason for this imputed mistrust of the doctor's craft is that "it not only advocates and practises the most revolting cruelties in the pursuit of knowledge, and justifies them on grounds which would equally justify practising the same cruelties on yourself or your children, or burning down London to test a patent fire-extinguisher, but, when it has shocked the public, tries to reassure it with lies of breath-bereaving brazenness." We are aghast with wonder that any sane, humane, or thoughtful individual can choose to live in such a disreputable country while there are peaks in Darien and Pacific islands left to which he might retire and save the remnants of his self-respect.

It will be seen from the above quotations that no outworn mantle of effete convention envelops the gesticulating form of Mr. Shaw; but neither is he garbed, we hasten to say, in the motley crowned with cap and bells which will soon become equally tame and conventional. It is the fashion with certain wise men to "gild the philosophic pill" too brilliantly, to play the acrobat with truth until the crowd is dazzled into applause, to stand a time-honoured, sober statement on its head, and bid us behold how exceedingly curious it looks upside-down; and some, if not most, of the critics have "placed" Mr. Shaw within this circus-ring of literature. To our thinking this is an estimate which can only be arrived at through hasty reading. Mr. Shaw is no clown; he can "wind up the watch of his wit" with the best of them when he wishes, or banter his opponents (who are generally his friends, happily enough) like a veritable Touchstone; but beneath his humour and his agility and his verbal felicities runs a very serious purpose, enforced by a logic that seems relentlessly cogent. If he is not quite the "reasonable, patient, consistent, apologetic, laborious person, with the temperament of a schoolmaster and the pursuits of a vestryman," which he professes to be in the dedicatory epistle of "Man and Superman," we can still quite appreciate the sentence which immediately follows: "No doubt that literary knack of mine which happens to amuse the British public distracts attention from my character; but the character is there none the less, solid as bricks." We should rather incline to pigeon-hole Mr. Shaw as the prophet of exaggeration, if he would consent to such an ignominious process as being pigeon-holed; and from these remarkable Prefaces to three of his plays plenty of evidence can be gathered for such a decision.

Let us take, in addition to the sentences already quoted, a glance at some other pages that may enforce our contention. Under the heading of "Routine," in the "Preface on Doctors," we find that "a respectable man . . . will flog his boy for telling a lie because it is customary to do so. He will also flog him for not telling a lie if the boy tells inconvenient or disrespectful truths, because it is customary to do so." Here we have a notable confusion between telling the truth and not telling a lie. The poor boy is not flogged by any respectable man for not telling a lie—he is flogged for being rude, not having yet reached the age when he will realise that there is "a time to keep silence, and a time to speak." It might be an irrefutable truth that the boy's grandmother was ugly; but if he told her so he would deserve his thrashing—not because he did not tell a lie, but because he was unquestionably rude. If we all told the truth, life would be one long free-fight. The worst of Mr. Shaw's exaggerations is that they often seem to prove how little he really knows, as when he says that "all children are annoying," or, on the same page, that "nine out of ten clergymen have no religious convictions; they are ordinary officials carrying on a routine of baptising, marrying, and churching, praying, reciting, and preaching"; or again, when he shakes the red flag in our faces by asserting as a "flat fact" that "English home-life to-day is neither honourable, virtuous, wholesome, sweet, clean, nor in any creditable way distinctively English."

The most striking instance of this exaggerative mood, perhaps, occurs on page 120, in the preface to "Getting Married." Mr. Shaw attended a "Conference of Married Men"—attended it as a young sociologist. The "Married Men" were representative, typical persons, who "enjoyed their smokes, their meals, their respectable clothes, their affectionate games with their children, their prospects of larger profits or higher salaries, their Saturday half-holidays and Sunday walks, and the rest of it." Yet, thanks to the distorting-lens through which Mr. Shaw habitually peers, it was to him a positively awful affair:—

> Peter the Great would have been shocked; Byron would have been horrified; Don Juan would have fled from the conference into a monastery. . . . What they called patriotism was a conviction that because they were born in Tooting or Camberwell, they were the natural superiors of Beethoven, of Rodin, of Ibsen, of Tolstoy, and all other benighted foreigners. . . . They had, as to adults, a theory that human nature is so poor that it is useless to try to make the world any better; whilst, as to children, they believed that if they were only sufficiently lectured and whipped, they could be brought to a state of moral perfection such as no fanatic has ever ascribed to his deity. Though they were not intentionally malicious, they practised the most appalling cruelties from mere thoughtlessness, thinking nothing of imprisoning men and women for periods up to twenty years for breaking into their houses; of treating their children as wild beasts to be tamed by a system of blows and imprisonment which they called education; and of keeping pianos in their houses, not for musical purposes, but to torment their daughters with a senseless stupidity that would have revolted an inquisitor.

Here we have distortion indeed—a frantic argument from exceptions, and a surprising cheapness and futility. For those men, gathered together for the purpose of discussing marriage, were ordinary, contented married people; as Mr. Shaw admits in the very next sentence, "in short, dear reader, they were very like you and me." "I could fill a hundred pages," he goes on to say, "with the tale of our imbecilities, and still leave much untold; but what I have set down here haphazard is enough to condemn the system that produced us." Not a bit of it, Mr. Shaw; but it is quite enough to convince us that you are a very clever fellow, and that we can read what you write with the utmost entertainment, picking out here and there the pills of good sense which are covered with such a piquant coating.

* The Doctor's Dilemma, Getting Married, and The Showing-up of Blanco Posnet. With Prefaces. By Bernard Shaw. (Constable and Co. 6s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Many other questions besides those we have alluded to are treated high-handedly in these stimulating and energetic prefaces, but we have no space to deal with more at the present moment. Enough has already been written about these plays and their inseparable explanatory epistles to fill volumes—which illustrates the great peculiarity (perhaps we should say the great distinction) of their author: he cannot be neglected or shelved. His style of writing—the exaggerated argument from exceptional premisses—has brought him fame; it remains for the wise and judicious reader to wear a strong pair of astigmatic spectacles which shall straighten up the crooked lines of Mr. Shaw's logic and set the whole picture thus flaunted before our eyes into a more pleasing and correct focus.

WILFRED L. RANDELL.

TALKS WITH PAUL VERLAINE

BY FRANK HARRIS

LIFE needs reporters, and creates them everywhere. Not a tree but keeps tale of the winters and summers it has passed, and in its knots and twists bears witness to the storms and strains it has endured.

Nature even, motionless and inarticulate Nature, is occupied with its own biography, and keeps its own record; buried forests write their story in coalfields; forgotten seas describe their vicissitudes, and show us the form and imprint of their inhabitants in chalk-cliffs and gravel-beds; the hardest granite and porphyry blocks testify to their fiery origin and describe the chief mishaps they have suffered. Even the blazing suns analyse themselves for the spectroscope, and invisible stars register their weight and orbit in the deflection of neighbouring planets. Perhaps there is not a thought in the mind which does not inscribe itself in the furthest star, and the palimpsest of the universe from the birth of time is repeated again in the being of the youngest child.

And if all creation, from the sun to the grain of sand, tells its story and records its fate, how much the more shall man sing his sorrow and his joy! For man is something more than a reporter; and that something more is the source and secret of his ineffable superiority: he is artist as well. He divines the hidden meaning in nature, the half-disclosed aim, and he does this by virtue of the fact that the eternal purpose works in him even more clearly than without him, and shows itself in his very growth. The artist is not content merely to report his sufferings and his pleasures, he makes epics of his adventures, dramas of his strugglings, lyrics of his love.

Some of us believe that this artist-function (because the latest in development) is the highest, that the statue of Hermes is more important than Greek life, that Tacitus and his History are more valuable than Rome, that all England and English worth found expression in Shakespeare, in fact that the dream of life itself is not so memorable as the telling. The workman and merchant, the lawyer and doctor, the man of science and lawgiver and priest all live and labour as material for the Singer. Nothing endures like the word: "it liveth and it conquereth for evermore."

It is not wonderful then that men should be curious about the poets and artists of their own time. They will take more and more interest in them, and not less, as they advance in wisdom. I need no excuse, therefore, for talking here of Verlaine, for he, too, was one of "the sacred band."

Paul Verlaine did not look like one's ideal of a poet: he is best to be seen in Rothenstein's pencil sketch; his likeness to Socrates was extraordinary. One could have sworn that the old Silenus-mask was come to life again in him. But Verlaine had not the figure of the great fighter: though of average height he was punily made and inclined to be podgy. With his careless, slovenly dress he would have passed unnoticed in any street-crowd, French or English. He seemed, indeed, to wish to avoid remark: there was something timid and shy, a shrinking even, in his manner, due to nervous apprehension rather than to reserve. But with friends Verlaine gave himself as freely and simply in talk as he did in his writings. I have never known any human being with such child-like, perfect frankness, such a transparent sincerity in thought and being. After a couple of hours spent with him I found myself wondering whether any one by mere frankness could be so charming. Of course it was the absence of malice in Verlaine, the absence of all spite and envy and hatred, the lovingkindness of the man which was so engaging, and a touch of gay ironic humour lent an ineffable fascination to his sincerity.

Everyone has read his early lyrics of love and passion: everyone knows the story of his early life, of his admiration for Rimbaud and the tragic outcome of it in the shooting at Brussels and that imprisonment which finally brought Verlaine to repentance and to the humility of religion, and thus completed the disharmony of his dual existence.

The first evening he dined with me he told me of an adventure which seems to me characteristic. After he came out of prison in Belgium he made his way to England. In London poverty forced him to offer himself as a teacher of French.

"I was engaged," he said, "almost immediately by a clergyman at Bournemouse at seventy pounds a year, sans blanchissage. 'No washing' was wonderful to me," he added, "because I used so little"—and he smiled.

"Ze train was arranged for me and everything, and I was met at ze station by a big man, a clergyman.

"'Are you Mr. Verlaine?' he asked.

"I said 'Yes,' and he shake me by the hand, and talk to me the most terrible French I have ever heard. His accent was more than an accent; it was a new language. One had to guess at his meaning. I could really understand him better when he talked English, though I only knew half a dozen words. He took me to his house, which was the school, and treated me splendidly. He showed me ze room that was to be mine, and asked me to dinner. His wife was charming to me, and they both told me they were sure I should succeed. I could only say, 'I will do my best.'

"After dinner ze clergyman told me he thought it better I should rest ze next day, and get to know ze place and school and everything. He was kind to me and thoughtful. There were coloured texts in my room, very beautiful texts, and time-tables—the time to post letters, time to get up, time to go to bed—and there was a Bible on my table de nuit; the clergyman was very English. I told him I was willing to begin at once, but he would not hear of it, so I rested the whole day. Next morning he came into my room to introduce me to the boys.

"'Your first class will be a drawing class,' he said.

"'Drawing!' I cried. 'I know nozzing of drawing.'

"'Every Frenchman,' he said, 'can draw.'

"'But I cannot draw,' I exclaimed in an agony, 'not at all; I have never held a pencil in my life. I came to teach French; I really know French.'

"'Yes,' he say to me, smiling and putting his hand on my shoulder, 'but you do not know much English yet, and until you do know a little more English I think I had better go on teaching French!'

"'Mon Dieu, mon Dieu,' I said to myself, but I could not find words to answer him. He took me into the class and put a wooden cone on the table and told the boys to draw it. I was to correct zere drawings.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"What I teach the boys I do not know. I taught myself more than I ever taught myself in my life. In a fever I studied light and shade for an hour. Of course I was a little better than the boys; but I was no more master of drawing than he was master of French. Oh, his French, it was horrible! He talked out ze verbs in a loud voice, and ze class had to repeat zem after him, and no Frenchman could have understood what he was saying. Such a language I never heard in my life. He was very English, but he was kind to me always. I had to go out long walks with the boys. Some of the older boys were interesting, and ze country about Bournemouse was beautiful. That English life was new to me. It was strange and it absorbed me: it healed me. It was like an oasis in the burning desert of my life. I got quite well in Bournemouse, but why was it—seventy pounds a year 'sans blanchissage?" and he murmured to himself, shrugging his shoulders, "sans blanchissage, et je m'en sers de si peu!" Again and again—"Seventy pounds a year, sans blanchissage."

"I am glad you liked English life," I said to him, "and Bournemouth."

"It was healthy," he replied, "and ze clergyman he meant well with his texts and time-tables; and I learned a good deal of English, and read some Shakespeare. Quel divine poète! I could never understand how that clergyman and Shakespeare could be of the same race."

I was eager to find out how much Verlaine knew of Shakespeare; whether he had divined him at all. But when I pressed him he took refuge in generalities; and when I tried to get to my end by comparisons he would not be netted. He likened Shakespeare to Racine for beauty of phrase; and when I tried to say that there was no magic in Racine, no word or thought comparable to Shakespeare's best, he accepted what I said with smiling good humour. I rather think the acceptance was of politeness and not agreement.

I was in constant relations with Verlaine, both as editor and friend, for the last few years of his life. I published some poems of his in the Fortnightly Review, though I had a good deal of difficulty with my directors in getting adequate payment for poetry, and French poetry was anathema to them. When I sent Verlaine his cheque he always replied in a letter thanking me, and at the end of a month or so he would write me another letter saying he hoped I liked his poem, and would I send the money for it to the above address. Of course I wrote to him saying I had already sent the money and held his receipt for it. He wrote back agreeing with me and excusing himself, saying he was so hard up that he liked to think he had not been paid. Of course I did what others would have done, and sent him more than I owed. There was something of the wisdom of the serpent mingled with his childlike frankness.

In those latter days Verlaine was to be seen at his best in a restaurant on the Boule Mich', where he often spent his evenings. He used to sit in a corner drinking and talking of poetry and literature with a little crowd of fervent admirers about him. Every student who came in made a point of passing his corner and of bowing to him in greeting with a cher maitre.

Verlaine accepted the homage with delight. It was to him a sort of apotheosis, the reward of much suffering. One night some one begged him to recite "Le pauvre Gaspard," a most characteristic poem, as characteristic perhaps of Verlaine as "The Last Word" is of Mathew Arnold. The poem is founded, I imagine, on a word of Alfred de Musset—"Suis-je né trop tôt ou trop tard?" But the question is brought to intenser significance by Verlaine. The last verse runs:—

Suis-je né trop tôt ou trop tard?
Qu'est-ce que je fais en ce monde!
Oh, vous tous, ma peine est profonde:
Priez pour le pauvre Gaspard.

He recited the verses perfectly, bringing out all the pathos of them, while marking the rhythm with a gesture of his left hand. A silence as of unshed tears followed, and in the silence he repeated the last verse again, but this time, in the last line, he substituted "payez" for "priez," smiling at us the while mischievously. Of course we were all too eager to pay for this poor Gaspard.

I have left myself practically no space to speak of Verlaine's achievement as a poet, but there is less need for that, as his work has been described in these columns quite recently.

It will be enough to say that there is no more beautiful poetry in French. Verlaine's name will be coupled with Villon's in the future as a writer of the best French lyrics. His religious poems deserve perhaps still higher place. He is the greatest Christian singer since Dante, and his passionate sincerity of feeling brought new effects into French poetry. There is a childlike directness and simplicity in his best verse which is very rare, and he uses repetition with extraordinary impressiveness:—

Vous connaissez tout cela, tout cela,
Et que je suis plus pauvre que personne,
Vous connaissez tout cela, tout cela,
Mais ce que j'ai, mon Dieu, je vous le donne.

TOWN DRAMA

By a happy chance a very genuine pleasure has just fallen to our lot. Letchworth is not a town unknown in the modern annals of England. It has sought to set up a modern Athens of culture and liberty in our midst; and it must be confessed that it has hitherto shared the fate of all such laubable efforts, for it has become indissolubly associated in the mind with a collection of cranks and faddists. But it is vindicating its title to Athenian respect, for it is raising up a town drama to itself. A fact such as this, in a day when matters dramatical are causing infinite searchings of heart, to say nothing of stirrings of strife, in all forward and earnest minds, is in itself sufficient to attract attention. But when in addition to this we find such a drama created not only by the minds of the town, but occupied with the concerns of the town, then the whole situation becomes singularly arrestive.

In fact, this is the important matter. That in the four years of its existence the Letchworth Dramatic Society should have acted plays by Shaw, Galsworthy, and Yeats raises it to no higher level than that of innumerable amateur dramatic societies in England; but that it should create its own original work, and that this original work should be occupied with Letchworthian matters, is by way of being a rare distinction. It is even more than this: it holds out a clue to the most difficult problem that faces the drama of to-day. It prompts thinking of a curiously fascinating order.

The particular play that we saw on the evening of the 22nd was called on the programme a pantomime. In fact, it was miscalled so; for it was a satire of a very remarkable nature. Not being imbued with the local spirit, we could not always catch the local allusions; but we felt them. It was like reading a play of Aristophanes, when we can feel the blows going home, though we cannot wholly understand their nature. In fact, this allusion to Aristophanes is more than appropriate, for the thought of him was irresistible. It scarcely needed the kindly voice at our ear to point out the allusions or to elucidate the satire as it went forward. There was the local Imperialist and Anti-Socialist in the audience convulsed with laughter as he surveyed himself on the stage, got-up to the last point of physical resemblance, thumping his well-known points in his best of manners:—"I've knocked about the world a bit, and I've read some history. Oh, yes! I know a thing or two!"—and all his other favourite tags, there they were, faithfully reproduced to exaggeration. There, too, was the Socialist who voted Liberal; there was the dramatic zealot (to whose zest the Society was and is due) caricaturing the musical zealot; and he himself caricatured by another. There was the local estate agent, with his languid domination over the affairs of the township; and there, too, a name well known to the publishing world, caricaturing the Man from Hitchin—Hitchin being Letchworth's Philistia! It was acutely funny; but it was far more than this. It was so sane; it was so admirably healthy. It was as though, the whole time, one saw Meredith's sly faun shedding its silvery laughter over the township, illuminating and displaying all pomposities and frailties. If Letchworth be a town of cranks, they are at least very healthy cranks since they can afford to laugh at themselves. Such a thing in London would convulse London with libel suits, and suspend all the avenues of business; whereas in Letchworth the satirised positively assisted the various "make-ups."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It was drama of an extraordinary nature. Naturally the plot of the satire was not elaborate. (Neither, for that matter, was Aristophanes a lover of elaborate plot!) Yet it was well written; and if the lyrics by Mr. Purdom were but echoes of Gilbert, Mr. Lee's music was sufficiently individual to outweigh the likeness. The music for some of the songs and one of the dances was quite excellent; the acting had often a fine gusto. But the chief interest was much deeper than this. For we cannot but remember that the spacious days of Elizabethan drama were preceded and produced by the York, Chester, and Coventry cycles. And it is surely obvious that if we are to have any dramatic revival, as so many believe, and so many more hope, such a revival cannot by any chance come from the effete and sophisticated stage-pieces that one sees so much of in the West-end of London! Historic precedent itself supports the contention. For it was a local spirit that produced the Athenian drama; it was a local spirit that led to the Elizabethan drama; it was a local spirit that produced Synge and the Dublin school; and despite all set-backs, it was not till Wagner turned from the great cities to Bayreuth that he got on the way to success. As we left the local hall in which the play was presented, a pamphlet was handed to us entitled "A Proposal for a Town's Theatre at Letchworth Garden City, by C. B. Purdom." Mr. Purdom, it appears, is the originator of the movement. Such a proposal deserves to succeed as few modern dramatic proposals do.

So fascinating is this question that it raises a further matter. It helps toward unriddling the great difficulty of the matter of drama. For while drama is merely analytical it has little more interest for the healthy mind than have ponderous blue-books. Even Galsworthy's analysis of social problems never comes close home to us. Poor Falder becomes like an insignificant fly on an inscrutable wheel; and, whereas the play in which he appears should be purgative and healthy in its effect, in point of fact it leaves us obsessed with a terrible feeling of helplessness, if not with an actual distaste. But here is a kind of drama that cuts away unhealthiness with the rare knife of laughter. In Athens there was but pure tragedy and pure satire (their comedy being truly only satire); and both were purgative; one by the effect of terror, the other by laughter. Moreover, both soar: whereas modern drama is pedestrian. Thus Letchworth need only produce, naturally and fitly produce, tragedy, and then she will lead the way towards a development that will be profoundly interesting. It is difficult to say what the possibilities may or may not be. Certainly the potentialities are there. One remembers Bayreuth.

REVIEWS

SIR WILLIAM BUTLER

Sir William Butler's Autobiography. With Four Portraits in Photogravure and Two Maps. (Constable and Co. 16s. net.)

THE chief interest of this book is to be found naturally in the last three chapters. The South African war, from which not merely the Empire generally but particularly South Africa itself has emerged so satisfactorily, is still an oppressive and vivid memory. The story of Sir William Butler's long life, so busily and faithfully spent in the public service, which closed last June in its seventy-second year, is valuable to us to-day for what he has to say of South Africa during the years 1898 and 1899, when the war broke out. He was on the spot, he knew the country, he strongly sympathised with the Dutch whilst under orders from the English Government at home, and when the events of that short time were about to culminate in active hostilities, he offered his resignation to the Secretary of State for the Colonies; Mr. Chamberlain promptly accepted by cablegram, and came home. He left South Africa burning from the Cape to the Transvaal with a race-hatred equal to his own private feelings, and his career, in the active sense of the battlefield, was at an end.

He finishes his autobiography at this point, and his daughter adds, in an afterword, the account of his activities from that date to his peaceful end. He died full of honours as of years; G.C.B., and a Privy Councillor of Ireland. But, most important of all to him, a man of the highest personal honour, he lived to see himself fully vindicated by the historian as an ill-used military officer, whose rejected counsels might have saved thousands of lives, millions of treasure, and long months of acute national suffering. It is truly extraordinary how profound was the ignorance of the authorities at home as to the nature of the undertaking of a war in South Africa. We are not now concerned with the policy of the civil authorities which led up to the war, but with the military authorities who conducted it. The question of whether the war could have been averted will always divide the opinions of competent and well-informed men, but the question of whether it was properly conducted will never divide any opinions. The unanimous verdict is that it was a piece of the most dreadful and colossal blundering and bungling of which any country was ever guilty.

Sir William Butler had been in South Africa both in 1875 and 1879. He had just completed his Life of General Colley, and seen it ready for the publisher's hands, when in October, 1898, he, to use his own words—

> Received a cipher telegram at Dover from the War Office, asking if I would accept the command at the Cape rendered vacant by the sudden death of General Goodenough. . . . I accepted the offer, not without reluctance. There were many difficulties inherent to the military position by itself, but in the present case it would be complicated by the new man's having to assume at once upon his arrival the entire civil duties of Governor of the Cape Colony and High Commissioner of South Africa, as Sir Alfred Milner had already left Cape Town for England upon leave of absence.

Here was the tragedy. For the military office it is doubtful if a man more suited could have been found; for the civil, one less suited.

For Sir Wm. Butler was a passionate Nationalist, yet a man who had played no small part in building up an Empire whose administration from home he frequently disapproved; full of ideas of government that do not belong to present-day conditions; and, above all, of Irish emotions that are inimical to the bold, hard statecraft so needed in Empire-building. Of all the sad things of that sad time the fact that he should have been where he was at such an hour is perhaps the saddest.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

His valour and genuine ability as a military commander were never in any doubt. As his daughter tells us, "In the midst of the initial disasters of October and November, 1899, he offered to go out 'in any capacity' to do what he could to help to retrieve the Empire's losses." The offer was not accepted, but in 1905 he paid an unofficial visit to South Africa, when one of the Boer Generals who had given us the greatest trouble during the war greeted him with the bluff compliment, "It was lucky for us, General, that you were not against us in the field." It is certain that he might have spared us many humiliations and defeats.

Sir William Butler could never see his military duties in a dry and technical light. When, in 1905, he was made President of the War Office Committee appointed to inquire into the "War Stores Scandals," he published a report which conveyed its disquieting revelations in picturesque phraseology and forceful language, lit by Irish humour, such as one does not by any means associate with official documents; for he had that thing called temperament in so great a degree that, his abilities notwithstanding, there were certain things he could not do. He could not settle down to the mere activities of military operations leaving all questions of the policy behind him as not for his consideration. Had he been able to do so he might have remained in South Africa as Commander-in-Chief, and by the exercise of his unique knowledge of the country and his long experience, won for himself a place on the permanent roll of the Empire's greatest soldiers. But no, he was temperament first and all the time. He believed that at the back of the British policy was the dictation of cosmopolitan financiers of the most unscrupulous order, and that it was his business to oppose that policy as far as lay in his power. For that reason he came home. It was an impossible position for him to be diverting his energies and his brains by concerning himself with the Imperial policy at the back of the whole business, when all he was required to do was to give his advice on the military position which it was foreseen must arise out of that policy. But let the dead bury their dead. There is little profit in pursuing the point further.

Of the book as a whole let us hasten to say that it is written in a charming and fascinating style. There have not been many soldiers in the British Army who have wielded so facile a pen to depict the scenes and views of such a busy, long, and travelled life. His was a noble nature, and, although the glory of his earthly crown was not perhaps so great as it might have been, after all we poor humans do not know it all. He was a valiant soldier, who scorned wrong, fought always for his conscience and the right; and who knows but that the highest service to mankind is rendered without the world's acknowledgment?

IN CLUBLAND

London Clubs: their History and Treasures. By RALPH NEVILL. Illustrated. (Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.)

MANY books have been written about clubs and club-life, and more may be written, but it will be difficult to beat Mr. Nevill's work in interest and fulness of anecdote. He gives plenty of facts without overloading them, and records many amusing incidents, some of which will be recognised as having appeared elsewhere. Club-life has changed, and further developments may be expected in the shape of the provision of additional luxuries, but more palatial buildings than those already in existence can hardly be required in any number. As the author says, the evolution of the modern club has been so simple that it can easily be traced. It had its origin in the tavern and coffee-house of an age long past. This particular appellation is said to have come into use when coffee-houses began to be popular; in the early part of the eighteenth century there were no fewer than two thousand of them in London. When special rooms were set aside at the coffee-houses for particular members the next stage to exclusive clubs was easily reached. But whereas the spirit of sociability and genial intercourse was formerly the object of the earlier clubs, the modern tendency is, as Mr. Nevill says, more towards comfort and efficient management than anything else. "In most large modern clubs quite a number of members are totally unknown to their fellows, and there is no reason why a member should speak to any one at all unless he wishes to do so. The majority of the modern clubs are in reality merely comfortable caravanserais—hotels receiving a certain number of selected visitors who recognise no social obligations within the club walls except such as regulate ordinary civilised behaviour." Many members, it is believed, regard their clubs as havens "where the women cease from troubling and the weary are at rest;" and possibly the members of ladies' clubs have something equally apposite to observe.

The names of some of the old places of meeting are famous in literature. The "Cheshire Cheese" still survives. Mr. Nevill tells the story how Ben Jonson, a frequent visitor, here disputed with Sylvester as to which of them could make the best couplet in the shortest time. The latter offered his: "I, Sylvester, kiss'd your sister;" to which the former retorted, "I, Ben Jonson, kiss'd your wife." "But that's not rhyme," said Sylvester." "No," said Jonson, "but it's true." Nearly every literary man had his favourite coffee-house, and the conversation varied according to the locality. The West-end coffee-houses were often disturbed by the eccentricities of the "dashing bucks who attempted either to dominate or to upset the domination of others." The Bold Bucks, the Hell-Fires, the Mohawks were a terror and pest of society. The "George and Vulture" was the first coffee-house where coffee was sold to the public in England: "In later times Charles Dickens immortalised the 'George and Vulture' by making it an abode of Mr. Pickwick and Sam Weller." Many taverns were the meeting-places of "mug-house clubs," where nothing was drunk but ale, and every gentleman had his separate mug, which he chalked on the table where he sat as it was brought in. Wills' Coffee-house, known as the "Wits'," was made their resort first by Dryden. The young beaux thought it a great honour to have a pinch out of Dryden's snuff-box. Dean Swift framed the rules of the "Brothers' Club," and formed the "Scriblerus Club." At another place he was known as "the mad parson." One evening he went up to a country gentleman, and very abruptly asked him: "Pray, sir, do you know any good weather in the world?" The gentleman stared a little at Swift's singular manner and odd question, and said: "Yes, sir, I thank God I remember a great deal of good weather in my time." "That is more," replied Swift, "than I can say. I never remember any weather that was not too hot or too cold, too wet or too dry; but, however God Almighty contrives it, at the end of the year 'tis all very well."

There have been many clubs with curious names, such as the "Lying Club," "for which untruthfulness was supposed to be an indispensable qualification," the "Odd Fellows," the "Humbugs," the "Society of Pilgrims," the "Blue Stocking Club," the "Golden Fleece Club," the members of which assumed fancy names, the "Everlasting," which "professed to go on for ever, its doors being kept open night and day throughout the year, whilst the members were divided into watches, like sailors at sea." There is much that is interesting of such famous clubs as the "Beefsteaks," "Old and Slow," "Arthur's," "Boodle's," "White's," "Brooks's," which were always full of the leading men of the day:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> Dr. Johnson was probably the most staunch defender of clubs who ever lived; his reply to somebody who was rather inclined to decry such institutions is historic. A gentleman venturing one day to say to the learned Doctor that he sometimes wondered at his condescending to attend a club, the latter replied: "Sir, the great chair of a full and pleasant town club is, perhaps, the throne of human felicity."

The writer has collected a quantity of information about club management, in respect of elections to membership, committees, rules and regulations, and on such matters as smoking, blackballing, cooking, fines, cards, which will be of practical use to any one concerned with the charge of such institutions. Smoking was at one time a question which frequently created much excitement, but smokers have now generally had their desires satisfied, under certain liberal restrictions. At "White's" once a general meeting was held to deal with the question, when a number of old members who had not been in the club for years attended, having been whipped up to resist the innovation. "Where do all these old fossils come from?" was asked. "From Kensal Green," was the reply. "Their hearses, I understand, are waiting to take them back there." As regards the admission of ladies, the story is told that at a certain military club a member once brought his wife to dine, and defied the authorities by asking for the rules, in which he triumphantly pointed out that there was no stipulation as to sex.

Blackballing was at one time excessive at some clubs. "We must pill that man, it will do him good," some one would say. "We really cannot have that fellow, I saw him wearing a black tie in the evening," said another. A case is quoted of the "Athenæum" where as many as ninety-three black balls were once allotted to an unpopular candidate. "But the greatest instance of blackballing probably ever known took place some years ago at a ladies' club, where one candidate received three more black balls than the number of members present." There are many anecdotes of gambling and card-playing, and of the large sums of money which changed hands, especially at "Crockford's." One gentleman, who declared that, next to winning, losing was the greatest pleasure in the world, is supposed once to have lost £35,000. At "White's" Sir John Malcolm once lost £30,000. This last gentleman was the first chairman of the "Oriental," and a very popular figure in Society. A great talker, he was nicknamed "Bahawder Jaw," it was said, by Canning. There were ten Malcolm brothers, two of them Admirals. All ten seem to have possessed the same characteristic. When Lord Wellesley was assured by Sir John that he and three brothers had once met together in India, the Governor-General declared it to be "impossible, quite impossible." Malcolm repeated his statement. "I repeat it is impossible; if four Malcolms had come together, we should have heard the noise all over India." Such anecdotes could easily be multiplied: we have said enough, perhaps, to recommend this book, which we have found entertaining, instructive, and brightly written.

"TANT VAUT L'HOMME, TANT VAUT LA TERRE"

Land Problems and National Welfare. By CHRISTOPHER TURNOR. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. VISCOUNT MILNER. (John Lane. 7s. 6d. net.)

IN these hurrying times, when the social and economic problems are being rendered more complex and difficult of solution with the passage of every day, when sentiment is imported into science, when political passion thrusts truth and reason from the platform, it is indeed time that some clear voice was heard bidding deft hands to disentangle the knots in which centuries of prejudice still leave us enmeshed. Meantime, we should welcome the critic who has the moral courage to acknowledge the merits of his opponents and to censure the demerits and stumblings of those among his own political creed. Mr. Christopher Turnor, in the work before us, not only deserves, but commands, such a recognition. He shows himself to be an anxious and zealous searcher after truth. He has put together a mass of valuable facts, garnered for the most part from personal knowledge; but he does not pose as having solved any of the grave problems which confront us. He has not attempted to devise any distinct itinerary which would serve to switch the baffled landlord, tenant, or farm-labourer on to a less circuitous road. He shows himself, however, to be a good counsellor and guide in the many by-paths which antiquated prejudice and modern legislation have been constantly making more difficult. The main point is that the author shows himself to be sincere and just, and to have the interests of his fellow-workers at heart. And, reading him as one who desires progress, and as one who would welcome criticism aiming at truth, we deal with a few points which seem at present to stand in his way.

In the first place, in treating such a vital question as the Land Problem, here and abroad, and in comparing British and foreign methods of work, division of property, characteristics of race, and a score of other factors, it is palpably an error to assign a different form of political economy to different countries. The economic laws must remain the same, like the principles of Euclid; and to say that in France political economy differs from political economy in these islands is surely akin to saying that the law of gravitation does not hold good in the valley in the same measure as at the mountain's peak. If Mr. Turnor had said that the French in their methods in some cases work more in harmony with, or run counter to, the immutable economic laws than is found in certain other communities, we could endorse his statement. The French, and especially the peasantry, are a people who for generations have adapted themselves to a wholesale system of wrong-headed anti-economic legislation. Of this fact innumerable examples could be given. But the most noteworthy of all—and the one that more than any has served to safeguard them from absolute ruin—is represented in the Banquier system, a natural evolution arising from an instinctive spirit of self-protection against governmental financial tyrannies, the supply of inadequate and base coin, and an unconscious and unexplained sense of a great truth—namely, that it is impossible to solve the Land Question unless you solve the capital question. The consequence to these industrious and careful-living people is that they are in the enjoyment of the most natural and prosperity-producing credit and capital-supplying system existing to-day—a system, indeed, which explains the thrift which Mr. Turnor, like so many others, recognises as existing among them, but which is an effect rather than a cause of their success in petite culture. Mr. Turnor alludes to the better financing of farmers in the old days of the country bankers, and rightfully deplores their absorption into the huge Joint Stock Companies. It is a pity that he has not seen his way to elaborate this point, for the alienation of the natural channels connecting capital with land and labour—namely, capital and credit supplying banks—can be readily proved to be the cardinal cause of the astounding changes that have been wrought in agriculture and its contributory industries in England and Scotland—once the foremost farming countries in the world. This truth cannot be better illustrated than through a close study of that very Banquier system which has enabled rural France to stand out conspicuous as the highest example of successful small farming which can be mentioned.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Turnor is evidently aware of the importance of the supply of credit and capital to the workers in agriculture, for he speaks of the necessity of a special machinery for providing loans for the purchase of land, and more than once refers to Credit Banks as a means to that end to act as the tenant's working capital. It seems regrettable that one who, in this interesting volume, proves himself so close an observer should not have devoted a greater attention to this most vital of all the factors in the Land Problem—the financing of production. We suggest this because it is a subject that has been sorely neglected by most writers on agricultural questions and ignored by the majority of our politicians of both Parties. A study of this particular branch would soon convince Mr. Turnor that the State prohibition of such banks as would constitute an adequate supply of capital and credit to farmers is responsible for the condemnation of private ownership, the hundred-and-one patchwork or pseudo-economic enactments, and the sentimental, groundless attacks on unearned increment, the fallacious craze and clamour for land nationalisation at a time when, under the present deplorable absence of capital-supply, the position of the capitalist and of the private owner of land, however enviable from a superficial point of view, can be proved to confer, by a natural solidarity, a great and lasting benefit upon the wage-earners.

There are, of course, many other points that might be amplified. It will, however, suffice to remind those who have Land Reform truly at heart—and Mr. Turnor should be recognised as one of these—that there is no hope of saving the land until our legislators can be persuaded to grapple with first principles and to cease from legislating for every separate result of some great general cause. The enrichment of the State by pillage always has meant, and always will mean, a proportionate impoverishment of the people. History teems with examples. As to attempting to solve the land problem without at the same time solving the capital problem, again history comes to our aid.

"Tant vaut l'homme, tant vaut la terre," one of the most pregnant truths uttered by a great thinker and phraseologist, applies with full force here. If the people have not the sense to see nor the energy and courage to clamour for that economic and financial freedom to which they have a full right, and continue on the road of their present supine resignation to Governmental tamperings and prohibitions in the matter of a rational supply of capital and credit to land and labour, they must expect to have the land snatched from them and to suffer under the worst conceivable landlord—the State—with its army of relentless tax and rent-consuming bureaucrats, and to pass into a nation of slaves.

THE LAST STUART QUEEN

The Last Stuart Queen: Louise Countess of Albany: Her Life and Letters. By HERBERT M. VAUGHAN, F.S.A. Illustrated. (Duckworth and Co. 16s. net.)

THE last Stuart Queen was Louise, Princess of Stolberg-Gedern, wife of the Young Pretender, and in choosing her as his heroine Mr. Vaughan has shown a true instinct for romance. For the life-story of the Countess of Albany, as she was known, is sufficient to supply plots for half-a-dozen novels of passable standard. The wife, and later the widow, of Prince Charles Edward during the course of her long life, she shone in many a circle, and was in close and intimate contact with more than one historical personage. Her biography ought, therefore, to appeal to an especially wide public. To those to whom the adventures and misfortunes of the Stuarts are still a living interest this account of the career of the wife of the Young Pretender, and incidentally of the Young Pretender himself and also of the Cardinal of York, should prove eager reading. Admirers of the Count Vittorio Alfieri will be grateful to Mr. Vaughan for the considerable light which he has thrown in his pages on the greater part of the life of that distinguished poet. Students of the social life, both on the Continent and in this country, during the era of the French Revolution will welcome Mr. Vaughan's work with eagerness: and even admirers of Napoleon I. will find in his pages an occasional glimpse of their demi-god. Above all, the far larger public who have no particular interests to serve in their reading, but are prepared to take up any book which gives promise of being interesting, no matter its subject, will find a volume of entrancing and unabated interest and pleasure in the biography which Mr. Vaughan has prepared for them.

With the Princess as heroine, although Mr. Vaughan gives no exaggerated account of her charms and virtues—most sedate and impartial is he in describing the Countess of Albany, and no one can with justice criticise him with having twisted history to the advantage of the lady of whom he writes—one can hardly expect an over-coloured account of the Prince to whom she was tied as prisoner for the best twelve years of her life. At the time of his marriage he had well passed his youth. Failure, disappointment, and weakness had all left their marks upon him, and those who had acclaimed him a generation earlier as the Bonnie Prince Charlie would have been sore disappointed if they had met him again in middle-age. Thus Prince Charles Edward is depicted in this book in no attractive colours. Alfieri, the supplanter in the affections of the Princess—if ever the husband possessed his wife's affections—also appears as a villain rather than as a hero:—

> We are therefore compelled to believe that for three years Alfieri was enjoying the hospitality of a home that he was setting himself to wreck in a most selfish, deceitful, and altogether detestable method, a fact which must carry a sense of contempt and indignation against this man who had set himself up to teach his countrymen the means of moral and political redemption, and yet was the actual and unabashed author of so cold-blooded an act of treachery.

With regard to the Countess's behaviour in this affair Mr. Vaughan is not so indignant. He seems to hesitate much concerning her guilt, at any rate during the earlier period of the intrigue, and he quotes Sir Horace Mann, the British Minister, in particular, in order to repel any charge which might be made against her. Certainly no excuse is necessary for her action when she did finally flee from her husband's roof, and her behaviour during the period which immediately succeeded that flight was in every respect beyond reproach. The Princess settled in Rome under the protection of her brother-in-law, the Cardinal of York:—

> Here then in the dismal old palace we leave Charles Edward Stuart on the verge of his sixtieth birthday, deprived of his wife, wounded in his honour and his personal pride, a prey to the demon of "the nasty bottle," despised by his very servants, and feeling acutely his ignoble position as the merest of political ciphers in the eyes of the Pope and the Sovereign of Tuscany.

To the kindness and goodness of the Cardinal of York the Countess owed very much in these subsequent years, and it is painful to see how ungratefully she requited them. The Cardinal long survived his power and prosperity, and died at last a weary old man, shorn of most of the comforts to which he had been accustomed. But to the end of his life he apparently never lost his affection or consideration for his sister-in-law, for he even remembered her in his last testament. She on her part, when she thought that there was nothing more to be gained from the relationship, did not trouble to refrain from slandering and abusing her former benefactor, and some of her letters on this account make unpleasant reading.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A curious episode in the career of the Countess of Albany was her visit to England and her presentation at the Court of the usurper, George III. This moral abdication on her part gave rise to considerable gossip and mild amusement in society, and the most entertaining comment on the whole of the proceedings is preserved in the letters of Horace Walpole, from which Mr. Vaughan quotes at length. To make the whole affair the more surprising, this courting of the Hanoverians must have been planned and pursued with the concurrence of Alfieri, "that professional hater of kings and queens," to whom the Princess was now permanently, although not legally, allied. So surprising is the whole affair that Mr. Vaughan suggests that there must have been some ulterior motive. He is almost certainly right, and the anxiety to obtain a British pension must have been the cause of the Princess's appearance, and illustrates, as it were, the Hanoverian victory. The Princess and her companion made a tour of the country at this time, and in a diary which she kept and subsequently published a not uninteresting account is given of social life in England a century and a quarter ago.

No pains have been spared to make the book attractive in every sense. The narrative, as the foregoing notice will show, is interesting and brightly written. The paper, print, and binding are all that can desired. To crown all, the volume is embellished by twelve beautiful illustrations, which combine to make it a joy as well as a pleasure.

THE NAGAS OF MANIPUR

The Naga Tribes of Manipur. By T. C. Hodson. Illustrated. (Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.)

Just twenty years ago the small protected State of Manipur, situated between Assam and Upper Burma, came into temporary and unfavourable prominence. It will be remembered that, after a period of anarchy in the State, the Government of India took steps to remove the cause of the disturbance and to restore order. But by gross mismanagement the arrangements failed; the Chief Commissioner and four officers were treacherously murdered. An expedition was sent to Manipur to reassert the political supremacy of the British Government, suitable punishments were inflicted, and the State was taken under British administration. It has since been restored to native rule. The area is under 8,500 square miles, the population under 300,000. The features of the Manipuris show them to be descended from the Indo-Chinese stock; their language resembles that of the Kuki tribes on the south. It is with the Naga tribes who inhabit this State that this book deals, not with the other Nagas, such as the Angamis, Kachas, Rengmas, Semas, and Lhotas, who have been included within Assam. These Nagas have their own history, which tells of their slow reclamation from barbarism, and of the murders of several political officers, Holcombe, Butler, and Damant, in past times.

Mr. Hodson was formerly Assistant Political Agent and Superintendent of Manipur, and is a Fellow of the Royal Anthropological Institute, and Member of the Folklore Society. His volume is a description of the ethnology of the hill-tribes within the limited area of the Manipur State, so that the reader must not expect a general treatise on all the hill-tribes of India. The material was collected ten years ago, and some of it has already been published. The accuracy of the information may provisionally be presumed, but civilian officers are not always sufficiently acquainted with the vernaculars to be able to elicit the facts from timid natives who misunderstand their object, and native subordinates cannot altogether be trusted, as they are wont to supply only the information which they believe will be acceptable. There is no finality in ethnological studies. But Mr. Hodson has had his manuscript checked by an expert, Lieut.-Colonel Shakespear, and if he has really studied all the authorities cited he has equipped himself with preparatory knowledge cognate to his contribution. He has divided his book into sections dealing with general characteristics: Domestic Life, Laws and Customs, Religion and Folk Tales.

The Naga tribes in Manipur are seven, of which the Tangkhuls, Mao and Marami Nagas, and Kabuis appear to be the largest. "The common feature in all the legends about their origin is the absence of any claim to be the original inhabitants of the country they now occupy." Mr. Hodson considers that they were settled at an early date in their present areas. His conclusion appears probably correct that all the legends are ætiological, invented to explain a state of affairs which was recognised as needing some sort of an explanation. Expansion and quarrels between neighbours may have caused tribal movements of which no record is available.

Like all semi-civilised peoples these Nagas—a term said to be derived from the Assamese Noga, applied to hill-tribes—have their own ideas about births, deaths, the future state, spirits, marriage (based upon exogamy), animal-life, omens, dreams, superstitions of all sorts. The tribes all bury, not burn, their dead, not always inside the village, or in the usual burying-place. The heads of enemies killed in a head-hunting raid are exposed in trees outside the villages. In the graves are placed various articles for the use and comfort of the deceased in the world hereafter: if a man dies, for instance, of tiger-bite, they put a bugle in his grave to scare away the tigers on the road to heaven. The something that leaves the body at death is often regarded as a winged insect of some kind, now a butterfly, now a bee. In order to allow the insect to escape a hole is made in the roof directly above the bed of the deceased. Their popular beliefs are many and various, too numerous to quote. On one occasion they decided that the strangest thing the British had brought within their ken was coined money: its uniformity was the special feature of interest.

The determining factor of the family, the clan, and the village is religious. Strange-shaped stones, which they worship, are often pointed out as places where a deity is wont to dwell. The creation of the world is ascribed to the deity who causes earthquakes. The Tangkhuls approach their deity, the eldest son of the creator, in trouble or sickness. The village headman is the Khullakpa, vested with considerable dignity and importance, with special tabus designed to maintain efficiency. He is also called the gennabura. This genna dominates their lives. It is "a temporary disturbance of the normal course of life." It means, simply, forbidden or prohibited, and is applied to the mass of prohibitions, permanent and temporary, periodic and occasional, which form a great part of the tribal law. "All the rites and festivals observed by social units in this area are characterised by a prohibition of the normal relations with other social units, so that the term has come to be applied to all occasions and festivals at and by which the social unit concerned consolidates and concentrates itself." These gennas thus affect all the various social units. Mr. Hodson's conclusion is that the life of these small communities may not unfairly be described as "nasty, dull and brutish." Their beliefs, practices, and customs show that their civilisation is still very backward. This could easily be proved, but this brief notice must come to a close. Mr. Hodson's book will be valued by all students of ethnology, folklore, and savage life, but the subject is too technical to attract the general reader. The map furnished is on too small a scale to be really useful; the illustrations are so good that more would have been welcome.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

NEAPOLITAN ART

Geschichte der Malerei Neapels. By WILHELM ROLFS. (E. A. Seemann, Leipzig. 25m.)

IN this history of the art treasures of Naples Herr Rolfs breaks up ground which is by no means virgin soil, having been sown already with more than one lusty crop of critical weeds. No city in Italy, he assures us, has been so exploited by the forger and the literary charlatan. Bernardo de Domenici—"one of those innumerable mediocre painters (half-artist, half-dauber) who, in the eighteenth century, covered the walls of the countless restored churches of Naples with their bungling work"—is the chief offender, and seems to have shown in his roguery an ingenuity and zeal unparalleled:—

> Long and laborious was his task, and, for once, one may believe the forger when he says that he spent seventeen years on it. The "Vite dei Pittore, Scultori ed Architetti Napoletani" appeared in three great volumes in 1742-3, and with it begins the fraudulent art research which has lasted to the present day—so skilful is his method, so assured are his statements, so cunningly does the man contrive to hoodwink even the coolest investigator.

Not the least interesting part of Herr Rolfs' book is the decision with which the author lays bare the impostures of this Domenici and the wanderings in critical darkness of his dupes.

The difficulties which await the student of Neapolitan art are immense. Restoration has been destructively busy in the churches, and it is hard to read calmly of ancient frescoes stripped, as though they were cheap wallpaper, from the walls of sacred buildings and scattered on the ground among débris of stones and mortar. The civic rage for "improvement" seems to have swept many churches bodily away, the names of the patronal saints change, the information of local guides varies amiably according to the size of prospective tips—in short, Herr Rolfs wins our admiration for the enthusiastic persistence and the painstaking thoroughness with which he has worked his way to daylight through this forest of hindrances.

From first to last the outstanding point which forcibly strikes the student is the dependence of art in Naples on inspiration and energy drawn from outside the borders of the bayside city:—

> The soil of Naples, rich in fiery talent, but lacking that creative genius dependent on unbending will-power and persistent endeavour, which alone is able to produce an epoch-making work, fell into sterile decay when no more nourishment was poured into her from outside.

From Peter Kavallini, who brought to the gay, insouciant spirit of local painting something of the strenuous earnestness of Roman art, and directed from 1308 and onwards the labours of a host of satellite pupils who decorated the walls of the church of Donna Regina, to Solimena, the flattered darling among painters of the early eighteenth century, whose followers allowed the torch of art in Naples, so long kept alight by friendly alien hands, to go out in spluttering ineptitude, the masters of Naples were such men as Solario the Venetian, the Spaniard Ribera, and Salvator Rosa, of whom Naples can claim scarcely more than the fact that his cradle stood in the suburb of Arencalla; his art belongs entirely to Rome and Florence.

Herr Rolfs' style is clear and succinct when he criticises and investigates, tinged, when he describes a picture or wall decoration, with a warmth and colour which witness vividly to his connoisseurship. Accompanying the work are 137 plates and an excellent Index. The book bears a dedication to H.R.H. Princess Beatrice of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha on the occasion of her recent marriage.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Siren Land. By NORMAN DOUGLAS. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s. net.)

WE are reminded by a perusal of this pleasant little book of an April day; now smiles, now tears: happily, the smiles preponderate. It would require a Mrs. Mountstuart Jenkinson to sum up its qualities in a single phrase, and, maybe, that phrase would not be completely complimentary to the author. Be that as it may; in spite of its prevailing tone of flippant dilettantism, it contains a goodly number of hidden gems of philosophic truth. The author is at his best when engaged in a subtle pourtrayal of the contrast between Hellenic Idealism and mediæval mysticism. Incidentally the Sirens are the very flimsiest of pretexts for the weaving of this pleasant web of facts and fancies concerning most things in Heaven and Earth, to say nothing of the nether regions. All this is, no doubt, quite what it should be, for, after all, what were the Sirens?—

> What not indeed? The Sirens, says one, are the charms of the Gulf of Naples. No, says another; they were chaste priestesses. They were neither chaste, nor priestesses, but exactly the reverse. They were sunbeams. They were perilous cliffs. They were a race of peaceful shepherds. They were symbols of persuasion. They were cannibals. They were planetary spirits. They were prophets. They were a species of Oriental owl. They were the harmonious faculties of the soul. They were penguins.
>
> Penguins! That is the final pronouncement of commentatorial erudition.

Personally, we do not think the wise Odysseus would have put himself to quite so much trouble for the sake of mere penguins. The Emperor Tiberius apparently once said, in connection with the trial of a man for insulting the divinity of the deceased Augustus, "deorum injurias deis curae"—the gods can look after their own wrongs. Very wise and very true, no doubt; but, all the same, we are glad to find Mr. Douglas assisting in the good cause of vindicating the outraged memory of that great man and Emperor, Tiberius himself.

Whatever may be his views of monarchs of a bygone age, the author takes no pains to conceal his contempt for modern sovereigns, "whose chief occupation—to judge by the newspapers at least—consists in 'swopping' uniforms, rushing about the Continent in special trains, and hanging ribbons and decorations round each other's necks." His admiration of Tiberius leads him to hatch the pithy apothegm, "Our rulers never retire from the cares of government: they never feel them."

And so from Tiberius and zuppa di pesce—from which, if that concoction be such as the author represents it to be, may heavenly powers defend us—we pass, by a natural transition to sister Serafina, who, we agree, certainly deserves to have a good time in an after-life if she is to be compensated for her self-inflicted sufferings in this. Your mediæval saint is not a pleasing picture. To the author's mind it calls up the fair image of the ancient Greeks, to whom "the human frame was a subtle instrument, to be kept lovingly in tune with the loud-voiced melodies of earth and sky and sea; these were their realities; as for a life beyond, let the gods see to it—a shadowy, half-hearted business at best."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

If any one of our readers is of a pragmatical turn of mind, let him carefully avoid the footnote on page 192, which concerns pragmatism. After all, pragmatism is not the sole interest in life, and he must indeed be hard to please who cannot find something to his taste in "Siren Land."

The Temple of Life: An Outline of the True Mission of Art. By Ernest Newlandsmith. (Longmans, Green and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

The idealist, when his ideals take the bit in their teeth and run away with him (if we may be permitted so earthly a metaphor), is apt to appear to the ordinary man as a prophet on the mountain-top, irradiated himself with some private sunlight of his own, grumbling at the fog and shadow below; in short, a most unpractical person. Despite the author's evident sincerity, the majority of readers will gather this or a similar impression from "The Temple of Life." To Mr. Newlandsmith all the arts have a Divine mission. "It is the duty of Science," he says, "to give men that true thought of which the culmination is Divine Wisdom; and it is the duty of Art to give men that true feeling of which the consummation is Divine Love." Again, he writes:—

> What we now need is not a society for the cultivation of this or that kind of Science or Art (we have any number of these), but a society or national movement that will aim at bringing Science and Art under the driving-power or yoke of true religion—i.e., the love of God. . . .
>
> In considering the value of a work of art in its relation to the welfare of mankind, the critic we require is a man who judges things from the Divine standpoint, from the inner consciousness of God. Absurd as it may seem to some people, such a man will know what is meant by "a virtuous coat" or a "benevolent stone."

We confess that this does seem to us to go perilously near to absurdity. The author's point of view will be sufficiently clear from the above quotations. Where he seems to fail is in his disregard of the fact that the true artist cannot help himself—he must express himself in his chosen medium, whether it be music or painting, sculpture or literature. "It is terrible to witness artists," we are told, "who, being attacked with various 'moods,' strive to depict these moods on canvas, or on paper, or in sounds, quite callous as to whether the said moods are healthy or elevating." It is not quite so terrible an affair as Mr. Newlandsmith imagines; let him rest more comfortably. Though, as an extremist, we doubt if he will rest.

It would be ungracious to cavil at all the contents of this little volume, for in his more moderate moments the author pens many suggestive and illuminating sentences. He pleads for a return to simpler music, "calculated to awaken in men's hearts simple, clear and true emotions." He takes the view that the present complex state of the various arts is the prelude to a revival of earlier forms. There is much truth in this. Extremes bring reactions, inevitably; but the forced note sometimes spoils a pleasant page—as when we read that "Modern Art is not a healing Art. On the contrary, it is permeated with vanity and death."

The book concludes with a vision of London, a city renewed, beautified, where all things are done "to the glory of God." A beautiful vision; but alas! how infinitely far from realisation!

El Greco en Toledo, ó nuevas investigaciones acerca de la vida y obras de Dominico Theotocópuli. By F. de Borja de San Román y Fernández. (Librería General de Victoriano Suárez, Madrid.)

Dominico Theotocópuli, or "the Greek," as he was called, was born on the island of Crete. He was a follower of Tiziano, founded the school of Toledo, and died in that town in the year 1614.

The book under review is a study of the life and works of the painter, and is the result of the fresh investigations of the author, and the discovery by him of certain documents in the archives of Toledo. By the courtesy of the keeper of the records the author was enabled to examine these documents, and, after personally devoting months to the careful study of the legal writings and contending with the deficiencies of the ancient registers, he brings new material and fresh light to enable us to unravel the mysteries of the life and work of "the Greek."

Until comparatively recently little has been known of this painter, from whose works even Velásquez is said to have obtained inspiration, for the writers of his day, with the exception of the two poets Góngora and Paravicino, have left nothing on record regarding him. Paravicino has written of him, "Creta le dió la vida, y los pinceles Toledo." (Crete gave him life, and Toledo the pencil.)

Within the last century, however, interest has been shown in the works of Dominico Theotocópuli, and many books relating to Spanish art and architecture give some details, which are more or less reliable, with regard to the painter and his work. M. B. Cossio has recently written two volumes on "the Greek," and the present work contains an introduction by this writer.

The book is not intended to supplant any which have previously been written on the subject, but it may be considered as a valuable addition to these, for the facts collected are reliable and supply new data, whilst they correct certain errors and confirm many doubtful points. It is well and interestingly written, and contains copious notes and numerous references to the documents from which the information has been obtained. It deals minutely with the life, the family and descendants, and the works of "the Greek." We have, for instance, one chapter devoted entirely to the question as to where, in Toledo, the painter lived; and in another the author attempts to locate the exact spot in which his remains were placed. Several diagrams are given, and the signatures of the painter have been photographically reproduced, as also have two pages of the inventory of his goods which exists in the handwriting of his illegitimate son, Jorge Manuel Theotocópuli.

The documents, nearly one hundred in number, upon which the author bases his statements will be found in an appendix. Amongst these is a complete copy of the inventory mentioned above. The documents themselves are somewhat difficult to decipher, as they are faithfully reproduced in the Spanish of the seventeenth century.

Reminiscences and Letters of Joseph and Arnold Toynbee. Edited by Gertrude Toynbee. (H. J. Glaisher. 2s. 6d. net.)

The work of the Toynbee family and its relation to social welfare in London has been dealt with in other books; the present little volume is mainly a record of correspondence between Joseph Toynbee and his family and friends, with a second part devoted to letters of Arnold, his son. As such it is full of humanity and a pleasant, gentle interest. The father, in addition to the keen intellect which won him such distinction in his profession, possessed a childlike, kindly soul, not above recording the simplest pleasures—games in the fields with "a glorious set of true country lads and lasses," or "a walk, listening to the cuckoo and nightingale, through lanes and footpaths, then home to tea and books, &c." But he writes on January 7th, 1861, words which show how deeply ran the current of his thoughts:

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> I only regret that I cannot get my philosophy to rule my heart as well as my brain, but when it does so life's trials will be over. It is of no use growling, but this human life is a dread struggle, and he who pretends that it can be made otherwise is either deceived or deceives. . . . My life seems to be oozing away in one continued attempt to reconcile the unreconcilable, and I accomplish nothing; yet doubtless it is well, and I bow in trust and hope.

There are some delightful letters noting simple incidents of travel in France and Belgium, Germany and Switzerland, and a charming little note to his father and mother expressing Joseph Toynbee's pleasure at being called in to see the Queen (Victoria) at Osborne, "on account of deafness and noises in the head," which he was able to cure in half an hour. Other letters from Ruskin, Michael Faraday, George Cruikshank, Dr. Jowett, and many well-known men are included, and add to the interest of the volume.

The second part contains the correspondence of Arnold Toynbee, who died just when he was beginning to do great things, at the age of thirty-one; and perhaps the best pages are those reproducing a letter from James Hinton, discussing various complex problems of life. The general appeal of the book may not be wide, but those who value the revelation of two fine characters, gentlemanly in the best sense of the word, will do well to spend a quiet hour in studying it.

"Pie-Powder," being Dust from the Law-Courts, Collected and Recollected on the Western Circuit. By A Circuit Tramp. (John Murray. 5s. net.)

One whose natural modesty forbade him to place his name upon the title-page has gathered together a charming collection of anecdotes and memories. That the learned and witty author is none other than Mr. Alderson Foote, K.C., is, we believe, an open secret. A good many of these specks of "dust from the law-courts" are, no doubt, familiar to some of us: they are none the less welcome. At the same time, we must confess to an uneasy feeling that a few, at least, of these anecdotes are masquerading in borrowed plumes. We very much hope that Lord Justice Bowen laid no claim to the authorship of that ancient similitude of the blind man in the dark room looking for the black hat which is not there. However, good stories do not spoil by a little honest plagiarism now and again. The author succeeds in shedding a pathetic sunset glow over the dying circuit system, which must not, however, be allowed to blind us to the expense and cumbersomeness, the waste of valuable judicial time, and the train of attendant evils which are characteristic of that system. However charming it may be for officials, and, with all due deference to the learned author, for popular silks, we are none the less inclined to believe that the litigant and the ratepayer—bless them both—are entitled to some small consideration in the matter. We learn that the Lord Chancellor's County Court Bill will again shortly be before the House. Whatever may be its fate, who knows but what the next decade may see each County Court elevated to the dignity of a species of miniature High Court, and the briefless junior holding briefs marked with figures as yet known only to his dreams: sed haec hactenus?

Is it too much to hope that other leaders of other circuits may be tempted by Mr. Foote's public-spirited efforts to impart to us a few more grains of the golden dust of the law-courts, collected and garnered with the same skill and wit as are displayed in these entertaining pages?

A Tour and a Romance. By Alice E. Robbins. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

The tour here alluded to is in Spain, and the romance, a simple one, is evolved in the course of the tour. Mr. Van Putten, a New York man of business who has daily spent sixteen hours out of the twenty-four in amassing dollars, suddenly discovers that his health has broken down. American fathers are accustomed to do what their children tell them, apart from business matters, and Miss Sadie Van Putten, who has just been attending a course of lectures on Spain, at once decides that the required rest-cure can be best achieved by a tour in that country. Sadie has also at the back of her mind an obiter dictum of the lecturer's: "You American women have been spoilt by the men. You have no ideals, but you have millions of theories. Joanna was nicknamed the Fool, but was she not wiser than the women of the twentieth century, who place culture and money and position before the great primal fact and necessity of life?"—the primal fact and necessity being marriage and home life. Directly she gets out of the atmosphere she has hitherto lived in Sadie finds this doctrine enforced again and again—by an elderly English admirer on board the steamer, by the little courier of nondescript nationality, and by a muddle-headed clergyman's wife she meets in Madrid—so that by the time she meets her destiny in the shape of a not very interesting Englishman she is in a receptive mood. The authoress has used the tour as a peg upon which to hang the romance, and has not made the mistake of attempting to produce an attractive guide-book. She writes pleasantly, and we shall be glad to hear of her again.

The Encyclopædia of Sport. Vol. II. (Heinemann. 10s. 6d. net.)

In December last we had much pleasure in noticing Vol. I. of "The Encyclopædia of Sport." We now have before us the second book of this series, which deals with such recreations as golf, fencing, hunting, &c. There are also several very useful pages devoted to "First Aid," the "Transport of the Injured," and accidents likely to arise from the pursuit of the various sports mentioned. The illustrations are varied and numerous, and the present edition is in every way as good as the companion volume brought out at the latter part of last year.

FICTION

A STREET OF TO-DAY

The Street of To-Day. By John Masefield. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 6s.)

Even when most occupied with the things of sound and sense, Mr. Masefield has always been chiefly concerned with the things that matter. Therefore to express surprise that he whose name recalls tales of the bold buccaneer and the camp-fire should turn his attention to the acute problems of modern city life would be sadly to miss the heart of one of the sincerest artists of to-day. When occupied with tropical forests, his concern has not hitherto been their mere richness of hue, nor their tangled impenetrability. What has won him has been something rare and spiritual. "Little Theo's" wanderings in "Lost Endeavour" was a proof of this. It has ever been the inner essences that have called to him, transmuting wild adventure into something of spiritual interest. To find him, then, occupied, as he is in this book, with a modern problem is only to see him turn from one earnestness to another; from an earnestness remote from modern concerns to an earnestness embedded in modern concerns.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

If the title of the book is cryptic, its sub-title gives us a clue. It runs into this legend:—"By the Streets of To-day Man goes to the House of To-morrow." Yet it is not till one has been caught in the concluding flow of the narrative that one discovers its meaning; and then it is not so much meaning that one sees as an illumination that perplexes and almost awes the mind. The tale is not concerned with The House of To-morrow; it is merely occupied with a vivid, and healthfully painful, depiction of the Street of To-day; yet the way of the street is hinted sufficiently for our minds to work upon its drift; and thus, while the artist cleanses his hand of the reformer's importunity, his achievement is surer and more permanent.

Mr. Masefield preserves his creative detachment. He whom for the lack of a fitter title one must call the hero, Lionel Heseltine, takes the story from the first page to the last, it being woven closely round him; and he is not altogether a lovable character. He wins to sympathy in the end; but he seldom wins to love; he never comes near us. The art of intensely lovable characters seems to have died upon the wind of yesterday. There is a hard mentality about him. We never discover if the misfortune of his marriage is laid by his author on his or his wife's shoulders, though the latter is implied; but the trouble is certainly chiefly his. Just returned from Africa, "doing sleeping sickness," he is caught into the whirl of women. In this opening chapter Mr. Masefield suggests a very wide canvas, the greater part of which he subsequently abandons. Most of the characters in it are never met again; and thus a considerable mental hesitancy is aroused in the mind of the reader which does not altogether aid the confined sharpness of the main narrative. Yet the two women who are mainly to control the destinies of Lionel Heseltine are pricked out sufficiently well for it to be more or less obvious what their lots are to be.

However, not only is Heseltine (coming from lonely camps) quickly impressionable to the company of women, to their beauty, to the excitability aroused by their dresses and perfumes, but he is also eaten with the reformer's zeal. Precisely what he is desirous of achieving is not always easy to discover, but there is no doubt that he is terribly in earnest about it. He is not only in earnest, but is hard and unsympathetic. He seems anxious to reform men, because he hates them rather than because he loves them. This is an important trait in his character, which means much to him later. "It's not a case of love," says he. "I see a dunghill in the street, and I believe that at the bottom of it there may be some building material. When I get to the building material I'll act like a builder. Till then I'll brandish any muckrake that's got good teeth." Though he glows to humanity later, he begins by being a good deal more concerned with reform as a mental activity for an alert brain than as a helping hand put out in love to a warm, common humanity, and in this he is like a good many other reformers whose faces we know in the street of to-day.

Mrs. Drummond, however, has suffered. Her husband is a drunken, decadent author, writing at pleasure to a publisher's bidding. And whereas he bears the ruin of brilliance to a drunkard's grave, she wears a suffering that has burned to strength and splendour in her soul. She seeks to arrest Heseltine to the quality of beauty that reform should wear; but he is impatient with her, irritable even. She might perhaps have had more influence with him had it not been for Rhoda Derrick, the woman on the other side. Rhoda is young, beautiful, and brilliant, in contradistinction to Mrs. Drummond, who is on the far side of maturity. And Lionel Heseltine is sharply susceptible after his nine months in Africa. Therefore Mrs. Drummond's power is decadent, and Rhoda's influence is crescive.

Thus Mrs. Drummond drops out of the tale for a while, and the word of caution she meditates saying when she sees Heseltine becoming absorbed with crude weapons never gets said. Instead of going down to Coln St. Michael to hear her reproof he goes down to Pudsey to woo Rhoda. We cannot be sorry, for the tale of love that gets told at Pudsey will perhaps take its rank with the great things of our literature, with Richard Feverel and Lucy, and with Sandra at Wilming Weir. It not only bears re-reading: it compels re-reading, for it is beautiful exceedingly. It is not the beauty that is given generously with both hands, such as Meredith gave. That is not Mr. Masefield's way. It is finely wrought, carefully balanced; it is chiselled and burnished. But it is something that the mind treasures; and when it is read in the light of the ensuing marriage, the beauty takes a terror to it, like a child's delight by a precipice.

It is not in the social reform which Heseltine undertakes that we are interested; not in the scientific impatience with the primal things of life; not in "Snip-Snap" with its undesirably American method of advertising and hustle; not perhaps even in the entirely more worthy Boys' Brigade. It is the terrible catastrophe of Lionel's marriage with Rhoda that absorbs. In this Mr. Masefield achieves heights that he has never before reached. It is in this whole episode, with its preceding courtship, that the book reaches a greatness that we cannot recall the equal of in contemporary literature. Mr. Masefield is analytical without appearing so. He searches deeply into things. But, let it be said fearlessly, it is not Rhoda who is at fault. Empty she may be, superficially brilliant and thoughtless. But her husband had not made life an art, and therefore could not rise to the rare beauty of loving. He was very active in doing: he did not see that being should precede, even if it seemed entirely to postpone, doing. Like a number of men in the street of to-day, he feared richness of emotion, calling it sentimentality, and therefore became iniquitous. On his very wedding day he was mentally hard and irritable. Therefore he created in her a revulsion, whereas he might have woken rich music out of her had he thought it worth while to do so. And if he did not think it worth while, it is strange to know why he married her. In all this one sees the street of to-day very markedly. And the catastrophe, too, is not uncommon, though there is not often the Mrs. Drummond near at hand to bind up and salve the wound.

It is Mr. Masefield's greatest work this. The construction is somewhat at fault at times, not only in the disproportionateness of the opening, but in the doubtful and temporary introduction of John Dent for no other purpose than to give the sense of time. Its indebtedness in suggestion, derivation, and manner of dialogue to George Meredith is also marked. But it is a book that we shall not easily forget, having read it; it is exalting and purging to the mind; and these are not things that one can say of much that passes for literature in the street of to-day.

DARRELL FIGGIS.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM RESURGENT

The Falling Star. By PHILLIPS OPPENHEIM. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.).

IN describing Phillips Oppenheim as he appears in "The Falling Star" as "resurgent," we use the term comparatively. The novel is undoubtedly an advance as compared with "The Missing Delora." There are no press-gang peers, and consequently it was not necessary to create a head waiter for them to take their meals with as his guest, and with whom to cultivate generally terms of close intimacy. The fault of "The Falling Star" is mainly that it is too long, with the result that conversations which are in no way remarkable for literary grace or verisimilitude, having regard to the persons who engage in them, are repeated almost ad nauseam. The plot is a slight one. A gentleman who is described on page 1 as "obviously a person of breeding and culture" comes upon a poor boy sitting against a rock on his property and dreaming dreams. On page 3 it becomes apparent that the man of "obvious breeding and culture" must indeed be so, because he thus describes himself to the ragged youth whose dreams he has disturbed. "You do not know, my young friend, that I am Henry Prestgate Rochester, Esquire, if you please, High Sheriff of this county, magistrate, and Member of Parliament." How this person of "breeding and culture" describes himself in "Who's Who" is appalling to think of. Mr. Rochester next proceeds to boast of his wealth, and, describing the act he is going to perform as a whim and himself as "more than half a madman," proceeds to tell the boy that if he comes to his house, "Beauleys," on the next day he will give him a sum of money sufficient to keep him for several years. Mr. Rochester, with all his eccentricity, has yet a strain of caution, and he adds: "I do not specify the amount at this moment."

The boy calls, as invited, and Rochester places in his hands the sum of £500, coupled with this advice: "Don't be content with anything less than success." In case of failure, Rochester prescribes for the boy the pleasantest form of suicide, and bids him remember that the men who have failed and who live on are "creatures of the gutter." Hinc illae lachrymae.

The youth Saton disappears for a time to enjoy his unexpected fortune. We next find him, in a tattered condition, looking at the muddy waters of the Thames at Westminster. He has failed, and he remembers Rochester's advice: "If you fail, strip off your clothes, and swim out to sea on a sunny day; swim out until your strength fails, and you must sink." We do not think that Saton at any period of his career had sufficient courage to act upon that advice. After a cursory glance at the Thames, he turns his back and walks away. He then remembers that he stopped some runaway horses in Paris, and earned the gratitude of a most repulsive old hag, called the Comtesse de Vestignes. The Comtesse gave him an address in London where he might go if ever he should come to want. Saton calls upon Madame Helgar, the Comtesse's confidant, and from this point we are introduced into an atmosphere of occultism. This is somewhat exasperating, as we have only just done with Mr. Hichens and soul-transference. Mr. Oppenheim's occultism, however, consists of palmistry, crystal-gazing, and the usual charlatanry. We will not waste time in tracing the descent of Saton into his Avernus. Suffice it to say that he is almost bad enough to justify the spelling of his name in a slightly different manner. Eventually he comes under the influence of a disgusting old professor named Naudheim, a person with the manners of a Carlyle and the clothes of a ragpicker. The characters in the book are mostly negatory. Rochester is a peculiarly unsatisfactory person. Instead of breaking every bone in Saton's body, as he ought to have done in the early stages of the book, he is continually lecturing Saton, addressing him as "my young friend," and threatening him with all forms of dire violence if he ever does certain things again. Saton continues to do them regularly, and incurs nothing worse than another lecture addressed to "my young friend."

There are several silly women, all of whom fall victims to the evil eye of Saton. Saton, in addition to his other accomplishments, is a confirmed blackmailer, and succeeds in extorting £500 from Rochester's wife for the return of a compromising letter which one of his satellites has purloined from the lady. Henry Rochester has always been, and is still, passionately attached to a lady who is meant to be a model of all feminine attributes and virtues, Pauline Marrabel. She is, however, a perfectly futile person. Saton does what he likes with her, and eventually she gives up her life's love to attach herself to the notorious scoundrel and blackmailer who is the hero of the story.

We should like to deal with the book at somewhat greater length, but we have not space to do so. We will simply add that Mr. Oppenheim's novel, without having the slightest pretension to be classed as a work of art, is very readable. It would be far more so, if it had been condensed and one-third of its verbiage eliminated.

CECIL COWPER.

TWO HISTORICAL NOVELS

The Bourgeois Queen of Paris. By JANET M. CLARK. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

The Were-Wolf. By W. B. BEATTIE. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

"FICTION is not always the worst place in which to look for history" is one of the obiter dicta of the versatile Lord Rosebery, uttered when he was not "sitting on the fence." The two novels under review go far in support of that statement. Sir Walter Scott made incidents of both Scottish and English history familiar to us all, and the elder Dumas did the same for France, and others have, more or less successfully, followed in their footsteps. Miss (or should we say Mrs. ?) Janet M. Clark deals in with a phase of French history which was intimately interwoven with our own. The scene of the story is laid in the spacious days of Queen Elizabeth, just prior to the Massacre of St. Bartholomew, when Protestantism was firmly established in this country but had little more than a pied à terre in the fair land of France. The real heroine is, to our mind, Constantia, a love-child of the famous Benvenuto Cellini (according to the authoress), though we freely admit that the Bourgeois Queen, a certain Anita Nitouche, runs her very close, and is almost, if not exactly, an "equal first." The hero is Sir Eric Courtenay, who has been sent on a secret mission to the French Protestants. The story shows how much more politics than faith had to do with religion in those days. The Bourgeois Queen is allied with the Catholics, and has won over Paris to their cause, not from any religious scruples, but because she, though she reigns supreme over the Parisians, who adore her, has lost her heart to De Coucy, one of the adherents of the Guises, the leaders of the "Ligue." Constantia is under her protection, and Anita, at De Coucy's behest, prevails upon the unsophisticated girl to dilly-dally with Sir Eric, and worm his important secret from him. The story is decidedly interesting, and is full of adventure both in the realms of love and high politics, and hairbreadth 'scapes. Many historical personages are introduced to the reader—Guise, Condé, the King of Navarre, Admiral Coligny, and others with whom we are all more or less familiar. Another character, of more humble origin, is Courtenay's attendant, the faithful William, whose remarkable aptitude in acquiring a knowledge of French in the vernacular during the few weeks of his sojourn in Paris was, to say the least, phenomenal.

THE BOURGEOIS QUEEN OF PARIS

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE WERE-WOLF

introduces us to a later stage of French history, that of the "Fronde," when Cardinal Mazarin was for a while all-powerful and the "Grand Monarque" not yet in his teens. The story is powerfully though not faultlessly written, and will appeal particularly to those who appreciate the grim and the ruthless. The plot centres upon the infamous "droit du seigneur," and it must be remembered that at this period the French peasantry were in a similar feudal position to that of the Anglo-Saxons shortly after the Norman Conquest and throughout the Plantagenet dynasty, some centuries before. The brutality engendered on both sides by the grinding down of the "peuple" by the "seigneur" is vividly depicted, and the reader of these pages will gain some knowledge of the real causes of the Terror of '93 and the horrors of the Great Revolution. The notorious beauty Ninon de l'Enclos passes across the scene, and we have many glimpses of the famous Cyrano de Bergerac, the inveterate duellist with the big nose, of Anne of Austria, and of the leaders of the "Fronde," particularly De Retz and La Grande Mademoiselle.

The Lonely Road. By A. E. JACOMB. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

IF we once admit that so boorish an individual as Gerald Blake, the uncouth hero of this story, could at any period of his life appeal so strongly to the fastidious, cynical, sharp-witted Helen Andrews as to induce her to marry him, the rest of the tragedy follows as a matter of course. Gerald is clumsy, mentally and physically, and a woman such as Helen Andrews will overlook anything rather than clumsiness in a man. However, the two unfortunate people marry, and, as is nowadays the fashion in fiction, the wedding-bells ring up the curtain. Admirably does Miss Jacomb convey the latent antagonism between the temperaments of husband and wife, and the chapters which lead up to the final desperate outbreak, when Helen, half-throttled by Gerald in a drunken fury of resentment against her bitter remarks, leaves the home, empty, to him, are very well shaped for their effect.

Into the tale come other characters for whom life also moves on creaking wheels. The love-story of Kitty, Gerald's sister, infatuated as she is with a selfish dilettante, although it ends happily, is sad reading. The same lack of the lighter mood which we had to note in "The Faith of his Fathers" is here again noticeable; and we may quote one paragraph as evidence that the punctuation might have been improved by a little care. Kitty is playing a Spanish dance:—

> She played it well, another time she would have been satisfied, to-day she felt there was something wanting, and yet she knew she had never played it better, and Helen and Helen's guests applauded at once and warmly.

It is only fair to say that there are few such slipshod passages in the book. Once admit the possibility of the marriage, as we observed, and the "Lonely Road" of Helen and Gerald opens naturally to our view; but it is a hard admission.

The Rectory Governess. By FERGUS HUME. (C. H. White. 6s.)

WITH a plot altogether out of the common and a passably surprising dénouement, Mr. Fergus Hume's latest sensational novel shows that he has lost none of his cunning. His dramatis personæ are drawn to the life, and his vivid description of a couple of appalling murders will send a thrill through the most callous reader. It is a relief to feel that the victims were not altogether undeserving of their fate. The story is a combination of robbery, treasure-hunting, love, and hate, and the central figure, the much-persecuted heroine, is sure to win the hearts of all who make her acquaintance. She is engaged as governess to the most delightful and precocious twins that ever romped through the pages of a novel. The hero is a young squire who believes in reincarnation and the law of Karma. He has a scoundrel of a cousin, a villain of the deepest dye, who is primarily responsible for the tragic occurrences with which the book deals. The Rev. Simon Dawlish, the father of the twins, is everything a learned professor in a novel should be. He is naturally absent-minded, but fortunately has a most sensible and kind-hearted housekeeper in his aunt-in-law, Miss Pamela, a lovable relic of the earlier Victorian days. The tracing of the lost treasure and the unravelling of the first murder are mainly due to the squire, who for the nonce turns amateur detective. This first murder is gruesome enough in all conscience, but it is by no means so ruthless as the second one. The latter is occasioned by a mad gardener setting an atrocious trap to kill a rival, and the cause of their rivalry falls a victim to it. The bane of the heroine's existence is her father, one of the most imperturbable rascals that has ever figured in fiction. The story is distinctly one of Mr. Fergus Hume's best, and certainly deserved a better setting than the publisher has given it. Paper, binding, and print leave much to be desired in a six-shilling novel. On some pages the print is execrable.

The Mulberries of Daphne. By KATE HORN. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

IT could not be expected that the author of "Edward and I and Mrs. Honeybun" could tell us anything but an interesting, pure, and bright story of the fortunes of the persons who go to make up this happy little romance. It would not be fair to relate how Daphne, tiring of society and the frivolous ways of her mother, to say nothing of the unwelcome attentions of her millionaire fiancé, sought peace and refreshment in a quiet little corner far away in Surrey, where, of course, the man whom she had met once before for an all too short half-hour happens to be quartered with his regiment. Suffice it to say that the course of true love runs its proverbial way; but all ends smoothly at the last, much help as well as amusement being caused by Terence Sullivan, an Irish soldier who assists in the household where Daphne takes up her temporary abode.

The Kestrel. By REGINALD SALWEY. (Digby Long and Co. 6s.)

WE are here introduced to a scoundrel, a doctor by profession, and a fool of a woman, who hands over her fortune to the said doctor, who apparently finds it easy to hypnotise his patient. A country vicar and his spouse are thrown in to make a very improbable and not very interesting story. It seems exceptionally difficult to swallow one impossible position in an ordinary novel, although, if an author sets out with the intention of dealing with situations of the kind, and gives sufficient doses, the reader after straining at the first dose seems to find the others much easier to take and not so disagreeable.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REFERENCE BOOKS

The Newspaper Press Directory for 1911. (E. Mitchell and Co. 2s.)

Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench, 1911. (Dean and Son. 7s. 6d. net.)

The Public Schools Year-book, 1911. Edited by H. F. W. Deane and W. A. Evans. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

The Newspaper Press Directory

For over half a century the cheap and useful volume entitled "The Newspaper Press Directory" has been making its annual appearance. Although originally compiled to enable advertisers to ascertain the number and character of the papers available for advertisements, the scope of the Directory has been gradually extended until it now almost serves the purpose of a commercial geography. Special attention is given to the Colonial section and the progress of the Press on the other side of the Atlantic. By the issue of their guide, Messrs. Mitchell and Co. render good service not only to the editors of the 2,395 newspapers of the United Kingdom, but to all those who are in any way connected with or interested in the various publications of the world.

Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench

Members of Parliament, peers, and lawyers seem always to be a favourite class of persons to be grouped, tabulated, and put into books. This, of course, is quite right and proper, and when the result is similar to that achieved by Messrs. Dean and Son in the 1911 edition of "Debrett's House of Commons and the Judicial Bench," we have nothing but praise to bestow. Every portion of the book is well arranged: detailed biographies of M.P.'s and Judges are given, as well as the names of both successful and unsuccessful candidates at the last two General Elections. Messrs. Dean have also taken the trouble to enclose rather an amusing note in which they classify the names of the various Members of Parliament. For instance, under the heading of "Clothing" we are informed that gentlemen possessing the names of Brace, Coates, and Cotton represent their respective constituencies in the House of Commons. The book is printed on good paper, and has many advertisements.

The Public Schools Year-book

In 1910 the Head Masters' Conference adopted the above book as the official book of reference, and from the large mass of information contained in the present volume it would appear that the said Head Masters had done wisely, for there are no less than 775 pages of closely printed matter all dealing with subjects of interest to those in charge of the education of the youth of the country. Well-known public schools such as Eton and Harrow are dealt with at considerable length; while the chapters which give accounts of the professions have the very useful addition of possible openings for students who have passed through their various trainings. Lists are given of public school periodicals, Old Boys' clubs, and educational books of the year.

The Oxford and Cambridge Review. Lent Term, 1911. (Constable and Co. 2s. 6d.)

Mr. Herbert W. Tompkins's "The Tragedy of Porson," in the present issue of this Review, is a really brilliant article from the pen of one who has made a special study of his subject. In a breezy résumé and criticism of the earlier Oxford Magazines, Mr. J. D. Symon shows how infinitely superior the old papers were to those of the present day, which, he says justly, sacrifice themselves "to the Moloch of the Up-to-date." The quotations from the Student and the Undergraduate add a dash of boldness and spice which is not to be found nowadays. An extremely interesting contribution on "The Mediæval Literature of the Serbs," by Mr. Malcolm Burr, is followed by a curious, but none the less readable, speculative philosophical article by Mr. Patterson Muir, entitled "The Thing in Itself," which denotes the futility and inanity of searchers for the bed-rock of truth. Mr. Alexander Ramsay's name appears over an all too optimistic discussion anent the Indian as an undergraduate. Mr. Alexander Ramsay, with bland condescension, lets Mr. Kipling down lightly for his indiscretion in boldly stating the impossibility of East and West meeting. He affirms that it is not merely not an impossibility, but an actuality—with what truth the man who knows either Oxford or Cambridge can gauge for himself. With a keenness which is altogether regrettable—since his theories are irreconcilable with practice—he urges the enlargement of the facilities for Indians to become undergraduates at Oxford and Cambridge; and, totally forgetful of the actual instances of the falling away from education and civilisation of Indians, within our own memories, after they have returned to their country, he points out a few superficial advantages to back up his arguments. This, however, is no place for the more ample discussion necessitated by a perusal of Mr. Ramsay's perhaps intentionally controversial article. Lastly, there are book criticisms—not ordinary book criticisms, but satirical lashings of a description almost too bitter, which make most anxious reading.

THE THEATRE

"LADY PATRICIA" AT THE HAYMARKET

You find yourself up a tree in the literal sense of the expression—a tree in the garden of Mr. Michael and Lady Patricia Cosway at Normanborough; a very fine old tree, in what, you gather, is a very fine old garden. Your eye is caught at once by the ingenious arrangement of deck which has been made in the enormous branches of this old grandfather oak, a deck so large that it holds not only many comfortable chairs but a summer-house quite roomy enough for two stout people to hide in. Your eye is quickly taken away from the general beauty of the scene by the curious, half-pathetic, wailing monotone which rises from an elaborate seat filled with cushions. You realise with a gasp that the voice is that of a woman—a new and curious and different woman, who wears very peculiar clothes with a full knowledge of the effect they will cause, who wears a frock cut very low in broad daylight without looking ridiculous and who shimmers with golds and silvers in an almost Oriental manner. There is a pot of lilies at her elbow, and every now and then her long, naked arm stretches out and her Burne-Jones fingers fondle and caress these once symbolic blooms. In a sort of ecstasy of self-satisfaction Lady Patricia is reciting aloud a poem of Browning's. Her voice is peculiar and unique. You are not quite sure whether it makes you want to laugh or cry. It has in it a touch of vibrato, and always the last words of her sentences slant out of tune. You are not quite sure what is the matter with Lady Patricia. You are immensely interested, because she may be mad or merely foolish. She is in no sense of the word conventional. If she were not ambushed behind the old branches of an oak—if, let us suppose, she were seated in a garden on the banks of a river—she would certainly earn the ribaldry of the passers-by. Although alone, Lady Patricia ntones and gesticulates and sways and preens herself as though she were performing to an audience of Souls. She is quite undisturbed by the appearance of a servant, to whom she gives two lines of Browning and one direction as to cream and sugar. She is undisturbed also at the lumbering earnestness of the old gardener who has come to cut away those leaves which hide the last red passion of the sunset. To both these men Lady Patricia continues to quote and give instructions in blank verse. Suddenly the whole tree shakes with the rush of a new arrival, a red-headed, well-turned-out, quite conventional young man.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

You notice to your amazement that the very sight of this boy causes Lady Patricia much emotion, that she thrills and wriggles, and in an utterly unashamed manner thrusts out her long, bare arms, whose fingers twitch to touch and stroke. Your eyes go to the boy, who is quite young enough to be this woman's son, and your thoughts turn quickly to Michael Cosway, the husband, the evidently wealthy and thoughtful husband It is not, however, until the earnest gardener is harried away that you receive the shock of your life. You see this boy rush into this woman's arms. You hear her sing "Kiss me" again and again. You watch her long fingers playing with his hair and philandering with his face. You hear her call him dearest and darling. You see that his enthusiastic slang is balm to her. She adores him for his youth, his short-haired enthusiasm. She finds him so "young and hungry and inarticulate."

The whole interview between these two leaves you limp with laughter, surprise, and a little horror. By this time you have discovered that the boy is just an ordinary conventional young ass whose vanity has swollen, balloon-like, at the so very noticeable attentions of the great lady, the married woman; that Lady Patricia, from having fallen into the hands of Souls and poseurs, people who talk Art and Literature, and spend their little lives in the worship of frieze, has developed into such a mass of affectation, insincerity and artificiality, and that she must not be taken seriously for a single moment. It has already become obvious that she is a woman with a quite wonderful gift of mimicry, who has seen Mrs. Patrick Campbell as Mélisande and Francesca and Silicette. She gives the most delicious imitations of this celebrated actress's tones and gestures, facial expressions, and strange, undefined movements. It is obvious to you that whatever she may have been in her youth, this woman is now an actress; that whether alone or with one other person she peoples the air with a crowd of great admirers, and she almost waits for the outbursts of applause which she is so sure are her due. In a word, you discover that Mr. Rudolf Besier has done a very clever thing: he has put Mrs. Patrick Campbell upon the stage, and he has been lucky enough to persuade Mrs. Patrick Campbell to play her. The result is magnificent. So long as Lady Patricia Cosway is singing and wailing and intoning, or smiling, undulating, and preening, you congratulate yourself upon being in a comfortable stall at the Haymarket Theatre. There are, however, moments when she is absent, changing her frock, when you are not quite so certain that you are an object for congratulation. Moments come of dulness, of repetition, of rather puerile joking, not without a touch of somewhat broad insinuation. But when you come to know that these moments are necessary, and that Lady Patricia's frocks are well worth seeing, you listen to the amiable fooling of a Dean Lesley and a very blunt and hearty Mrs. O'Farrel with indulgence.

There are other moments when Lady Patricia is away that are very far from dull. There is something painfully funny in the sight, for instance, of Michael Cosway, the husband, making sentimental love to "the flapper," as Lady Patricia's "Beel" calls Clare Lesley. Cosway is forty-five or so, and looks it. He worships Lady Patricia as one worships a beautiful piece of Crown Derby. He firmly believes that she loves him madly, and would die at his infidelity. As a matter of fact, she is altogether too much for him in his home, and he longs to dally with the live girl, full of slang and hot blood and fish-like elusiveness. He longs to feel that he is back again in the early 'twenties, and to forget that his joints creak a little, and that his hair is running very quickly away from his forehead. The pretty girl, charmingly but brutally abrupt and frank, who says precisely what she means at all the wrong moments, who climbs trees and gets her frock torn and asks the first handy person to pin her up, is brought to her first moment of seriousness by the sudden, horrified confession of Michael's love. Just as it was extremely funny and a little painful to see the beautiful woman throwing herself at the head of a boy, it is still more funny and still more painful, at any rate from a man's point of view, to see the almost elderly man chasing a girl.

This is Mr. Rudolf Besier's play. He sets out in the highest spirits and at the top of his form to show two people who detest the idea of growing old. He makes them clutch desperately and foolishly at a fleeing youth by endeavouring to awaken the passions of the really young. In order that this pathetic and terrible subject may not make sympathetic men and women shudder in their seats, Mr. Besier has wrapped it up in silver paper which glistens with brilliant touches of satire, exquisitely delicate suggestions of characterisation and wholly irresistible dialogue. The play and the setting of the play satisfy every sense. He has called his leading characters Cosway, and has unconsciously caught a good deal of the great miniature painter's art. The strong, broad brush of the ordinary dramatist is never in evidence in Lady Patricia. There is, in fact, nothing of oils or water-colours in the work. Mr. Besier's medium is the crayon, and his pictures are pastels—at least the pictures in "Lady Patricia," for, as we know, Mr. Besier has many mediums. He can write you a sordid drama or a poetical romance in blank verse. All his work has been admirable; but none of it has been so pleasing, so soothing, so light as the work in his latest play.

His study of Lady Patricia is quite masterly, worked out with great observation and humour and not a little daring. It would be libellous if it were not so funny. He is, perhaps, a little unnecessarily cruel in his drawing of Michael. The cult of the flapper is no new thing. It is very human for the almost elderly man to be fascinated by the little creature who is hardly yet a butterfly—a woman in the chrysalis stage, to whom nearly all ordinary things are mysteries. But the boy and girl are perfectly drawn. Here Mr. Besier is quite fair. He gives them no more than their share of vanity and all their share of attractiveness. They are both living creatures who come on to the stage from life, and leave it to go back to life. His study of the flapper type is quite the best of its kind. Her surprise at being told that she is loved by the man she calls "you dear, solemn old thing," and her final remark, when he stands gazing at her with a sort of frightened hunger, "Kiss me, and get it over quick," are desperately true.

The Dean is a charming person; so is Mrs. O'Farrel, the typical, common-sense, untheatrical woman, who is just as well able to give advice as to how to wash a bath as to treat whooping-cough—a cheery, capable woman. As to Baldwin, the gardener, there are no words in the English dictionary with which to describe his earnestness and drollery. One can only say that he might have lived in the brain of Mr. J. M. Barrie. Mr. C. V. France got every ounce out of the character without any obvious effort—a very ripe and admirable performance. Miss Athene Seyler was Clare Lesley from head to foot, and Mr. Charles Maude once more proves his extraordinary versatility as the ingenious Bill O'Farrel. Mr. Arthur Wontner as Michael Cosway surprised us. We have not liked him very much hitherto. In this play, however, he acts with great restraint and the right touch of solemnity. It goes without saying that Miss Rosina Filippi is good. So there remains Mrs. Patrick Campbell. It is inconceivable to imagine Lady Patricia in the hands of any other actress. Lady Patricia Cosway is Mrs. Patrick Campbell. Mrs. Patrick Campbell knows it, is highly amused by it, has the humour to be filled with admiration at the excellence and truthfulness of the picture, which is in no sense of the word a caricature, and gives an exquisite and epoch-making imitation of herself. Mr. Rudolf Besier and Mrs. Patrick Campbell together will fill the Haymarket Theatre for many months to come, with the able assistance of the other members of the company and Mr. Herbert Trench himself, who has mounted the play with great taste. "Lady Patricia" is indeed the best thing to be seen, and will, we are sure, weather triumphantly the storm which is sinking nearly every other play in London and driving Mr. Charles Frohman out of two theatres until the autumn.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE GREAT QUEST—II.*

By Arthur Machen

In thus indicating the scope of "Mysticism" I hope that I have, by the way, disabused the mind of my readers of a possible illusion—that I am going to "review" it. To do this adequately would mean the writing not of an article, but of a treatise, and even if I were competent for such a task, considerations of space would forbid. I must, therefore, point out that my office is not to review Miss Underhill's book, but to indicate it, pointing out by the way one or two matters which have struck me as especially interesting.

First, then, let me call attention to the extreme neatness with which the author demolishes that fantasy or nightmare which we speak of as the real world or the material universe. Any one, as she says, who thinks that the true world corresponds with the world as seen and cognised by us is in a state of mind compared with which the most dark and tortuous superstitions of the Neapolitan peasantry are high, intellectual illumination. In our "practical" moments we think that the grass is green and that bricks are hard solids; and for the convenience of ordinary talk and ordinary dealing in bricks this is well enough—just as it is highly convenient to say that the sun rises at 6 a.m., though the sun does nothing of the kind. But if we really believe interiorly that grass is green and that bricks are hard solids: well, it would be necessary to seek the wildest fictions of the "Arabian Nights" for a parallel. The real truth of the matter is demonstrated by Miss Underhill by the happy analogy of a telegraphic message. The soul, she says, is at the receiving end of a telegraphic wire:—

> The receiving instrument registers certain messages. She [the soul] does not know, and . . . never can know, the object, the reality at the other end of the wire, by which those messages are sent; neither can the messages truly disclose the nature of that object. . . . It is obvious that the structural peculiarities of the telegraphic instrument [the senses] will have exerted a modifying effect on the message. That which is conveyed as dash and dot, colour and shape, may have been received in a very different form Therefore this message, though it may in a partial sense be relevant to the supposed reality at the other end, can never be adequate to it.

Note also the entirely satisfactory and convincing reply to the common objection that some of the "symptoms" of mysticism are similar to certain "symptoms" of spiritualism, hysteria, and even intoxication—there are passages in De Qnincey's famous account of the states of the opium-eater which offer very strong and highly remarkable analogies to states of the mystic consciousness. "Idiots," says Miss Underhill, "are often voluble, but many orators are sane." This, too, is a valuable distinction between magic (or occult science) and mysticism: "Magic wants to get; mysticism wants to give." The book is full of these brief and pregnant sentences; defining and distinguishing whole worlds of thought by the clear and true magic of a simple and clean-cut phrase.

Here and there I venture to disagree with the author of "Mysticism." Thus, she alludes to the "congregational prayer for rain of orthodox Protestants" as an instance of the magical spirit intruding into the mystic or religious sphere. Well, in the first place, the phraseology is curious. I presume that by "orthodox Protestants" Miss Underhill means to refer us to the members of that body which is styled "Ecclesia Anglicana" in Magna Charta, and to the "weather petitions" of the Book of Common Prayer; the inference being that the Anglican Church is peculiar in Christendom in praying for rain and fine weather. But Miss Underhill must surely be familiar with the prayers in the Roman Missal "Ad petendam pluviam," "Ad postulandam serenitatem," "Ad repellendas tempestates," and "Pro peste animalium." She must also have read in "The Divine Liturgy of St. Chrysostom" the supplication: "For healthfulness of air, plenty of the fruits of the earth, and peaceful times;" and again in "The Divine Liturgy of St. Mark" the Synapte, containing the prayers:—

> Send down rains on the places that want and stand in need of them. Raise the waters of the river to their measure through Thy grace. Increase the fruits of the earth, to seed-time, and to harvest . . . this humble and poor and Christ-loving city, preserve it, O God, from evil days, from famine, plague, and incursion of the heathen.

It is, therefore, difficult to see any reason for attributing these "magical" petitions to Anglicanism, as distinguished from Orthodoxy or Roman Catholicism. Furthermore, and this is of greater importance, there is reason to believe that the author is wrong in classing these weather-prayers as magical. They are in reality all included in the petition, "Panem nostrum quotidianum da nobis hodie," and by the Authority from which this petition proceeds they are finally justified. And again, every petition of a Christian man, of what nature soever, is eternally governed by the great words, "Fiat voluntas tua." The magician says, "My will be done," the Christian says, "Thy Will be done," and between these two supplications yawns the great gulf, the "magnum chaos," that parts hell from heaven. True it is that the mystic will not pray for fine weather for himself, but for a good reason. For he indeed in this world has changed his life; as it was reported of King Arthur he is come to Avalon, the isle beyond the glassy floods:—

> The island valley of Avilion;
> Where falls not hail, or rain, or any snow,
> Nor ever wind blows loudly; but it lies
> Deep-meadow'd, happy, fair, with orchard-lawns,
> And bowery hollows crown'd with summer sea.

When a man has reached the Isle of the Saints that is across the water-floods he needs not to say with "orthodox Protestants," or Greeks, or Romans, "aeris serenitatem nobis tribue supplicantibus," since the sky above him is serene for evermore.

Finally, it must be remembered that the mystic life is a great paradox, which is of lesser paradoxes all compact. In noticing Mr. Jameson's admirable book, called "Art's Enigma," in these columns, I pointed out, I think, following Mr. Jameson, that what is called "reason" by the average man in his average moments is in reality a conglomeration of absurdities and misapprehensions and misapplied principles, and before one begins to think even of mysticism it is necessary to clear the mind of this doleful mass of cant that doth so easily overcloud it. The mathematicians give us two rules about parallel straight lines—the first is that they never meet, but the higher counsel is that they meet in infinity. And if such a paradox as this be allowed in the most definite and demonstrable of all the sciences, which is, in a lower sense, the scientia scientiarum, we may well be prepared to meet with sayings as strange and yet stranger in the Science and Art of Life Everlasting, dealing not with lines and surfaces, and numbers but with the approach of the human spirit to its eternal home,

* Mysticism: a Study in the Nature and Development of Man's Spiritual Consciousness. By Evelyn Underhill. (Methuen and Co. 15s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

And so there are, indeed, strange reports of those great adventurers, the mystics. They say, for example, that knowledge, which they never sought as an end, is poured upon them, not through reading of treatises or by torture of the brain, but by the exercise of a morality which (to us) seems heroical. And, again, they say that to them A is at once equal to X and not-X; which, indeed, is a great marvel in England, but common matter enough in Avalon, as is faithfully reported. Thus, for example, these knights-errant love their fellows with a far deeper and more burning love than that which holds amongst us; and yet—like those who ate of a certain herb in Homer—the death of those they love brings to them no anguish of grief. To them the beauty of a rose appears with a glory of which we in England have no thought or vision, since in this isle blossom no such roses, but only "in insula Avallonia;" and yet in the desert these men find as much delight and joy and pleasure as if they were lying in the midst of roses.

But there is no need to speak more of these strange paradoxes and wonders, since they are all very well set down by that great mystic and Knight Errant of Holy Church, St. Paul, who wrote "sorrowful yet alway rejoicing," "dying and behold we live" and the rest.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

IV.—THE PHILOSOPHY OF TRANQUILLITY

When my holiday is over—though, as a correspondent has very kindly pointed out to me, the holidays of a poet should have no end—I think I should like to settle down to the serious business of life in a canal-boat. It will be remembered that Stevenson expresses a similar desire at the end of the "Inland Voyage," and Stevenson had a pretty taste in life. He was wise enough to bracket the onion with the nectarine as Nature's noblest confections, and many people must have echoed his longing for a yacht and a string quartette of his own. It would be a pleasant task to fit out a canal-boat for an aimless, delightful voyage. The bottles of old wine, the books of verse, a crew out of one of Mr. Jacobs's stories, a rack of muskets for make-believe—all these necessaries would have to be chosen with loving care. It would be well perhaps to take Southey's advice, and add a "kitten rising six months and a child rising three years," so that youth should not be forgotten. Chloe, with all deference to Fitzgerald, we should leave behind, lest she should take it into her little head to make a wilderness of our sufficient paradise. There is nothing, as the Water Rat remarks in the "Wind in the Willows," half so pleasant in life as messing about in boats, and if we made up our mind never to get anywhere, and never to accomplish anything, life in a canal-boat could not fail to be delightful.

I came to this conclusion a year ago at Rickmansworth, and the canal-boats of Belgium have strengthened my opinion. It will always be a matter of regret to me that when I once journeyed from Antwerp to Brussels by canal I slept all the way, and so failed to keep any log of the voyage. It is the shape of canal-boats that attracts me, and the pace at which they go. They are clearly built for comfort rather than for speed. Here in Brussels every canal-boat has a cheerful dog with a curly tail, a cage or two of birds, and a number of small children, whose ages can be estimated from the washing drying overhead. The stern of the boat, where the domesticities triumph, is painted bright green and yellow, and here a section of the family is always having tea or some equivalent meal, watched over by a woman of astonishing breadth, stolen out of one of Rubens' pictures. Of course there is a serious side to the business. I happened to stop near a depôt where these salty mariners get their drinking-water, and with a real thrill I watched two small boys row up in a boat with the ship's cask aboard. That was how the Elizabethans watered their ships, and I could not blame the boys for emphasising the importance of their mission. While I was looking on at this, an old gentleman in green carpet-slippers came up and told me something very interesting at great length. Unfortunately he spoke in Flemish, so that I only understood every third word, and had to content myself with smiling amiably in reply. This double-language question must be rather troublesome sometimes. It is strange to hear children addressing their parents in Flemish, and the parents answering in French. I am told that there are some Belgians who know neither language, but express themselves in a mixture of both, though fate has spared me their acquaintance.

English novelists who sigh over their diminishing royalties may at least be glad that they were not born in Belgium. I was talking the other evening to a novelist whose first novel won the prize given by the Belgian Government every year to the author of the best novel in French written by a Belgian. In spite of this he only sold a little over a hundred copies, and made a net loss of thirty pounds on his book. It seems that there are no real publishers in Brussels, and that while Belgian writers have to face the powerful competition of French authors, the French publishers will not look at a book by a Belgian unless he has forced his way into one of the literary cliques of Paris. It was a sad story, and to comfort him I told him of an English novelist who said to me that if he took more than six weeks to write a novel he made a loss on it. But the commercial side of literature is an unpleasing business that no longer concerns poets—they, at least, are free from any harassing doubts as to the pecuniary consequences of their work; and this is as it should be, for love is the only wage that can command the noblest labour. That it will not pay hotel bills is the fault of society and not of the publishers.

I learn from the calendar that I have been here three weeks, but they have passed like a peaceful summer afternoon. Yet tranquillity, though we woo it so ardently, is at best a negative boon, and, being English, I shall soon have to seek another country. Brussels, with its cobbles and its admirable but noisy service of trams, is not really a quiet city, but the wit of man has not yet invented anything so nerve-destroying as the motor-'buses of London. Yet it is clear that the true causes of tranquillity lie deeper than this. Probably few readers remember the poem, though it has won the approbation of Mr. Andrew Lang, in which that inconsiderable versifier, Thomas Haines Bailey, expressed a passionate wish to see new faces. There is a good deal of human nature in the thing, but it is a cry for peace and not for adventure, for new faces do not really astonish us so much as changes in the old. As a matter of fact, things seen for the first time hardly ever surprise us, and a man paying his first visit to Niagara may be more impressed, but certainly is not so astonished, as the Member of Parliament who finds a water-main burst in Westminster. When we leave our normal environment we expect the unexpected, and rob wonder of its fire. A dragon-fly in my suburban garden would thrill me more than forty aeroplanes at Nice.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is idle to seek tranquillity in places or among people that have shared the especial hours of our joy or sorrow. We shall find old echoes ringing in the "porches" of our ears, we shall find old emotions moving wistfully in our hearts. For me London is scrawled over with a kind of emotional shorthand of past days and nights, that rouses a deep unrest in my heart and gives my mind no peace. There are streets that haunt me, and faces, even faces of people whom I do not know. That is why I find Brussels restful, where the houses do not know my histories, and the faces I see in the streets have no significance for me. If it were not for the string-bands in the cafés that will play old songs they ought to have forgotten long ago, Chloe by now would be dead and buried with the millions of Chloes that were before her, waiting for the millions of Chloes that shall follow after. As it is she lingers, dimly sweet, like an old tune that we heard Pan play on his pipes when we were boys.

Not very long ago in England a novel, professedly written by a woman who had suffered from temporary insanity, caused a certain amount of sensation. About the same time I bought a book called "Sordid Amok" in the Charing Cross Road for a shilling that seemed to me to be very much nearer the real thing. But now I have come across a book published in Brussels in 1874 that is the beginning and the end of the literature of madness. "Les Chants de Maldoror," by the Comte de Lautréamont, is the most astonishing book that I have ever read. It is an imaginative nightmare described with extraordinary literary power and sincerity. Perhaps I may be permitted to give some account of it in a future number of THE ACADEMY.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE PROCESSION

BY W. H. KOEBEL

THE edge of the broad belt of sub-tropical forest rises up from the stretch of coarse pastures as sheer and as clearly defined as a dark green cliff from a light green sea. If you would carry the metaphor further, the material lies most conveniently at hand, for the wall of verdure is splashed with what might well have been flung up from the green swell beneath—a spray of flowers. But here all fancies of the kind must end; for white is only one of the more insignificant of the colours with which nature has painted these blossoms. Of all tints, from flaring red to yellow and deep purple, they fleck the leaves at every point with a delightful generosity, whether set about the bases of the trees or clinging to the branches in mid-air.

In one place only is there a break in the close wall of foliage and flower. There, a dark patch of deeper shadow marks the entrance cleaved by a tunnel-like path. Emerging from this into the full sunlight of the open campo is the track. Fighting hard to maintain its narrow thread of bareness intact in the face of the encroaching grass tussocks, it has crawled out from its leafy shelter like a woodland snake, to rise and dip in harmony with the undulating ground.

Some few hundred yards from the forest the slender path passes in the neighbourhood of a pool, a few acres of water that shimmer in a hollow of the land. Set in the earth on one side of this are the worn stumps of a timber sufficiently hard to resist the onslaughts of a couple of centuries. The resistance has been merely partial, it is true, since the wood, chastened now and subdued to match the colour of the red earth, is all that remains of the once great beams of a bridge that stretched from one side to the other of the small lake. As a relic of the Jesuit dominion of old, it has numerous fellows in this north-eastern corner of Argentina. Some are slightly better preserved, others scarcely perceptible at all, but all have reached that final stage which hovers between ruin and total annihilation, for here, in Misiones, the ruins of stone and wood still brood heavily, despite the material prosperity that has come upon the province.

Without the boundaries of the forest the low green hills are all but innocent of trees, save where the streams in the valleys wind their way beneath their well-defined curtains of branches and leaves. Far away in the distance is a solitary homestead, a speck of white that pricks out palely from against the background of another forest patch. A few cows are grazing here and there; many butterflies are flitting to and fro, and a bevy of tall herons remain in motionless meditation by the edge of the pond. Of humanity there has been no sign whatever: but an absence of the kind is a phase which seldom endures long, even in this remote province of Misiones.

The manner of humanity's appearance, when it occurs, is strange enough. All at once the even shadow of the woodland tunnel is vaguely mottled by advancing forms. Then out into the blinding light come three riders—a man, a woman, and a boy. A dramatic appearance this, for it is no ordinary riding party that emerges so abruptly from the shadows. The man and the boy are as glorious as such poor finery as they possess can make them. Nevertheless they serve as the mere complements of the procession, comparatively dull and undistinguished in aspect. It is the form of the woman who rides between the pair that catches the eye. Her dress is composed of nothing beyond the ordinary loose garments of the local womenfolk; but its vivid colouring of yellow and red lends a flaunting majesty even to this crude garb. In her hand she holds a lofty, slender shaft that pricks upwards to the point where a broad blue and white flag floats from its extremity.

As the group advances slowly, the apparition might well cause the spectator to rub his eyes. Seen from a distance, there is undoubtedly something mediæval in the appearance of the small party disgorged by the forest in this lonely spot. The standard, fluttering gently to the breeze on its long lance, might well be waving above a band of knights-errant in gallant defiance of the villains, monsters, and wizards lurking in the glades.

The expedition might well be concerned with all this. The reality is not altogether without its romance—but of quite another kind. Notwithstanding the gallantry of the show, these folk are out for profit, not for deeds of daring or war, though death, as a matter of fact, is responsible for the excursion. Lying in a reed-hut somewhere in the neighbourhood is the dead body of a young child. Hence the tears of joy that were shed when the little creature breathed its last, and hence the present moment of gladness. For the dead child is one of the fortunate few. Translated ere the world could fleck its immaculate purity, no half-way houses to heaven have lain in the path of this blessed infant. It is an angelito already—a little angel—and this at the cost of but a few months of mortal life!

It is necessary that this direct passage from earth to glory should be celebrated fittingly by those left behind.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

At such times spiritual exaltation must be displayed in material form, and into earthly rejoicings enters the inevitable question of ways and means. Nothing less than a fiesta can mark the occasion, and a fiesta entails dancing, meat, and drink—and money. Otherwise the rejoicings around the body of the angelito laid out in state may prove of too modest an order to suit the celestial nature of the event. Hence the procession, the gaudy clothes, and the brilliant flag beneath which the riders advance.

Just now the group is bound for the solitary hut that appears as a white speck in the distance. Arrived there, the riders will tell the glad news, give out the invitation to the revels, and will await the contribution that is certain not to fail them. Whether it take the form of a chicken, a duck, or a few centavos, the offering can be counted on as surely as the presence of the guests at the feast. Then the riders will make their way to the next humble homestead, and will continue to scour the countryside until the list of their acquaintances is exhausted and the corresponding offerings gathered in.

The three are passing away in the distance now. Heralds of the angelito, the brave show is worthy even of the new inhabitant of the skies. This they know, and are proportionately proud. As they wend their way by a lapacho tree that stands in solitude upon the open Campo, the vividness of the procession attains to its climax. Past the great spread of branches, smothered to the full in the soft pink of their blossoms, goes the yellow and red of the woman who bears the blue and white flag. The ensign of the angelito is in the hands of the mother of the dead. It is possible that her whole heart may be given to the upholding of the gaudy thing. On the other hand, it may be with the little body in the reed hut. But, if so, she would never tell.

ASPECTS OF TRAGEDY—III.

SHAKESPEARE drew men and women of flesh and blood; for the most part of beautiful flesh and of hot blood that pulsed to the passions of love and hatred, pity and revenge. He painted the glowing life of his time with a pen dipped in the eternal fires that burn upon Melpomene's high altar. Yet it should be noted that all his scenes are played out in an earlier age or in a foreign country. He never confessedly set his scenes and characters in Elizabethan England. Yet his people live, grow, and develop, not in old Rome, nor beside the passionate Adriatic, but beside the grey, untroubled Thames and in the lanes and fields of Warwickshire.

His drama of mingled incident and personality soars from height to height until in "King Lear," "Macbeth," and "Hamlet" it rests upon a summit unapproached and hitherto unapproachable. Because of his reluctance to write confessedly of his own age and people we must place Shakespeare among the romantic dramatists. Only he who writes of to-day or the not remote yesterday can claim to be a realistic dramatist. Yet Shakespeare was never fettered by the unities, those baffling Aristotelian propositions which, wherever, they are followed, tend to the stultification of the living drama. They are as impossible of realisation as the definitions of Euclid, or as the ideal drama of the witty Frenchman, which should be all action and psychology, which should present the crisis in the fates of the characters; but of whom the audience should not find it necessary to know one word concerning their lives up to the moment of their appearing on the stage.

The other Elizabethan dramatists, both before and after Shakespeare, place too fond a reliance upon the power of sheer physical horror to lend awfulness to their tragedies. This is thoroughly remote from the spirit of Greek tragedy, which would not suffer horrors upon the stage, but only showed forth their effect upon the characters. Kyd's "Spanish Tragedy," at the other extreme, is a veritable orgy of violent deaths. The mingled play of passions and their results, which in Shakespeare blends with such perfect art into a harmonious whole, is the true median way in which sober-apparelled tragedy walks with most fitting dignity.

After the short-lived period of Græco-Roman influence which produced "Gordobuc" and one or two other lifeless and uninteresting examples of drama, the lurid Italian tales and the violence of the Spanish drama may have reacted unfavourably upon our Elizabethan galaxy. It may reasonably he inferred that the half Spanish Court of Mary's reign had introduced Spanish letters to the notice of the English littérateurs; and however changed politically the Hispano-English relations may have become in Elizabeth's reign, a warlike international sentiment is rarely strong enough to interdict the artists, poets, and fine craftsmen of the opposing nations from fitting appreciation of one another's masterpieces. In the fellowship of art alone the dream-creed of universal brotherhood is realised.

In the "Mayor-Domo de la Duquesa de Amalfi" of Lope de Vega we have clearly the genesis of our own Webster's "Duchess of Malfy," and so with many others.

Shakespeare stands a demi-god, the epitome of drama at its highest; but next to him in his time we must place Marlowe. We should remember that Marlowe was bidden to join the company of the timeless dead at twenty-nine, when, in our day of old-young men and young-old women, most young poets have scarcely begun to realise their singing-voices. Indeed, one fact that must strike us as remarkable is the extreme youth of all these poets. The greater number of them died in their twenties and thirties; Shakespeare himself, a worn-out valetudinarian, at fifty-two. They grew early to blithe and vigorous manhood, took life's gifts with both hands; of them, as aforetime, it became a truism that the violent fire burns soonest out. Doubtless, it was well; who would not sooner send a beacon flame to heaven, a glorious tower of gold, soon quenched, than smoulder endlessly on, a slow, fitful blaze, half smothered in stenchy smoke?

When Marlowe died he had already given us real and powerful drama in the concluding scene of "Dr Faustus," and in "Edward II." had written a glowing, living history-play upon which "Richard II." was confessedly modelled. The inflated yet sonorous and truly poetic "Tamburlaine" travelled with him, if rumour may be credited, from Oxford, that foster-mother of impractical dreams: small wonder if we find it ponderous; yet how vividly it stands out from the contemporary work of Kyd, Greene, Lodge, or Peele. These last all wrote matchless lyrics, for which alone their dramas deserve to be read, had not the faithful and tireless anthologist already torn the most jewelled of them from their setting in interminable mazes of rhetoric.

Shakespeare had the great practical advantage over Marlowe and his fellows of being himself an actor; he was consequently well aware not only of what would act, but also of what conclusively would not; and he had access to the company's stock-cupboard when he would seek raw material for his plays.

That he himself did not unduly borrow from his contemporaries is evidenced by the love they bore him; pleasantly exemplified in the action of Hemming and Condall, his fellow-actors to the last, who, out of pure goodwill to his memory, brought out the first folio seven years after his death. It is again proved by the ungrudging tribute of Francis Meares in the "Wit's Treasury," and still more by the adulation of Ben Jonson.

Shakespeare may be said to have invented, as he is almost sole exemplar of, natural tragedy. Witness the admirable dying speech of Mercutio.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Why the devil came you between us?" he gasps. "I was hurt under your arm." Which is a right and natural utterance for a man that has his quittance from a rapier's point. Compare with this the long and impossibly unhuman dying speeches of earlier playwrights and of Shakespeare himself in less perfect plays.

Shakespeare understood to perfection the use of contrast and of irony. What could be more nobly, tragically ironic than Romeo's—

> If I may trust the flattering truth of sleep,
> My dreams presage some joyful news at hand;
> My bosom's lord sits lightly on his throne,
> And all this day an unaccustom'd spirit
> Lifts me above the ground with cheerful thoughts?

A moment later the messenger arrives with tidings of Juliet's death. Then consider the superb effect of the interposition of the prosy speech of the doddering old porter who keeps the gate in "Macbeth," between two scenes of tragic intensity.

Schiller failed to realise the significance of this break. He did not see how it at once relieved and heightened the darkness past and the darkness to come.

After the death of its supreme master the Elizabethan drama produced few plays capable of holding a modern audience, or even very agreeable for "closet-reading." Farther and farther divorced from nature, unwarmed by glowing contact with life, resolutely stifled by the growing power of the Puritans, and weakened by its own excesses, the heroic drama languished and died. Many valiant attempts have been made to revive it, but not one that we can account entirely successful.

ETHEL TALBOT.

THE ROYAL SOCIETY OF BRITISH ARTISTS

THE dominant impression that one carries away from this exhibition is its extraordinary inequality. Good work and bad clash at every turn, and disturb the judgment. Some of the work exhibited ought to have had no place in any serious show of pictures, least of all in a society which is privileged to call itself "Royal." Perhaps ill-health is accountable for the fact that Sir Alfred East has not risen to the level of his powers in any of the work which he contributes, though the winner of his picture, "The Edge of the Farm," which is offered as the first prize of the Art Union, may count himself a fortunate man, for the second-rate work of the veteran is finer, after all, than the first-rate productions of smaller men. His "Cornish Valley," however, leaves little impression upon us. Mr. Rex Vicat Cole maintains the tradition of an honoured name in his "Evening Mists," and we have a pleasant memory of Mr. Carruthers Gould's "Exmoor, from Selworthy"—a wide-spreading landscape bathed in brilliant sunshine. Mr. G. S. Walters also succeeds well, to our mind, with his "Summer Evening on the Maas, Holland," which is full of restfulness and the pathos of evening-time. There is some capital swirling water, too, in Mr. Hely Smith's "Just below the Weir." There is more promise than achievement in Mr. Joseph Simpson's "A Lyric," which impresses while it tantalises with its sense of incompleteness. Mr. Laszlo's powerful and sympathetic portrait of Miss L. M. Faithfull is a capital piece of work, which places that artist on a high pinnacle among his contemporaries. In spite of its mannerism, we like, too, Mr. Hal Hurst's clever portrait of Lady Lockhart of Lee—a three-quarter length of a beautiful woman in evening dress, standing with parted lips and in expectant attitude, both most difficult to render, as Mr. Hurst has done, with any approach to life. And Mr. McLellan's clever and brilliant "Souvenir de Clouet" also demands a mention. Mr. Hayley Lever sends some characteristic views of St. Ives and elsewhere; his work is always of an individual sort, and he sees things through his own eyes, and not, so to speak, at second-hand. Mr. F. Foottet sends some striking works, especially "Evening," in which a Cumberland landscape under an evening light is treated with rare poetic feeling and simplicity; and the work of Mr. George C. Haité is well represented by "The Castle," "Cagnia, on the French Riviera," and the clever sketch which he calls "Moorish Shops."

Among the water-colours, Mr. Hawkesworth's river studies, of which there are several, are exceedingly good of their kind; Mr. Haslehurst's clever landscapes and studies of old buildings, which are steadily winning him an assured place among book illustrators in colour, are much and worthily in evidence; and Mr. Cecil King's "Rouen" and "Dreadnoughts" have a fine simplicity and grip of colour. Chief, perhaps, in this section, and one of the most striking pictures in the Exhibition, is Mr. Birkbeck's "The Red House," a bold and powerful work, masterful in colour and execution, which deserves a much more conspicuous place on the walls than it has received. And for sheer cleverness of technique we do not think that Mr. Owen Merton's "Second-hand Shop, Paris," could easily be excelled.

AN EXHIBITION OF LITHOGRAPHS

MR. R. GUTEKUNST is now exhibiting at 10, Grafton Street an interesting and representative collection of lithographs, and the exhibition affords an excellent opportunity of comparing the work of men whose aims and methods differed very widely. The work of Charles Shannon is certainly most successful in the smaller impressions which have most in common with Whistler, of whose exquisite lithographs six may be seen here, among them "The Winged Hat" and one of the famous Lyme Regis series. There are some of Professor Legros' delicate portraits, including that of Cardinal Manning and the "Tête d'une petite fille," and also a fine study—"Retour des Paysans." Finally, there are the lithographs of Fantin Latour, the most interesting of which is perhaps the small and unpretentious portrait of the artist at the age of seventeen.

A SONG OF THE MOTOR: A SERIES

II

FROM the Weald of Sussex to the Wolds of Yorkshire. This is the proposal to a Man at the Wheel who loves a good roadcraft for its unflagging energy, its implicit obedience to control, its dogged power and swift progress. The proposal is hailed con amore by the Man at the Wheel, for, though he had trodden where no other white man had before penetrated in Equatorial Africa, and lived in the land of the Mogul never had he seen the vast moors of Yorkshire, its beautiful dales, or the noble pile of its wonderful Minster. An underlying reason for the journey is to visit a relative who has forsaken the world for self-abnegation and the rigid rule of a community busied with the moral and mental training of those of her sex and religion, destined, perhaps, to become the mothers of future men and women in and of the world.

The means for going up almost the length of England by road for the sake of wayside incident, ever-changing scene, al fresco meals, and possible adventure, is a very finished specimen from "Vulcan's forge"—coincidentally conceived and brought into being from wonderful steels evolved by the union of science and genius in that very county of Yorks which is the magnet of attraction—a six-cylinder gear-boxless motor car of Sheffield-Simplex make. Of generous power, imparting the thrill that comes from controlling a "live" force pulsing with potentialities and delightful motion that gives an almost Magic Carpet sense of transport, the car proves a very aeroplane of the road. Curbed, however, by judicious "throttling" by means of a cunningly contrived sliding pedal-action, the maximum power has not often to be called into use, and then only for hills that might be likened to mythical dragons arising to bar the way to contest the strength and valour of a Knight-Errant in shining armour. On this run, pace as pace is not desired, and possession chastens desire. The journey is not be a record scramble, but rather a quiet ramble through the countryside, so that the car's rhythmic song born of its motion will seldom leave a minor key.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A route being more or less "pricked out" on various invaluable Bartholomew maps, the first place to potter through and examine with kindly eyes is Horsham, with its artistic lichened stone roofs, its bull-ring and stocks, its Carfax, Bishopric, and Normandy, and last but not least its Middle-street. Here in this alley-way of main road stands a farmer's spring-cart, with its tail to the car, in which a man sits immersed in the day's news. A gentle insinuating hint from the motor-horn that passage is politely required is met with excited abuse actually abetted by a blue-aproned butcher; so dignity gives way before impudence, and the car is backed to a roundabout turn. Wooded and parklike country leads to Guildford, where caution is required and duly observed up the steep past its Castle ruin. Then away over sandy heath and pine country into Windsor Forest of gnarled oaks, under the walls of the Royal Castle, on past Runnymede, where barons over-ruled their King, and finally into tortuous, high-banked danger-ways to St. Albans, site of the first Roman town in Britain, to "lie" for the night. Next morning, after inspection of the Abbey, foretaste of the great churches farther north, the journey is resumed, picnic lunch, favoured by sunshine, being enjoyed later on in a leafy wood and screened from passing gaze. Then onward again over a great sweep of gently rolling country, meeting few vehicles, and passing through mere hamlets of no interest beyond their human note, till at last shabby Peterborough is reached, and suddenly unfolds through an old archway the great sombre but beautiful façade of its Cathedral, where Catharine of Aragon lies, and where was interred for a time poor libelled Mary of Scots.

Leaving Peterborough in pensive mood from memories of the two unhappy queens, the purring car bears the sightseers through the Fen country. Though now devoid of scenic effect, it was once forest land from which our British Amazon Boadicea launched herself in indomitable frenzy against the Roman invaders who had ravished her daughters and put countless thousands of them to the sword, only to suffer two short years afterwards such defeat in return as caused her to take her own life in despair. Here among the Fens also gallant Hereward the Wake, who lives for ever enshrined in the hearts of Englishmen through Charles Kingsley's pen, successfully defied Norman William, only to be eventually treacherously slain almost in his sleep. The stern Ironsides of Cromwell, too, were Fen men. The Fens have been the breeding-place of fighters, not only in ancient times against wolfish Vikings and Roman cohorts, but also later and into present times against the invading sea, hungry to swallow the rich and fertile soil. On the car goes, leaving these heart-stirring scenes of the great past, for Lincoln, where the Man at the Wheel has one of the surprises of his life on finding that Lincoln clings round a very steep hill that tilts the car at an uncomfortable angle. The hill is crowned by the glorious Cathedral pile, of double cruciform shape, the stained windows of which are among the finest in the world, this decision being quickly arrived at by some of party recently from Rome, Naples, Florence, and Milan.

From Lincoln the route has to pass through Doncaster, where the "men in the street" know not the word "petrol," but guess its meaning, after some cogitation, as "that wot makes the motor go." For reasons, Sheffield has to be passed by, and thus the chance is lost of seeing the home and nursery of its Simplex car behaving so splendidly in the hands of the Man at the Wheel who, while expecting it, yet marvels at the sensitive steering, instant response to every demand, and subtle buoyancy. Partly of set purpose, and partly by fortuitous circumstance, the journey does not include any of the famous manufacturing towns, and so it is that comment arises among the party on the almost entire lack of evidence to be seen, over all these many miles, of England's mighty business that yearly swells her imports and exports to giddy figures. Once, in the distance, is seen a forest of tall chimney-stacks, sprouting apparently from the ploughed fields like some strange fungus-growths of giant proportions, but these are quickly lost below the horizon. While lunching amidst gorse in sight of luckless Selby, another road craft sweeps majestically into sight, and, by her lines, is instantly recognised as a twin sister. A kindly signal of inquiry from her if help is needed meets with "All's well," and she forges on. It is remarked how friendly people are in these parts, even carters proving anxious to give fullest passage. A smiling and homely country-side unfolds itself to the car's easy progress right up to York, where the party instantly gravitate to the mighty Minster and give rein to imaginative fancies conjured up by the superb lines and stupendous proportions of aisles and transept, chapels and nave, before leaving for a time all such transcendent works of man for the vaster creations of nature—the soul-expanding moors that indelibly impress on the mind's eye their colouring, their distances, and their grandeur.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE POWERS AND CHINA

By Lancelot Lawton

Russia has been compelled to present to China several strongly worded notes before securing an adequate measure of compliance with her demands. The last of these documents took the form of an ultimatum, to which was attached a three days' limit. As a consequence, a certain amount of anxiety was felt in London concerning the situation, and some business was transacted at Lloyds in insurance against war risks. When, however, six weeks ago I plainly stated that no fear of hostilities need be entertained, I was merely voicing the opinion of all those who can lay claim to any knowledge of the position of affairs in China to-day. In the conduct of foreign relations the Central Government is powerless to maintain a firm attitude, for the simple reason that at its back there is no military force such as could resist for a single day the attack of a European Power. As a means of escaping from the recurrent dilemmas in which this national weakness places her, China has no other alternative than to resort to irritating methods of subtle procrastination. Hence, as Russia recently discovered, the only known way of bringing a stubborn Wai-wu-pu to reason is that which finds abrupt expression in an ultimatum supported by a demonstration of force. In the case of negotiations between first-class Powers, stern measures such as these would certainly justify widespread alarm. But with China in her present condition there can be no question of resistance: the judicious exertion of pressure is sufficient to induce her to adopt an attitude of compliance. While this circumstance may suit the immediate purpose of certain countries having close relations with China, the general state of governmental impotence it discloses must sooner or later shape a crisis of international concern. Nor when the various conflicting elements which have produced this utter helplessness are examined critically do we find anything calculated to allay anxiety. On the contrary, the closer the analysis the stronger grows the belief that China resembles a volcano from the crater of which may be seen emerging the ominous signs of impending eruption.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Let us at the outset frankly recognise that China has not received consistent fair play at the hands of the Powers. In 1894-5 Japan elbowed her out of Korea and compelled her to cede Formosa. Then Russia entered into military occupation of the three Eastern Provinces, at the same time forcing her to conclude a secret "alliance" which provided for joint Russian and Chinese action in defence of "mutual interests!" To restore the balance of Western power in the Far East, Germany seized Kiaochau and Great Britain hoisted her flag in Wei-hai-wei. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance followed, and it was expressly stipulated that one of the objects of this Treaty was the maintenance of China's integrity. Other Powers, in a series of agreements and understandings, affirmed the same pious principle. In 1904 Japan blazoned forth that she was going to war for the purpose of expelling Russia from Manchuria and restoring the territory to the sovereignty of China. As soon as peace was concluded all the Powers without exception again solemnly signified their determination to uphold the integrity of China. And thereupon, with indecent haste, Japan and Russia fell to dividing between themselves all that was worth having in Manchuria. This brief summary of the relations of the Powers with China during the past fifteen years does not take into account the sordid haggling which has characterised the negotiations for railway and other concessions, or the primitive measures adopted from time to time to exact indemnities whenever foreign lives or interests have been involved.

While, from the Western point of view, the ways of the Chinese in diplomacy may seem peculiar, it is equally certain that, to Chinese eyes, the methods adopted by the nations of Europe in the conduct of their foreign relations must appear utterly incomprehensible. It would indeed be difficult, if not impossible, to cite a single treaty of any importance relating to the Far East which did not set forth in pompous phraseology that its object was the preservation of the integrity of China and the maintenance of the Open Door. Yet, in spite of this lofty unanimity of disinterested motive, the Chinese Empire has been shorn of vast territories. As far as Manchuria is concerned, it may with truth be said that although the sign "Open Door" is displayed boldly enough outside its borders, owing to the presence of the Japanese and Russians, there is literally no room within, not even for the nominal owners of the region—the Chinese themselves. When, therefore, we see startling announcements to the effect that the Chinese are developing a strongly anti-foreign tendency, we ought to ask ourselves whether there is any particular reason why they should do otherwise. If we were frankly to concede that they, too, have their point of view, we would find it possible to appreciate to some extent the extraordinary difficulties with which they are beset, and thus to form a just estimate of a situation that at no time has ceased to threaten complications of world-wide significance.

The progressive forces throughout the Empire seek to accomplish the downfall of the Manchu dynasty, at whose door they lay all the blame for foreign aggression. Responding to this agitation, the Central Government not infrequently refuses, as in the case of Russia, to comply with demands that are perfectly reasonable. In the end it has no other alternative than surrender, a course which involves "loss of face" and adds fuel to the fire of internal discontent. What China lacks at present is the constructive genius of a Bismarck. Time has proved that the sending of Yuan Shih-kai into retirement deprived her of the only leader capable of inspiring the Administration with sincerity of purpose and honesty of method. Moreover, he alone among the statesmen of China possessed the requisite influence to bring about cohesion in the ranks of the reform movement so as to employ it in building up, out of the existing chaos, the structure of a healthy Government. Undisciplined, this reform movement betrays a perversion of energy in revolutionary and anti-foreign agitation. Thus is the State exposed to perils from that very patriotism which should be its safeguard.

In the circumstances it is not difficult to realise that, by reason of their own weakness, the rulers of China are placed in a peculiar predicament. In dealings with the Powers, apart altogether from considerations of the justice, or otherwise, of their cause, they are constantly compelled to pay deference to popular sentiment. Hence, while all the time well knowing that they are not backed by military force, they make a brave show of asserting their rights until the eleventh hour is at hand and surrender becomes imperative. The friends of China fear, however, lest some day her dilatory tactics in diplomacy bring disaster, and that one or other of the Powers, driven to exasperation and perhaps predisposed to make capital out of the occasion, should invade her territories. Then there is a danger, ever present, that compliance with foreign demands, whether reasonable or not, may fan into flame the widespread discontent which, from a variety of causes, has made itself manifest under the rule of the Manchu dynasty. Rebellion in China on any serious scale would call for the intervention of the Powers—a contingency which, because of international jealousies, could hardly fail to be attended with grave risk of a general conflagration. Recognising, then, their obligations to the cause of peace, it is devoutly to be hoped that the nations of the West, while sacrificing nothing of dignity in their dealings with an enfeebled China, will pursue a policy based on the principle of noblesse oblige, and that only in the last extreme will they resort to stern measures such as those which Russia found it necessary to employ in the crisis now happily at an end.

NEW AND FORTHCOMING BOOKS

Lord Roberts, undoubtedly the most hard-working patriot of the century, has managed to find time to write a strong reply to the questionable arguments set forth by Sir Ian Hamilton and others in "Compulsory Service." The book is looked forward to with interest by all who have the solution of the Army problem at heart. It is promised, under the title of "Fallacies and Ideas," by Mr. John Murray at the end of the present month. Mr. Cyril Rhodes, Honorary Secretary of the Albert Committee, equally concerned with Naval welfare, has obtained a translation of the text of the German Navy law. Any one sending a stamped-addressed wrapper to him at 30, Charing-cross, S.W., will receive a free copy by return. "King Edward VII. as Sportsman" promises to be a most valuable work not only from the fact that it concerns the life of our late King, but also because of the writers who have united to compile the volume. Lord Marcus Beresford has assisted the editor, Mr.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A. E. T. Watson, with regard to the King's breeding and racing stud. Lord Ribblesdale, unfortunately prevented by his accident from writing the chapter concerning hunting, has handed over his notes to Mr. Watson. The yachting chapters are by Sir Seymour Fortescue, while the Marquess of Ripon and Lord Walsingham have written of the shooting at Sandringham. The book is to be published by Messrs. Longmans in May. The same firm also announce the autobiography of George Goschen, First Viscount Goschen, written by the Hon. Arthur Elliot, and which contains correspondence from Cobden, Gladstone, Sir William Harcourt, and others.

Mr. Arthur T. Dasent's work on "The Speakers of the House of Commons" will shortly appear through Mr. John Lane. It deals with the matter, however, in quite a different spirit to that in which Mr. Hilaire Belloc lately treated it in "The Party System." Messrs. J. M. Dent and Sons concern themselves more with prose and poetry of classic fame than modern fiction. In their new French series will be numbered the poems of De Musset, Balzac's "Père Goriot," Châteaubriand's "Atala" and "René," and Voltaire's "Philosophy." Miss Monica Gardner's study of "Adam Mickiewicz, the National Poet of Poland," Browning's "Ring and the Book," and "The Old Yellow Book," translated by Professor Charles Hodell, are also announced by this firm. Mr. M. J. Landa's work, "The Alien Problem and its Remedy," will be brought out early in April by Messrs. P. S. King. It is a close study of the Alien question treated from a new standpoint, and will undoubtedly prove of value. A rather curious book is the "Life and Letters of Sir John Hall, M.D., K.C.B.," principal Medical Officer of the Crimea, written by a Hindu, Mr. S. M. Mitra; it will be published by Messrs. Longmans. Messrs. Chatto and Windus announce a new collection of Essays and Stories by R. L. Stevenson, entitled "Lay Morals and other Papers." Messrs. Lynwood and Co. have a quite promising list of fiction, which includes "A Maid of the Malverns," by Mr. T. H. Porter, late of St. John's College, Cambridge, which concerns the times of Ben Jonson; Miss Slieve Foy's "An Unnatural Mother," a worldly story; "Love and the People," by Miss E. A. Stewart, a study of social reformers; "The Serpent,' a story of Buckinghamshire, by Miss Winifred May Scott; and, though this is more fact than fiction, "The Book of the English Oak," by Mr. Charles Hurst.

Messrs. Greening are bringing out a novel on the theme of "A Fool There Was," Mr. Herbert Sleath's production at the Queen's Theatre, the author being Mr. Porter Emerson Browne. They also announce Mr. William Caine's latest effort, "The Devil in Solution"—another skit of the "Boom" type; "The Man with the Red Beard," by David Whitelaw; "King Philip the Gay," a delicate satire upon "Zenda," by Mr. Reginald Turner; and Mr. Collins's "Four Millions a Year?" which is a question many of us think we should be able to answer without any hesitation. Little Tich, besides being an artist of the footlights, has turned his hand to the art of writing. The same firm will publish his humorous autobiography, replete with photographic illustrations. They are also issuing Miss May Wynne's latest romance, "The Master Wit," and a new "shilling shocker" by Mr. Guy Thorne, entitled "Divorce."

THE GREAT OIL OCTOPUS*

I HAVE often wondered whether there is not some curse upon oil, whether the gods do not resent man's handling of this strange product. Why else does oil arouse the vilest passions? Wherever we go we find the same thing. Baku is outside the influence of the Standard Oil, yet the history of that great field is the history of intrigue, dishonesty, ruin, and (of late years) battle and sudden death. There are not half a dozen successful concerns in Baku to-day. I doubt if there are three. In another Russian oilfield—Grosny—there are only two prosperous companies. In Mexico we have seen the most amusing oil war of modern times—an immense (so-called) oilfield, whose production until a few months ago was not sufficient to keep a couple of dozen railway engines running. In Burmah one company alone appears to have been able to subsist. It made large profits, but the rest have lived upon hope and fresh capital. The Dutch Indies stand out as a successful and profitable oilfield. California is prospering. Roumania and Galicia, after years of struggle and bitterness, are now moderately successful. But the failures everywhere are as the hairs of our head for number. The successes may be counted upon the fingers of our hands—Nobel, Spies, Stoop, Samuel, Deterding, Bergheim, Balfour Williamson, and Rockefeller. Nature abhors excess, and the oil trade suffers from excess. Your oil comes in volumes, swamps you clean out, catches you unprepared, and drowns you and your market. When you have made all your plans and can save your oil, you find the market against you and the price falls. You must pump or die. If you cap your wells others will pump alongside you and suck your oil away. If you all pump together no one makes money. The oil trade breeds hatred, jealousy, and greed. You are obsessed by the illusion that your oil is valuable. Your imagination is inflamed by legends of the Rockefeller wealth. All your worst instincts are aroused. You hate everybody, you suspect everybody. No business has produced more violent literature. If you desire a lesson in vituperation read the screeds printed about Standard Oil—Mr. Henry D. Lloyd's "Wealth and Commonwealth," Mr. Lawson's "Frenzied Finance," the excited outpourings of Miss Ida M. Tarbell, or "The Great Oil Octopus," which is a reprint of some articles that appeared in Truth.

This book sets forth in detail the hideous crimes of the Standard Oil Trust. It tells us how John D. Rockefeller taught in a Sunday-school, how he did worse than teach, how he actually trained his tender offspring in the same vicious indulgence. It appears from this book that Mr. Rockefeller is a Baptist—nay, worse, "a good Baptist." This must be pretty bad. But this oil-devouring Baptist has apparently gathered round him men worse than himself. Henry H. Rogers is called "considerate, kindly, generous, helpful," "a relentless, ravenous creation, as pitiless as a shark, knowing no law of God or Man"—all in one breath! The poor man is dead. But he has been succeeded by such awe-inspiring figures as John Dustin Archbold, who has been accused of attempting to blow up his rivals and has also incurred the displeasure of Mr. Randolph Hearst. A somewhat less active villain in the piece is Henry M. Flagler, who actually built hotels along the coast of Florida, and seems, somehow or another, to have induced rich Americans to live in them. Others are mentioned, and in most cases their religion is set forth. "Many of them were Scotch Presbyterians;" one was an Irish Catholic. He also died leaving millions of ill-gotten gains. Having duly set forth the list of names, and religions, our anonymous author proceeds to warm up the old old stories of the Standard Oil, beginning with its misdeeds in 1868, and ending with a suggestion that it is now causing the revolution in Mexico.

Here we have a very fine example of Oil the demon disturbing the simple paths of literature. There is no attempt made to set forth both sides of the question. There is not the slightest sign that the author has ever been on an oilfield;

* The Great Oil Octopus. By Truth's Investigator. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

that he has studied the economy of oil transport, storage, and finance. He does not seem to realise that the Standard Oil was just as inevitable in America as Nobels were in Baku, or the Royal Dutch in the Indies. He does not understand that the cold, hard, silent Rockefeller was just as essential to the success of the effervescent oil industry as Parnell was to the wild Irishry of the 'eighties. Oil is ebullient, uncontrollable, excitable, explosive, dangerous. Rockefeller is cool, calm, saving, and sound. If he had not organised the oil industry another of the same temperament would have arisen. The oil-miner and well-sinker of the early days could never have made an organiser. He was the pioneer, with all the dash and courage of the pioneer, but not the business instinct. This Rockefeller supplied; the combine made for complete success. Our anonymous friend the author does not know that S. O. Burmah and Shell for some years lived peacefully and prosperously and that Shell itself declared war in the present crisis. He talks about the vast oilfields of Mexico, but does not know their production. He is quite unaware that in California Standard Oil lives at peace with its neighbours and competitors. A real history of the astounding Standard Oil Trust has yet to be written. Some one will write it one day when all the jealousies have died down, all the bitterness forgotten. It is the greatest business enterprise the world has ever seen. It understands the art of advertisement so well that after I had read this book I came to the conclusion that the writer must be one of those pressmen of whom he speaks so disparagingly, whose general gets £12,500 a year. There is so much clap-trap, so much bounce, and so many allusions to the marvellous genius of Standard Oil that I think "The Great Oil Octopus" must have been penned by one of the raw hands in either 26, Broadway or Queen Anne's-gate. If Mr. Usmar is responsible, I cannot congratulate him upon his choice of authors. He should at least have picked a man who knows the oil trade.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THIS has been a Rothschild week. Ever and again this great House wakes up and shows the world its power. Some of its Brazilian loans have been poorly received, but the present issue is almost like a glorified short-dated note. The yield is high and the price tempting. I am glad to see that the loan is earmarked. Those who said the money was wanted for rubber valorisation were very wrong indeed. Yet Brazil, being in funds, may divert some of the money to the Bank of Brazil and its rubber schemes. Wise, Speke and Company and Boultons, of Montenegro fame, have made an issue of 7 per cent. preference shares in a Canadian Chemical Company, whose name is too long to print. It may be left for those who have an intimate knowledge of Canadian chemicals. The Argentine vineyard promotion handled by Haes and Sons might also be disregarded. It was peculiar because the promoters were honest and admitted a loss. I hear that a market will be made, and I suggest that the shares, said to have been subscribed in the Argentine, will one day be offered here. I never knew any Argentine capitalist who took shares in one of his own companies.

There is more than enough MONEY to go round, and the Bank Rate will fall to 2½ per cent. Consols are still cheap. I notice some stupid person suggests that the bear selling of Consols should be made illegal. Under Leemans Bank Act you are not permitted to sell short of Bank Shares, and now it is asked that Consols should be included. Some people have remarkable ideas about that hated creature the bear. He is the most useful person in the economy of our City. It is the bear who stiffens a market. Many panics have been stayed by the repurchases of bears. There is nothing so strong as a bear market or so weak as one composed of bulls. Those who buy what they cannot pay for must lose money. Those who sell what they can't deliver must buy back sooner or later. The bear almost always makes money, the bull "goes broke."

FOREIGNERS are simply stupid, for Paris thinks that the Ehrhard failure has so weakened the Parquet that at least three more Agents de Change will fail. There is no Bourse in the world with such stupid regulations as those that govern the Paris Bourse. The French are filled with pride because the other members of the Parquet have paid up the losses of their fellow members, but if the net result is to ruin three other men I fail to see the advantage. Tintos must go better because the bull account carried by Ehrhard has been got rid of.

HOME RAILS seem stronger than ever. I confess that I expected a reaction, but the investor now sees that he will not long be allowed to secure gilt-edged stocks that pay 4 per cent. and over, and he wisely buys when he can. Great Northern A "have been the feature," as the commercial reporter phrases it; they made up 51½ and they have touched 54. The speculator likes a cheap stock like this; it costs less to carry. This same type of person has also paid his unwelcome attentions to Great Centrals; the preferred made up at 29 and rose to 34. Great Eastern is another favourite of the punter, and has also risen. I think this stock will see another ten points rise. I repeat each week my story, and when all the stocks are at the very top it is just possible that my advice will be taken.

YANKEES.—I am most doubtful about the American market. It is just steady, and no more. Short-dated bills pour in upon us and are rapidly absorbed. But we are not gambling. I think we are wise. Perhaps the Wall Street plungers will sell so short in view of the Supreme Court Decision that the bankers may give a few turns to the screw and squeeze the bears. But the decision cannot be given until April 3rd, and may even be delayed a week. In the meantime, no one can lose money by keeping away from Yankee Rails, though as I write the feeling in the City is good. But when London is good Wall Street always sells upon us. They are still bullish in Montreal and New York about Can Pacs, but the rise has been carried to an extreme point.

RUBBER.—The sales fell flat. Prices dwindled, and the jobbers in the House turned round and sold short of Linggis, Vels, and all the other stocks in which there is a free market. Mr. Wickham, the father of the plantation industry, and our greatest authority on fine, hard cured Para, has been telling a Ceylon reporter one or two hard facts about plantation rubber. Pretty as it looks in its nice amber sheets, this cruel man says it is not rubber, but only a good substitute. I have always held this, and I know that the big buyers won't look at plantation. Therefore the prices must fall below that of fine hard-cured Para as soon as the quantity sent home reaches the amount required to saturate the market. But this does not mean that there will be no market for plantation. It only means that the growers will be compelled to take lower prices, which they can well afford to do. Damansara report was good, and the company will give us 400,000lb. this year and pay 100 per cent. dividend, a little under 15 per cent. return at present prices. The shares are therefore cheap. The "outside shows" are becoming more demoralised each week. Get out if you can, and never buy anything except Malay properties. This is a golden rule.

OILS have had quite a little spurt. This was probably due to the nervousness of the bears. There is vague talk of a settlement of the dispute between Standard and Shell. These wars never last very long. Spies have risen and may go higher, for the company is doing well. Mexican Eagles are talked about, but I see no reason to buy this week. However, the whole oil market is cheerful. Do not be deluded into buying the Galician Oil Trust shares; let those who hold them keep them.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

KAFFIRS.—The good feeling in the Kaffir market grows each day, and as most of the bulls have now been shaken out we may see the big houses come in and buy, to encourage the French, who have more shares than they like. The whole policy of the Rand magnates is of course to make one final grand boom, unload every share they possess, and then wish the Rand and its mines a very polite good day. But they cannot make the boom at the moment. Nevertheless it looks as though the hour were approaching.

RHODESIANS.—Here also the sick and weakly have been destroyed utterly and their shares have been annexed by lenders of money and such-like vultures who prey upon the dead and dying in the City. The Globe report was a good one. Robert Williams goes to Benguella in a few weeks, and thence to the Cape, to see how his Copper looks. The selling of Tanks has stopped for the moment. Jumbos look cheap at 10s.

MISCELLANEOUS.—Omnibus shares don't fall, notwithstanding their inflated price. The 'cute people are picking up Spiers and Pond at rubbish prices, and talk of Joe Lyons getting control. This he denies with energy. The Armament shares are all strong, and the Armstrong report is excellent. These stocks are the pick of the basket. Electric Lights are neglected, and offer the best chance of making money in the House. Cements still rise, and those who buy are both rich and confident.

EGYPT.—Salmony got up a little boom on his own last Saturday—a day always consecrated to small private demonstrations. I think that the fall in Egyptians has gone far enough, and the best shares are cheap. National Banks are good, Khedivial Mails are cheap, and if any speculative rise comes along Delta Lands must go up, not because they are intrinsically sound but because they are a good gambling counter.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

DR. ARNOT

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In connection with Mr. Harris's question respecting Dr. Arnot in his article, "History and the Hearts of Kings," in the current ACADEMY, it may interest some of your readers to know that, as surgeon of the 20th Foot, Arnot was in attendance on Napoleon at St. Helena. He was a Dumfriesshire man, born in the neighbourhood of Ecclefechan, and on the gravestone that marks his place of sepulture, only a few yards separating it from that of the Carlyles, in the churchyard of the little village, it is recorded that "he was held in high esteem by the illustrious exile, whose last moments he soothed." This being so, it is a natural inference that Dr. Arnot "assisted with Dr. Antommarchi in handling the body of Napoleon."—Yours, &c.,

J. GRIGOR.

14, Crofton Road, Camberwell, March 21.

"WHEN WOMAN LOVES"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In his unpleasant review of my new novel, "When Woman Loves," in your issue dated March 25th, your critic declares "in one portion the reader is left in doubt as to whether Mr. Hoskins was unpacking the chorus of a famous opera from his bag or singing the refrain while the bag was being unpacked."

Here is the sentence to which he refers:—"Upstairs she (his landlady, Mrs. Sloane) could hear Mr. Hoskins singing while he unpacked, 'The Soldiers' Chorus' from 'Faust.'"

Now if he were not "singing the refrain while the bag was being unpacked," Mrs. Sloane in another room must have been able to tell what books her master was unpacking upstairs—without seeing them—a remarkable feat of telepathy!

Apart from all this, the mistake would of course be utterly impossible to any one acquainted with the ordinary use of the comma in English prose.

That my book has left your critic "unentertained," that he considers the plot "poor," the characters "miserably-drawn," proves nothing except that we are out of sympathy with each other. All this is fair comment, but a false charge of careless, illiterate writing I feel may be replied to without laying oneself open to the charge of over-sensitiveness.

RATHMELL WILSON.

Rupert Street, W., March 24th.

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—No accusation of illiteracy was made against Mr. Rathmell Wilson; I desired to point out that his ideas of sequence in composition are not those which are generally accepted, and that his sense of the possibilities of the English language might have been keener.

THE REVIEWER.

"THAN WHOM"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In considering the case of the relative pronoun preceded by "than" (ACADEMY, March 11th), it seems strange that no reference has ever been made to other languages than English. In Latin, for example, when a comparison is instituted "than" is frequently followed by the ablative; thus—

Scimus solem majorem esse terrâ or

Scimus solem majorem terrâ are both grammatical, and Cicero writes

Amicitia, quâ nihil melius habemus, the effect of the rule being to place the second member of the comparison in the ablative—a result that seems both just and logical, seeing that the second member is certainly subordinate to the first.

There can, I think, be little doubt that when Milton wrote

> Which when Beelzebub perceived—than whom,
> Satan except, none higher sat—with grave
> Aspect he rose, and in his rising seemed > A pillar of state—("Paradise Lost," ii., 299-302)

the poet was influenced by the Latin idiom, as in other instances throughout that poem; and that, had he undertaken to translate the passage into Latin, he would have rendered "than whom" by quô.

Is it not more natural to hear people in ordinary conversation—that is, outside of purely literary and Parliamentary circles—say "better than me," "older than her," rather than "better than I," "older than she," inasmuch as the latter expressions are often apt to sound more or less affected, pedantic, and lacking in euphony? What, indeed, is the essential difference between the two colloquialisms—"He is considered a better musician than me" and "As a musician he is to be preferred to me"? The French have clearly divined the difference, for they call the first "me" a complément direct, and the second a complément indirect, if I am not mistaken.

This, however, is a question that is not likely to be settled solely by rules of grammar arbitrarily enforced; so that a wide dissimilarity will always exist between spoken and written English.

N. W. H.

New York, March 21.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

Nina. By Rosaline Masson. Macmillan and Co. 6s.
A Rogue in Ambush. By Headon Hill. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
Dead Man's Love. By Tom Gallon. Illustrated. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.
Leslie's Lovers. By Anne Warner. T. Fisher Unwin. 6s.
Mrs. Elmsley. By Hector Munro. Constable and Co. 6s.
Geoffrey Sanclair. By Horace Caradoc. Constable and Co. 6s.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Dick Comerford's Wager. By A. P. Crouch. Robert Scott. 6s.
The Jewess. By Mulvy Ouseley. John Ouseley. 6s.
Some Happenings of Glendalyne. By Dorothea Conyers. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Mediaeval Mind: A History of the Development of Thought and Emotion in the Middle Ages. By Henry Osborn Taylor. 2 vols. Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.
Revolutionary Ireland and Its Settlement. By the Rev. Robert H. Murray, Litt.D. With an Introduction by the Rev. J. P. Mahaffy, D D., C.V.O. Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.
Dr. Henry Coward, the Pioneer Chorus-Master. By J. A. Rodgers. Illustrated. John Lane. 2s. 6d. net.
"Pie-Powder," being Dust from the Law Courts. Collected and Recollected on the Western Circuit. By a Circuit Tramp. John Murray. 5s. net.
The Lord Chancellors of Scotland, from the Institution of the Office to the Treaty of Union. By Samuel Cowan, J.P. 2 vols. With Portraits. W. and A. K. Johnston. 21s. net.
The Book of Ceremonial Magic, including the Rites and Mysteries of Goëtic Theurgy, Sorcery, and Infernal Necromancy. By Arthur Edward Waite. Illustrated. Wm. Rider and Son. 15s. net.
Canada and the Empire. By W. R. Lawson. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.
The Life of Field-Marshal Sir Frederick Paul Haines. By Robert S. Bait. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.
A History of the New England Fisheries. By Raymond McFarland, A.M. With Maps. D. Appleton and Co., New York. $2.
Handbook of American Indians North of Mexico. Edited by F. W. Hodge. Part II. Illustrated. Smithsonian Institution, Washington, U.S.A.
Elkanah Settle, His Life and Works. By F. C. Brown. Cambridge University Press. 5s. net.
The Amazing Duchess: Being the Romantic History of Elizabeth Chudleigh, Maid of Honour, the Hon. Mrs. Hervey, Duchess of Kingston, and Countess of Bristol. By Charles E. Pearce. 2 vols. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 24s. net.
Talleyrand the Man. From the French of "La Vie Privée de Talleyrand" by Bernard de Lacombe. Translated by A. D'Alberti. Illustrated. Herbert and Daniel. 15s. net.
Eastern Asia: a History. By Ian C. Hannah, M.A. The Second Edition of "A Brief History of Eastern Asia," entirely rewritten. T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.
London Clubs, their History and Treasures. By Ralph Nevill. Illustrated. Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.
Le Origini del Canto Popolare in Calabria: Note Critiche. By Professor Ida Pia Tucci. With a Preface by Fanny Zampini Salazar. Office of "Il Giornale di Calabria," Cosenza, Italy. 3 lire.
Rachel: her Stage Life and her Real Life. By Francis Gribble. With Portraits. Chapman and Hall. 15s. net.
The Militant Suffrage Movement: Emancipation in a Hurry. By Teresa Billington-Greig. Frank Palmer. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Marriage and Divorce: Some Needed Reforms in Church and State. (Woman Citizen Series. No. I.). By Cecil Chapman, Metropolitan Magistrate. David Nutt. 2s. net
A History of British Mammals. (Part V.) By Gerald E. H. Barrett-Hamilton, F.Z.S. Illustrated by Edward A. Wilson. Gurney and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.
Abnormal Psychology. By Isador H. Coriat, M.D. Wm. Rider and Son. 5s. net.
Victoria and Albert Museum Guides: The Salting Collection. Illustrated. H.M. Stationery Office. 4d.
The World of Dreams. By Havelock Ellis. Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Shady Gardens. By T. W. Sanders, F.L.S. Illustrated. London Agricultural and Horticultural Association. 1d.
Adventure, Sport and Travel on the Tibetan Steppes. By W. N. Fergusson. F.R.G.S. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 16s. net.
The Theory and Practice of Trade Unionism. By J. H. Greenwood, B.Sc. With a Preface by Sidney Webb. A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.
Shakespeare's "Twelfth Night," adapted for Amateur Performance in Girls' Schools. By Elsie Fogerty. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 6d. net.
The Corner of Harley Street. Being some Familiar Correspondence of Peter Harding, M.D. Constable and Co. 4s. 6d. net.

READERS OF "THE ACADEMY" WILL BE INTERESTED IN

JOHN MASEFIELD'S NEW NOVEL

THE STREET OF TO-DAY

WHICH IS

NOW READY

At all Libraries and Booksellers.

"By the Street of to-day, Man goes to the House of to-morrow."

Crown 8vo., 6s.

"As we read it we never lose sight of the fact that we are getting the views of a man who counts on matters that count."
—Morning Post.

JAMES DOUGLAS in The Star.—"It is full of fine prose and fine thinking and fine imagining. There is hardly a common page in the book."

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
29-31, Bedford Street, Strand, W.C.

The Belmont Book. By "Vados." With an Introduction by Arnold Bennett. Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.
Death: Its Causes and Phenomena, with Special Reference to Immortality. By Hereward Carrington and John R. Meader. Frontispiece. Wm. Rider and Son. 8s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

Histoires et Leçons de Choses. By Mme. Pape-Carpentier. Adapted and Edited by M. Rolleston, M.A. With Notes, &c. Macmillan and Co. 1s.
Charlotte Corday: Tragédie en Cinq Actes. By François Ponsard. With Notes, &c. Macmillan and Co. 1s.

THEOLOGY

Die Religion Babyloniens und Assyriens. By Morris Jastrow, Jun Alfred Töpelmann, Giessen. 1m. 50pf.
Forms of Prayer, with Thanksgiving to Almighty God. Commended by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York for general use on 22nd June, 1911. S.P.C.K. 1d.
The Ever-Coming Kingdom of God: a Discussion on Religious Progress. By Bernhard Duhm, D.D. Translated by Dr. A. Duff. A. and C. Black. 2s. 6d. net.

VERSE

The Border of the Lake. By Agnes Lee. Sherwan, French and Co., Boston, U.S.A. $1 net.

PERIODICALS

London Diocese Book for 1911; Official Year-book of the Church of England; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Top-Notch; Revue Bleue; Ainslee's Magazine; Peru To-day; Good Health; Modern Language Teaching: Atlantic Monthly; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Windsor Magazine; Cambridge University Reporter; The Triad; Book-Prices Current, Part II., 1911; The Economic Journal; Literary Digest; Social Guide, 1911; The Child; The Antiquary; Everybody's Story Magazine; Friendly Greetings; Sunday at Home; Girl's Own Paper and Woman's Magazine; Boy's Own Paper.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SAARBURG MOSELLE

GUTTA CONTRA GOUTTE

THE SAARBURG MOSELLE Co. LIMITED

London Office:

28, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', S.W.

Cellars:

TRIER A/D MOSEL AND GEISENHEIM

Speciality

STILL AND SPARKLING SAARBURG MOSELLES

The Moselle Wines are grown on a dry, sandy soil; contrary to Clarets and Hocks, which are grown on chalk or slate. Therefore this Wine is recommended by the Medical Profession specially to those subject to Gout, and consequently forbidden to drink other Wines.

We can specially recommend the three following Wines: "White Label," "Mauve Label," and "Green Label," which are now in very fine condition.

Samples and Price List on application.

Supplied to all First-class Hotels and Restaurants.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25 Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2031 [Registered as a Newspaper.] APRIL 8, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-cab.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4·4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p.—BOTH 6 CYLINDERS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—Middleton & Townsend, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh.
LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—The Hollingdrake Automobile Co., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—George Ace, Ltd., Warren Street, Tenby.
AUSTRALIA:—Murray Aunger, Ltd., Adelaide, S.A. Moulder Brothers, Sydney, N.S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE, 9, Arundel Street, W.C.

EDINBURGH MERCHANT COMPANY SCHOOLS.

DANIEL STEWART'S COLLEGE FOR BOYS.

HEAD MASTERSHIP.

Owing to the approaching retiral of Mr. W. Wallace Dunlop, M.A., the Merchant Company Education Board invite applications for the position of HEAD MASTER at Daniel Stewart's College for Boys, one of the Endowed Secondary Schools of the Edinburgh Merchant Company. The yearly salary has been fixed at £600. Candidates must not be over 45 years of age, and must be Graduates (with Honours) of a British University. The successful applicant will enter on full duty on 3rd October next, but is expected to assist in making the arrangements previous to the opening of the session. Applications, with testimonials (26 copies of each, which will not be returned), must be lodged with the subscriber on or before 24th April. Applicants must state (1) Professional Training; (2) Nature of University Degree; (3) Experience; (4) Age; and (5) Present position.

Candidates are specially requested not to call upon members of the Board.

ALEX. HERON, Secretary.
The Merchants' Hall, Edinburgh,
24th March, 1911.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY LONDON, E.C.

JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

HIBBERT LECTURES ON THE HIGHER ASPECTS OF GREEK RELIGION.

The FIRST COURSE of a NEW SERIES OF HIBBERT LECTURES will be given by L. R. FARNELL, D.Litt., Wilde Lecturer in the University of Oxford, on "The Higher Aspects of Greek Religion."

The Lectures will be delivered in the UNIVERSITY OF LONDON, South Kensington, on TUESDAYS, April 25th, May 2nd, 9th, 16th, 23rd, and 30th, at Half-past Three o'clock in the afternoon.

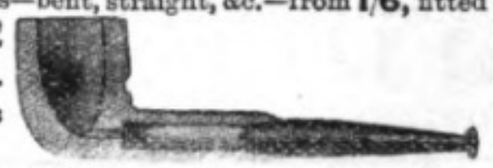
Admission by ticket without payment. Application for tickets should be made to Messrs. Williams and Norgate, 14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, not later than April 15th, and as soon as possible after that date tickets will be issued to as many persons as the Hall will accommodate.

FRANCIS H. JONES,
Secretary to the Hibbert Trustees.

SHEPHERD'S EXHIBITION OF EARLY BRITISH MASTERS
includes works by

Gainsborough	Wilson	Cotman
Raeburn	Crome	Chandler
Lawrence	Constable	Downman, &c.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY,
27, King Street., St. James's, S.W.



TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., LIMITED.

P.H. PHENOMENAL SUCCESS.
Eleventh Edition in the Press. Crown 8vo., cloth, price 6s.

THE BROAD HIGHWAY: A Romance of Kent.
By JEFFERY FARNOL.

Daily Telegraph.—"A series of incidents as swift as any of the romances of Dumas." Standard.—"To those who know their Borrow and Jeffries it will come with pleasure and surprise." Sphere.—"A fine breath of the open country, a Borrovian sense of vagabondage." Evening Standard.—"With the exception of Mr. Wells, I do not know a living writer who could bear his reader so buoyantly through five hundred packed pages as Mr. Farnol bears him." Sportsman.—"There is a Dickens touch in not a few passages."

Now Ready. Demy 8vo., gilt, gilt top, buckram. Illustrated. Price 10s. 6d. net.

FROM MEMORY'S SHRINE. By CARMEN SYLVA.
Being Personal Reminiscences of H.M. Queen Elizabeth of Roumania.

Ask for These At Your Library

THE INNOCENT MURDERERS. 6s. By W. JOHNSON and WEST.
THE PHARAOH AND THE PRIEST. 6s. net. An Historical Novel of Ancient Egypt.
MATTHEW STRONG. 6s. By Mrs. FRANCIS.
IN THE SHADOW OF PA-MENKH. 6s. By DORA LANGLIOS.
LEMUEL OF THE LEFT HAND. 6s. By ALFRED CLARK.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & CO., Ltd., 100, Southwark Street, S.E.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	411
Prima Vera	412
William Cowper and the "Olney Hymns"—I.	412
Proportional Representation	413
Sanctuaries	414
Reviews:—
Chesterton or Dickens?	416
Tertullian's Paradox	417
Dreams and Profits	418
Carmen Sylva's Early Reminiscences	419
Was Montaigne a Pamphleteer?	420
The Wisdom of Wonder	421
The Valley of the Shadow	421
Shorter Reviews	422
Fiction	423
The Theatre	425
Guy de Maupassant	427
The Poet's Holiday—V.	429
The Authorised Version	430
Some New French Books	431
A Jesuit Bathing-pool	433
The Launch of H.M.S. Monarch	434
Royal Society af Arts	434
Foreign Affairs	435
The Salting Collection	436
In the Temple of Mammon	437
Correspondence	438
Books Received	439

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

So much is said about the necessity for the Reform of the House of Lords that a matter which is of far more pressing importance—namely, the Reform of the House of Commons—is often completely lost sight of. Sir Guilford Molesworth has brought together cogent facts* which compel attention to a subject of such great importance. Repeating a criticism which lately appeared in these columns, the writer quotes Lecky thus:—"In England no one can be insensible to the change in the tone of the House of Commons within the memory of living men." Mr. Balfour has, we observe, chidden Lord Hugh Cecil for clearly setting forth facts which are well known to those who have been immersed in politics quite as long as Mr. Balfour. Mr. Balfour, however, is a leader who is quite open to be led, and a perusal of Sir Guilford Molesworth's little volume will be a useful initiatory step in his conversion. Herbert Spencer wrote in "The Coming Slavery:" "Representatives are unconscientious enough to vote for Bills which they believe to be wrong in principle because party needs and regard for the next election demand it." No wonder Mr. Asquith, with the wholly unnecessary and entirely reprehensible measure of payment of Members in view, went into rhapsodies over what he called Mr. Balfour's "finest vindication of the representative and independent character of the House of Commons that had ever been made"! Amenities between the front benches are graceful and very pretty fooling, but the nation, and especially the Constitutional party, must not be blinded by a minuet, however gracefully performed. "All independence is crushed out of the House of Commons. The comparatively harmless bribe of a pot of beer or half-a-crown to a voter has been replaced by gigantic class bribery," the next step in which—the coping-stone of subservience—is to be payment of Members in money as well as in kind. Lecky, Herbert Spencer amongst writers, Hilaire Belloc and Harold Cox amongst observant and practical politicians, point to the folly and danger of our system. Bastiat wrote:—"It would be impossible to introduce into society a greater change and a greater evil than this—the conversion of law into an instrument of plunder." Yet that is exactly what has been done, to a limited extent, under the present system. What can reasonable men expect to be the outcome when public interests and private rights are confided to practically a single chamber of mercenaries, dependent for the continuance of their salaries and other contingent advantages upon slavish subservience to their political chiefs? That these individuals are not representative of the people we have shown many times, and the article which we publish on Proportional Representation once more demonstrates that fact.

* "The Coming Question." The Reform of the House of Commons. By Sir Guilford Molesworth, K.C.I.E. (St. Stephen's Press. 2d.)

The lovers of true art, as expressed through the medium of the stage, are at the present moment exceptionally, if not superlatively, provided for in London. Not often do we find two plays by Ibsen at different theatres running consecutively, and that they are well supported by the cream of the playgoing public is evident to any one who is wise enough to witness these two original and, in some respects, extraordinary interpretations of the Norwegian master's work. Shakespeare is not neglected: we have "The Merry Wives of Windsor" and "Henry VIII.," with the prospect of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" in the near future; for lighter fare, the immortal Gilbert and Sullivan operas are not far away, and various comedies which may not be high art, but are at any rate clever and artistic, serve those who desire mere recreation instead of food for thought. Such being the case, we are compelled to wonder that London has not its own Repertory Theatre in flourishing condition. Miss Horniman has made her Repertory Theatre in Manchester a success in every sense of the word, and has proved that it is not necessary to possess any enormous capital in order to present the best plays of the world. The Abbey Theatre, Dublin, thanks to her pluck and persistence, seems to be entering on a period of prosperity; Glasgow is noted for its theatrical enterprise, Liverpool has decided not to be eclipsed, and now Birmingham has started a "Drama Society" on similar lines. These are not mere experiments; they are efforts which are likely to be permanent, and are certainly educative. London enterprise seems too spasmodic; the experiment is made, with the finest possible assistance in staging and acting, is then dropped, and the curtain of oblivion falls. Is it that the very bigness of London operates disastrously against these memorable and brilliant efforts—that the popularity of competing plays and frivolous comedies spells the doom of the highest art? We in this city are not hopeless outsiders in matters theatrical, as a glance at the columns of our newspapers will prove; but the provinces are giving us a good lead, and for once it seems that London is badly behind in the race.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

PRIMA VERA

The Hand of God is on the harp of Spring;
  How else were there such music in the air?
Music that makes the silent furrows sing
  With joy, and wakes the slumbering seed they bear.

A golden veil burns like an aureole now
  About the world's grim forehead old and grey;
The lips of Spring salute her brooding brow,
  And April lifts the banner blue of May.

My soul, an anchorite on Heaven's wall,
  Looks from its charmed and chosen solitude;
Looking, I listen, hear the blackbird call,
  And know that violets wake, and God is good.

D. M. S.

WILLIAM COWPER AND THE "OLNEY HYMNS"*—I.

THE writing of a hymn might seem at first thought a simple and easy task, given the poet and the mood. Complications of rhyme and measure are not needed—they are faults, instead of added graces; the ornate, decorative word is to be shunned, else will untutored tongues trip ignominiously; in fact, to the trained or natural hymnologist the composition of a sacred poem to be sung ought to present no problem at all. Yet, considering the thousands of hymns extant in various collections, how few are real poetry; how few hymns of praise rise above demure adulation, uninspired and uninspiring, despite the sublimity and splendour of their theme! Turris fortissima est nomen Jehovah—surely, one thinks, such noble words might send the poet writing for an age. Gloria in excelsis Deo, et in terra pax . . . the heart beats faster at the ringing syllables, but hardly a score of hymns linger in the memory which can in any way be termed worthy. Most poets seem to vacillate, when their Muse hovers over sacred things, between a self-abasement which is so abject as to appear ridiculous, and a mood of religious conceit which reminds us of the "good boy" and "bad boy" stories of our youthful days.

The cry for help and the cry of praise are the two great sources of the real hymn, taking the word "hymn" in its broader sense, and not only as a song of adoration; when they are uttered sincerely by the poet he can often move his readers to sympathy and enthusiasm; more than that, he can crown himself with unfading laurels. Years after he has passed away, his stanzas, wedded indissolubly to some simple melody, will ring in the memory of thousands. Many of those who sing and are comforted may not even know his name; yet is he enviably immortal who can thus enshrine his words for ever in the hearts of a people. The poet may be famous chiefly by one hymn; Newman, for instance, is a familiar name to hundreds who care nothing for his controversies and his stress of soul by means of his "Lead, kindly Light, amid th' encircling gloom;" Cowper, the poet of Olney, must be known to hundreds, again, who never heard of "The Task" or "The Progress of Error," by his poem "God moves in a mysterious way."

William Cowper was particularly fitted both by temperament and surroundings to write the hymns which we shall term supplicatory, and it is to this work we refer especially in this article. Through the clouds of doubt that enveloped him he sought the God whom he desired; his doubt became fear, his fear became anguish; "there is a wall of separation," he wrote, "between me and my God." To his "dear, warm-hearted Hayley" he expressed himself freely. "Ignorant of everything but my own instant and impending misery," he said, "I know neither what I do, when I write, nor can do otherwise than write, because I am bidden to do so. Perfect Despair, the most perfect that ever possessed any mind, has had possession of mine, you know how long, and, knowing this, will not need to be told who writes." Only when we remember this persistent and overwhelming mood of mental dismay which so deeply saddens the student of the poet's life can we see the inner meaning of such a hymn as that given on page 36 of the new "Olney" collection:—

My former hopes are dead,
  My terror now begins;
I feel, alas! that I am dead
  In trespasses and sins.

Ah, whither shall I fly?
  I hear the thunder roar;
The law proclaims destruction nigh
  And vengeance at the door.

It is one of the most depressing things that Cowper ever wrote; the spirit of doubt, with its chill breath, haunts every verse:—

I see, or think I see,
  A glimm'ring from afar;
A beam of day that shines for me,
  To save me from despair.

Yet the author of these sorrowful words was once a member of the "Nonsense Club" at the Temple, and had once written, in a letter to "Dear Toby," dated from "Great Berkhampstead, I don't know when":—

> I am in such a hurry, I hardly know how to set one leg before t'other to get to the end of my letter, and God knows if I shall be able to do it to-night. Dancing all last night, in bed one-half of the day, and shooting all the other half, and am now going to—what?—to kill a boding screech owl perched upon a tree just by my window. Have at you, old Wise Acre. What an Irishman am I!

The despondent note of the hymn to which we have referred occurs in many others, but not to an extent so oppressive; often the despair of the opening stanzas is illumined by hopeful prayer and faith in the conclusion, as in the hymn entitled "Looking upwards in a storm":—

God of my life to thee I call,
Afflicted at thy feet I fall;
When the great water-floods prevail,
Leave not my trembling heart to fail!

Poor tho' I am, despis'd, forgot,
Yet God, my God, forgets me not;
And he is safe and must succeed
For whom the Lord vouchsafes to plead.

These hymns may not be great poetry, but it is impossible not to be impressed with the difference between such cries from a wrestling, agonising, afflicted soul and the hymn written to order, as it were, for the sake of writing, uninspired, beautiful, and cold. It is the difference between a flow of lava and the cascade of a formal garden. At the same time, there are several hymns here which will live as

* Olney Hymns. By William Cowper. Edited by William Willis. (Published for the Cowper Society by Farncombe and Son.)

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

truest poetry, apart from their theme—hymns admittedly written under the influence of a brighter mood. The well-known hymn "Hark, my soul! it is the Lord," the one already mentioned, "God moves in a mysterious way," are poems with few blemishes; so also is the less familiar eulogy of Wisdom, of which we quote two stanzas:

When, like a tent to dwell in,
He spread the skies abroad,
And swath'd about the swelling
Of ocean's mighty flood,
He wrought by weight and measure,
And I was with Him then;
Myself the Father's pleasure,
And mine, the sons of men.

Thus wisdom's words discover
Thy glory and Thy grace,
Thou everlasting lover
Of our unworthy race!
Thy gracious eye survey'd us
Ere stars were seen above;
In wisdom Thou hast made us,
And died for us in love.

Cowper's rhyming was at times somewhat lax. The verses above give one instance, and his genuineness and sincerity led him occasionally to compose quatrains, and to interpose them between highly devotional stanzas, which were quite unsuitable for the purposes of a hymn, to say nothing of being decidedly unpoetic. No congregation with a sense of humour could sing the following lines, for instance, with due solemnity:—

When Jonah sunk beneath the wave,
He thought to rise no more;
But God prepar'd a fish to save
And bear him to the shore.

. . . . .

What trifles tease me now!
They swarm like summer flies,
They cleave to ev'rything I do,
And swim before my eyes.

Such lapses, however, are infrequent, and do not occur in those better-known hymns which have endeared themselves to worshippers of various denominations.

In this edition of the "Olney Hymns" Judge Willis has reproduced exactly the text, spelling, and punctuation of the first book issued under that name in 1779—a collection which contained much work by John Newton. Various editors who have in times past handled the so-called "Olney Hymns" were anything but careful as to their selections, and either inserted hymns which Cowper never wrote, or omitted some which were really his, even Southey and Sir Roundell Palmer being among those who erred. "It is not too much to say," remarks the present editor in the preface, explaining several corrections, "that unless the reader possesses the volume published in 1779 he has not in his possession the exact number of hymns which Cowper wrote, nor the true and genuine text." The present attractively-arranged booklet may thus be taken as the authoritative result of considerable research on the part of Judge Willis, and should be regarded as the standard edition of the Olney Hymns.

In our next article we shall discuss briefly the poetry of William Cowper in its wider range, bearing in mind the words of Mr. Thomas Wright to the effect that for those who have read Cowper's letters the poet "seems like a next-door neighbour."

W. L. R.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION

By Hilaire Belloc

There is an uneasy feeling, which is not confined to this country, that representative institutions have been for some time upon their trial, and that they are not coming very well out of that trial.

When one remembers the very great space of time over which these institutions have endured, one wonders why they should so lately have fallen into disrepute. The answer is that in modern times, or rather in quite recent times, they have taken on quite novel and hitherto untried forms. Representation is working to-day on lines which it has never tried before; it is in its present form an experiment, and so far the experiment has hardly met with an increasing success.

When representative institutions arose in the early Middle Ages their character was essentially local. Local customs, local necessities, local powers of payment—these were the subjects vital to delegates sent from separate localities, each of which had a strong and real autonomous life of its own. It is true that the great representative bodies in some crises took upon themselves national executive functions: but that was not their normal business nor was it even their normal business to legislate.

In some countries, notably in France, as modern civilisation advanced the old representative system was dropped; in others, notably in England, it was maintained; but it only kept its great place in the State through restriction. It was restricted to a particularly small body, and acted mainly through one class.

Rather more than one hundred years ago the American and the French Revolutions set forth representative institutions as a universal form of Democratic Government. This proposal of theirs proceeded directly from their definite political theory, which presupposed universal suffrage and universal rights (in legislation, at least) to be vested in the representatives created by that suffrage. In the United States, however, there were so many natural and artificial conditions present to modify the full effect of the new system that we cannot judge its success or failure by the American example. Local autonomy was almost absolute. The Executive (which has since grown so enormously in power) stood apart from the legislative machine, and the institution of the Supreme Court strictly confined the action of that machine.

The French experiment and theory is over one hundred years old, but its practice has been so interrupted that we cannot claim for it a clear trial of more that one generation. The same is true if we look closely into the facts of nearly all the modern Parliamentary systems. The German, such as it is (for it has the least power of any), is but a generation old. The last extension of the franchise in Great Britain falls within our own generation. The institution of Parliamentary Government throughout Italy answers to the same description.

In a word, civilised Europe to-day proceeds largely upon the theory, and, in some measure, upon the actual practice, of representation by a body composed of delegates who are voted for by the adult male population of the State. The results are not satisfactory; they are sometimes so patently foolish, and more often so grievously unpopular that everyone is seeking a remedy. Abroad the thing is self-evident. A sectarian and ill-considered minority governs France. The Italian Parliament stands for but a fraction of the electorate, and the electorate for less than a third of the people. In this country the continuity of political habit and of national institutions lends Parliament a greater dignity, but the general ill-ease is beginning to be felt here as well.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The recent proposals to transform the constitution of the country, proposals which must, whatever end they reach, lead to some great and abrupt change, have even made the question more acute here for the moment than it is abroad.

Among the remedies suggested for the Parliamentary disease is that known as Proportional Representation. He would be a rash man who should say that it would prove a full remedy, or even a partial one, but even to guess at its effect we must have some clear idea of what it is. Most people will tell you that the object and advantage of proportional representation is that it will give to the two parties in Parliament a strength proportional to their real strength in the country. We all know that with the present system of single-member constituencies, and the exceptional double-member constituencies created or surviving, this proportion is nearly always, and grievously, distorted. It would be easy to collect scores of legitimate complaints from the newspapers in the last ten years showing how this distortion has worked in practice; but it is evident, even in theory, that the chances are always in favour of such a distortion existing under the present scheme. It is even possible for a majority of votes to be cast upon one side and that side to have a minority in the representative assembly which those votes may create. The selection of a few chosen areas in this country, and particularly in London, are sufficient to prove this.

Proportional representation would obviously remedy this anomaly, but that is the least of the advantages claimed for it. The majority of Ministerialists sitting in Parliament would be smaller than it is now and would more nearly correspond to their real majority in the country. But a majority it would remain, and under the present mechanical arrangement of the House of Commons, though the numerical bulk of an Opposition tells, it is not a main factor in modifying legislation; the independence of a group, even the liveliness of criticism and attack count for more. A more important effect claimed for proportional representation would be the representation of a community in its diversity: in the diversity of its real aims and principal interests.

Consider some large electoral area, such as that of South Lancashire, and mark the diversity of interests and political aims with which you have to deal. You have the separate interests of the great Trades Unions; you have the religious interests; a Roman Catholic population of somewhat more than a fifth of the whole, and, as everybody knows, a very large and vigorous determination throughout the electorate to protect the schools of the Church of England. You have, again, the diverse interests of various districts according to their occupation. The complexity of such an electorate might be infinitely developed, but even the roughest system of proportional representation would show certain main cross divisions which are obliterated under the present scheme of voting.

You have for this district, counting such outliers as Birkenhead and Stockport, sixty members of Parliament. These sixty members sit and vote at Westminster to-day as Ministerialists or anti-Ministerialists only. That is the sole line of division. Amongst these sixty members there may by accident be one (as I was myself for five years) who is supposed to speak for the large Roman Catholic population; or there may be none (as I believe in this Parliament there is none). There may be another who is known to make a special point of the rights of the Church Schools; another two or three who, without daring to rebel against party discipline, are specially concerned with the rights or interests of the mining population, of the cotton operatives, &c. But if such members happen to reach Westminster it is a pure accident. There is no machinery by which each of these great cross-sections and particular minorities can certainly make its voice heard.

But suppose that even so rough a system of proportional representation as what the French call Scrutin de Liste were in use. Supposing that, as was the case in the city of Paris until the Boulanger crisis, the first of nearly two-score names in a long list of candidates should be declared elected, there at once the minorities would come into evidence. One man, let us say, is strongly in favour of the maintenance of the Voluntary Schools; he is a Free Trader, a Trades Unionist desiring to reverse the Osborne case, and in favour of a large Navy. Another man is a Free Trader, a Little Navy man; he desires the destruction of Voluntary Schools, he thinks the Trades Union organisation oppressive, and he desires the maintenance of the Osborne Judgment. To-day those two men will probably be found voting for the same Free Trade candidate. But with a list before each, and the right to set down a number of names, the one would make a very different choice of names from the other, and in the result you would presumably have amongst the many returned to Westminster from that one area certain groups whose chief business it was to represent there, not one of two opposing parties upon some set question, such as Tariff Reform, but a particular local interest and demand.

A further advantage claimed for this system is that in a by-election a great weight of opinion will be manifested. It would be a striking thing to have seen South Lancashire, for instance, as a whole, voting down the Licensing or the Education Bill (as it would most undoubtedly have voted each of those measures down) when voting as a whole to replace but one out of its many members. It would have had a very different effect from the striking but partial blow of a single-Member election. Indeed, it was the moral effect of this sort of referendum which caused the professional politicians in Paris to abolish the Scrutin de Liste so hurriedly during the Boulanger Crisis, in order to stifle and thwart the popular demand.

Finally, it is claimed with great justice that proportional representation would free candidates from the tyranny of the crank.

The crank, if his minority was large enough, could get represented under any system of Proportional Representation, but he could not terrorise individual candidates as he too often does to-day. You will have in an electorate of, say, 10,000, a pretty equal division and a narrow majority one way or the other between the two organised parties. One hundred voters who care more for some one little point of their own than for the general debate, hold the whole situation to-day in their hands. The result is that in most cases both candidates pledge themselves to support something to which they are indifferent or hostile, and to which they know the mass of their constituents to be indifferent or hostile, and you occasionally have the absurd result of fanatics claiming with perfect truth that "a majority" of the House of Commons is "pledged" to their fantastic proposals.

I have purposely chosen the crudest form of proportional representation for my example. It is evident that under its more refined forms more accurate and complex results could be obtained. But the real doubt with regard to it which must arise in the mind of the politician to-day is not as to whether it possesses the virtues claimed for it in theory—these are fairly obvious—but whether in practice it would not slip into a tame submission to the existing machinery. You might have sixty places for South Lancashire and 120 names on the list, but what guarantee would you have that the enormous power of the caucus would not drill these 120 into two opposing ranks of Government and Opposition, present "tickets" of sixty names each to the unfortunate electors, and leave them after the reform in the same ridiculous plight in which they find themselves to-day?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

That is surely the chief argument against the value of the Reform, but I confess it seems to me a formidable one. In other words, I do not see what reform in the mere mechanism of elections can be of real value until the power of the machine in English politics is diminished.

SANCTUARIES*

Dr. Cox has written a book on the sanctuaries of mediæval England which will be the recognised authority on the subject. Mr. Mazzinghi published a short treatise on the same theme in 1887, and it is a matter for surprise that so fascinating a subject should have received, apart from these two writers, such scant attention. Dr. Cox's chief sources of information are the Assize and Coroners' Rolls, Patent and Close Rolls, and the Episcopal Registers. The author remarks in his preface that artists and novelists are fond of depicting, with brush or pen, a man reaching sanctuary with a sword in his hand. As Dr. Cox points out, the Church never allowed a sanctuary-seeker to approach with any kind of weapon.

Early examples of sanctuary-laws are to be found in the six Levitical cities of refuge established by the Mosaic Code. The same idea existed, with of course a different religious significance, among the asylums of the Greeks, the most famous being that of Diana of Ephesus. The Romans, too, recognised the sacredness of certain places and the efficacy pertaining to altars and statues of their emperors. No doubt Professor J. G. Frazer could give us a wealth of information in regard to the early conception of sanctuary in many countries. The idea of flight after wrongdoing and the search for a temporary refuge must have existed in some form or another long before the halcyon days of Greece and Rome.

Dr. Cox traces sanctuary rights in England from Athelstan, their development under Norman, Plantagenet, and Tudor rulers, and their decay in the reign of Henry VIII. This interesting review of the subject reveals the fact that the Church gradually extended its aid to sanctuary seekers. Where at one time the altar alone furnished immunity, later on the churchyard and precincts, even stone crosses some distance from the sacred building, embraced the privilege of sanctuary. Dr. Cox lays special emphasis upon the difference between chartered sanctuaries and those places of worship where the privileges were limited.

In the beginning of the thirteenth century the custom of "abjuration of the realm" was introduced, a custom associated with the coroner's office. The sanctuary seeker might have the Church's protection for forty days. Upon his abjuration of the realm he was compelled to take his departure to a specified seaport, and to reach that seaport within a given time. He was permitted to travel, with cross in hand, only along the high roads, and, if fortune favoured him, he might embark on the first outgoing vessel available.

It is not to be wondered at that the Church's protection of sanctuary seekers should have frequently been in conflict with the State. In the chapter entitled "Historical Incidents" we read of the murder of St. Thomas of Canterbury, the forcible withdrawal of Geoffrey, Archbishop of York, from sanctuary, the burning of St. Mary le Bow to drive William FitzOsbert out of hiding, and the Westminster Abbey violation of 1378, when a fugitive knight was killed, during Mass, before the Prior's stall. In 1483 we read of the widowed Queen Elizabeth Woodville seeking sanctuary in Westminster for the second time with its dismal sequel—the murder of the boy Princes in the Tower. An ancient chronicler describes the parting of Elizabeth from one of her sons thus:—"And therewith all she said unto the Childe was, Farewell mine own sweet son, God send you good keeping: let me kisse you yet once, ere you goe; for God knoweth when wee shall kisse together againe."

The chapter devoted to St. Martin le Grand is of special interest. The author tells us that in 1548 this sacred edifice was levelled to the ground. He writes:—"The spot which had for ages resounded by day and night with the seraphic music, and had been distinguished by all the splendid pageantry of the Roman Church, was now occupied by a number of new buildings; on the site of the high altar a large wine tavern was erected." Stow adds a quaint and interesting note on the foreigners who rented these buildings. They "claimed the benefit of privileges granted to the canons . . which could hardly be wrested to artificers, buyers and sellers, otherwise than is mentioned in the 21st Chapter of St. Matthew's Gospel." The sanctuary of St. Martin-le-Grand has passed away, and the majority of us remember the name in connection with our great postal system.

The sanctuary of Durham is intimately connected with St. Cuthbert. Here it is that we recognise that the efficacy of sanctuary depended not so much upon the saving grace of Christ but in the miraculous power of a saint's earthly remains. On one occasion the Feast of St. Cuthbert was being celebrated in the Forest of Arden. The parish priest fed all comers, and clothed the naked. While these hospitalities were in progress the company was attacked by a band of robbers. The bandits did not hesitate to violate the sanctuary, where many of the inhabitants had hastily withdrawn their live stock and other goods. The robbers, having obtained their ill-gotten booty, ate, drank, and made merry until they fell asleep. The priest, believing that St. Cuthbert, whose local church had been violated, would come to his aid, drew near the sleeping bandits with a few companions, and made all manner of strange noises, including "the loudest yells and the most piercing shrieks." These noises awakened the stolen animals, and, thanks to the power of St. Cuthbert, oxen charged the robbers and swine rushed furiously over the sleepers. The happy result was that the robbers departed, leaving behind them a vast store of arms, horses, money, and various articles of value.

Dr. Cox corrects an error in regard to what are popularly known as "sanctuary knockers." He points out that, with the possible exception of Durham, these metal grotesques were in no way connected with sanctuary rites. The fact that there was no plate on which to knock seems to support his theory that the iron ring was merely used as a means of closing the heavy door. Notwithstanding the chief evidence in support of this idea—namely, that the sanctuary-seeker was safe as soon as he reached the churchyard—we can well understand a mistake of this kind. Supposing that the principal aim of these grotesques was to close the doors upon which they were fixed, night fugitives must have struck them over and over again. An oak door when struck by an iron ring will make a considerable noise without the addition of a plate beneath it.

We have read this scholarly book, containing many fine illustrations, with much pleasure. It reflects the Christian spirit of mercy toward those who fall by the way. It reveals, in mediæval times, a beneficent protection against the hound of State that would have run to earth and killed many a fugitive but for the sheltering arms of Mother Church. In these later days we might learn much from those Mediæval times. Now Justice, not always just, sits on her throne alone, and the Church is impotent to save when the judge puts on his black cap.

The Sanctuaries and Sanctuary-Seekers of Mediæval England.* By J. Charles Cox. (George Allen and Sons. 15s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

CHESTERTON OR DICKENS?

Appreciations and Criticisms of the Works of Charles Dickens. By G. K. Chesterton. (J. M. Dent and Sons. 7s. 6d. net.)

The happiness of the individual is never an unmixed blessing to the community at large; that joie de vivre, that perpetual high-spiritedness should be the elixir of life which the hermit, usually the living embodiment of all remorse and sorrow, should seek to discover. The excessive joyfulness of youth tends to be as great a danger to society as the extremes of pessimism. We cannot all eternally dwell on the mountain-tops; some of us often stray down the slippery sides of the great abyss. Looking up we see personified Youth still bathed in the sunshine on the summit, and the sight makes us wonder if everlasting sleep in one of the dark caverns of our path is worse than this inward torture. There is a lack of sympathy which appears to the lowly soul to be fiendish spite; the smile of happy self-satisfaction seems to be born of Mephistopheles; we are in torment. On the other hand, there is no healthy competition among the occupants of the mountain-top. Human nature will out; and so, having reached the summit by varied paths, the difference of views leads to such a state of chaos that the universe can only be righted by a volcanic eruption or some other Divine intervention.

But what would happen if one of these exuberant and effervescent climbers dwelt on an isolated peak alone in his greatness? His chief delight would be the worship of his own brilliance; he would admire his reflection in the occasional passing cloud, but he would always sigh for a seat on that cloud; sometimes he would look into the face of the sun and endeavour to outshine its brightness, never realising that the light of his eyes was only the reflected light of that great luminary. Then, turning his eyes downwards to shield them from the victorious glare, he would catch a glimpse of his fellow-creatures in the valley. His conscience, of atomic dimensions, would slowly inquire how "His Brilliancy" could possibly assist in educating and amusing these less fortunate denizens of the earth. Thus occasionally he would pour cold comfort down on the heads of these people, never hearing their cries to be spared from such a punishment—surely the vastness of his happiness can only be due to his deafness.

This is the image which forms itself in the mind as the result of reading through this latest volume of Mr. Chesterton. A daily paragraph on a calendar would perhaps be innocuous; the cumulative effect is terrible.

These "Appreciations and Criticisms" are the separate prefaces originally published to the works of Dickens in the "Everyman" Library. We expected a book on Dickens, but what have we? Mr. Chesterton remarks of the prefaces that "they were harmless, being diluted by, or rather drowned in, Dickens:" rather they are drowned in Chesterton. The high spirits of the author have led him into most extravagant excesses of verbal gymnastics; his brilliance is demoralising; common truths could not be more securely wrapped up by the most abstruse philosopher; the desire to be original, sometimes at the expense of misusing words, is everywhere apparent. We wonder if Mr. Chesterton was contrasting himself with Dickens when he wrote in the general introduction:—

> Dickens as an essayist always had his eye on an object before he had the faintest notion of a subject. All these works of his can best be considered as letters; they are notes of personal travel, scribbles in a diary about this or that that really happened. But Dickens was one of the few men who have the two talents that are the whole of literature—and have them both together. First, he could make a thing happen over again; and second, he could make it happen better. He can be called exaggerative; but mere exaggeration conveys nothing of his typical talent. Mere whirlwinds of words, mere melodramas of earth and heaven do not affect us as Dickens affects us, because they are exaggerations of nothing. If asked for an exaggeration of something, their inventors would be entirely dumb. They would not know how to exaggerate a broom-stick; for the life of them they cannot exaggerate a tenpenny nail. Dickens always began with the nail or the broom-stick. He always began with a fact even when he was most fanciful; and even when he drew the long bow he was careful to hit the white.

Every fact in Dickens' life, every character in the books—they all act as irritants upon Mr. Chesterton's brain, causing the production of characteristic excursions into the varied fields of Chestertonian mental, moral, and political science. Dickens becomes the prophet who opens our eyes to the state of things in which we exist. He is the novelist of to-day and Mr. Chesterton is the medium who converses with the master's spirit. The sadness of Dickens seems at times to result in the envelopment of the lonely figure on the mountain-top in a thick fog out of which come cries for help—not for Mr. Chesterton, but for us. His usual cheerful exuberance gives way to a vivacity of pessimism. Speaking of the conditions which exist to-day, "which Dickens would certainly have detested and denounced," Mr. Chesterton explains:

> At this moment it is vain to discuss whether Socialism will be a selling of men's liberty for bread. The men have already sold their liberty; only they have not yet got the bread. A most incessant and exacting interference with the poor is already in operation; they are already ruled like slaves, only they are not fed like slaves. The children are forcibly provided with a school; only they are not provided with a house. Officials give the most detailed domestic directions about the fireguard; only they do not give the fireguard. Officials bring round the most stringent directions about the milk; only they do not bring round the milk. The situation is, perhaps, the most humorous in the whole history of oppression. . . . If we insist on sending the menu in to them, they will naturally send the bill in to us This may possibly result (it is not my purpose here to prove that it will) in the drilling of the English people into hordes of humanely herded serfs.

We must remember that we are not dealing with a consecutive book, but with a series of disjointed essays written one by one as brief introductions to the separate volumes in a popular series, which probably explains the reason for this apparent blur as of distant patchwork, this roughness and unevenness as of an untuned orchestra. Perhaps it was intended to fill up the crevices in the structure of Mr. Chesterton's admirable "Life."

Considered as a criticism of Dickens' writings, this volume is extremely disappointing, but read as a series of essays by Mr. Chesterton, the contents are intensely entertaining. Mr. Chesterton is bold; he argues valiantly; we see the universe standing on its head (or heads), and we feel the better for the experience. We grow young again; we think of the days when we envied the clown at the circus; we have Mr. Chesterton providing us with wholesome and agreeable medicine. And it is always medicine; whether he is attacking modern Socialism, discussing the Jews, pointing out the weaknesses of the British democracy, or talking of a hundred other matters, Mr. Chesterton always makes us think. We get no living picture of Dickens; the personality compounded of the different characteristics discovered by Mr. Chesterton never existed. The title-page should have solely borne the inscription "By G. K. Chesterton," and, as lovers of Mr. Chesterton will admit, this is high praise.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

TERTULLIAN'S PARADOX

The New God and other Essays. By RALPH SHIRLEY. (Rider and Son. 3s. 6d. net.)

Abnormal Psychology. By ISADOR H. CORIAT, M.D. (Rider and Son. 5s. net.)

MR. RALPH SHIRLEY, the author of "The New God," has stimulated the cells of my memory in a very agreeable and unexpected manner. Reading the essay entitled "Julian the Apostate," I came upon the sentence: "Credo quia absurdum was Tertullian's famous but truly idiotic phrase." There seemed something familiar in the misquotation, as well as in the stern rebuke; and looking up the files of THE ACADEMY, I found that nearly three years ago I had been mildly disagreeing with Dr. Horton on this very matter. Dr. Horton had said: "I never could bring myself to any admiration of the schoolman's famous formula, Credo quia impossibile." Dr. Horton's error was a compound one, since he ascribed to an imaginary schoolman a maxim utterly incongruous with the spirit of the scholastic philosophy. So, as there seems a tendency in the human heart to misquote Tertullian's words and to misunderstand his meaning, perhaps I may be pardoned if I repeat, more or less, the remarks I made on the famous paradox—or oxymoron—three years ago.

In the first place, Tertullian's words are as follows: –

> Natus est dei filius; non pudet quia pudendum est; et mortuus est dei filius; prorsus credibile est quia ineptum est; et sepultus resurrexit; certum est quia impossibile.

Secondly, the sense of these phrases, which Dr. Horton cannot admire, and which to Mr. Shirley seem truly idiotic, is perhaps to be sought a little below the surface of the words. Mr. Shirley, who, it is evident from these essays, is not without the faculty of belief, will note that the Christian Father is expressing his belief in a transcendental religion—a religion which from the first claimed to be, as it were, an invasion of a lower region by a higher. The Christianity of Tertullian was neither a mere ethic nor a succession of scientific deductions, as when we deduce the existence of a benevolent Deity from the spots on the butterfly's wings; it was, above all, a system of transcendence. And so these "pudendums" and "ineptums" and "impossibiles" are, after all, nothing more than an assertion that the Christian faith is divinely credible, just because it surpasses mortal credibilities, because it contains dogmata which are not in the commonplace book of the mathematician, the chemist, and the man in the street. And if we knew, it might appear that a good dog loves his master and believes in him with all his dog's heart and soul for very much the same reasons as those which moved Tertullian to love of God and belief in God. To Bill the Bulldog the actions of his master must often seem wild and unaccountable; but the dog, wiser than some men, recognises the presence of a higher law, and of a supreme order in which doggy "impossibiles" become human certainties.

So much for Tertullian, whom, as I say, I have re-expounded merely because the misunderstanding of the passage cited seems, like laughter, to be the property of man. Going on to a consideration of some features of "The New God," I note the chapter headed "The Strange Case of Lurancy Vennum," and, by the way, I cannot help expressing my gratitude to the author for making the delightful and impressive combination of names "Lurancy Vennum" familiar to English readers. Fiction is responsible for the invention of many names odd, grotesque, monstrous even; but truth, for once justifying a somewhat dubious proverb, has here far outdistanced fiction's most brilliant and bizarre efforts. Again I am with Tertullian, as expressed in the popular misquotation of his words. "Lurancy Vennum": credo quia impossibile indeed; for nobody could have invented such a combination as this. As to Miss Vennum's story, or rather Mr. Shirley's interpretation of it, I am more sceptical. The case is this. Lurancy, known also as "the Wateeka Wonder," and more familiarly as "'Rancy," was born in Illinois, U.S.A., in the year 1864.

She was a healthy child up to the age of thirteen, when she was attacked by fits, trances, communions with spirits, and stomach-ache. She resisted all orthodox medical treatment, and some neighbours named Roff recommended a Doctor E. W. Stevens, of Janesville, Wis., who was supposed to understand such cases. The girl took to the new doctor and informed him that her name was Katrine Hogan, that she came from Germany, and that her age was sixty-three. After making these and other equally preposterous statements she became rigid; and Dr. Stevens by "magnetic action" and a knowledge of "the laws of spiritual science" was soon in full communication with the real Lurancy, who talked like an angel and said she was in heaven. In this condition the doctor persuaded her to get hold of some better "control" than that German with the Irish name, and she chose Mary Roff, the dead daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Roff. To be brief: Lurancy awoke next morning sane and well, but with the personality of Mary Roff, deceased, and as Mary she remained for some months, showing unmistakably that she was in possession of Mary's consciousness and of Mary's earthly knowledge. This story Mr. Shirley takes, it would seem, as a case of obsession—"the occupation of a body not dead but temporarily tenantless, by a spirit at the time without a body." But it seems to me that if we consult the valuable "Abnormal Psychology" by Dr. Coriat, and remember certain facts of telepathy, we shall hardly need to go so far as this. Lurancy, more probably, was in that very singular and mysterious condition that is conveniently indicated by the word "hysterical," and her knowledge would not seem to have transcended the consciousness of Mr. and Mrs. Roff. She asked, it is said, for certain treasures of the dead Mary: well, the knowledge that these things existed was certainly in the mind of Mrs. Roff, since she produced them at once. Mr. Shirley might reconsider the evidence, remembering the old maxim about not bringing a god on the scene, unless that is the only way of solving your dramatic difficulties.

It is very satisfactory to note that the author of "The New God" is free from that curious superstition which may be called the idol of modernity. Using a brief analogy, this superstition is that if the moderns like methylated as a steady drink, then it is quite right that they should have methylated; since methylated is the spirit of the age. And so, if the spirit of the age says that there is no God and that London is simply swarming with two-sided triangles, the sooner we agree the better, unless we want to be called reactionaries. Mr. Shirley is admirably free from these amusing fallacies. As he says, very justly:—

> We have no original thoughts, no ideas to give us individuality. . . . It is not our forefathers who are dead, but we . . . we may well be described as imagines, immo umbræ hominum . . . we have nothing left that we can call our own, if it be not the smoke of our manufactories and the stupendous complexity of our social life.

The language is severe, but it is doubtful whether it is too severe. And, bearing this description in mind, it is a little odd to turn over a few pages and come across phrases about the "worn-out dogmas of the past," and the inexorable edicts of "science" against religion, and "the stern facts of to-day." It is certainly true that many moderns, those "dead" men, devoid of thought and true being whom the author has denounced, do not "see anything" in Christianity, and find in the works of St. Paul (oddly mentioned in this volume under the style of "that great organiser, Saul of Taurus") no personal feeling for the Christ, only "allusions to a quasi-legendary personality;" it is true that shapes and shadows of men have uttered every kind of folly about religion as about art. But it is strange indeed to find Mr. Shirley alluding to these absurdities as "the stern facts of to-day." The laws of grammar and arithmetic are not rendered null and void by the blunders of the booby class; and the fact that cheap photographs and novelettes appeal to the man in the street and the girl in the suburb above the masterpieces of painting and literature is not of the slightest consequence to any person with the remotest pretensions to intelligence. As for science, which is information—usually erroneous and always and necessarily imperfect—about surfaces, having any single word to say to the eternal voice of the spirit: I really cannot think that Mr. Shirley has brought himself to believe in so wild a dream.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Yet, I may be mistaken. I mentioned, I think, that the author of "The New God" was not devoid of the faculty of belief, and I find that he accepts as true the story that Cagliostro told of his own origin. And he who can credit that tale of Althotas and Arabia may, likely enough, believe in the final and supreme authority of science.

DREAMS AND PROFITS

The Persian Revolution. By EDWARD G. BROWNE, M.A., M.B., F.B.A. Illustrated. (Cambridge University Press. 10s. net.)

Persia and Turkey in Revolt. By DAVID FRASER. Illustrated. (Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 12s. 6d. net.)

IT is very strange to compare the spirit of these two books. The prefaces are indicative of their contents. Mr. Fraser tells us that he was correcting proofs, "heaps of trash that meant a book on the stocks," when "the telephone at my side rang with sudden sharpness," and a voice from Printing House Square asked him if he would go forthwith as special correspondent to Persia, where "things were moving." Professor Browne, on the other hand, tells us that unwillingly and regretfully he forsook "for a while the pleasant paths of Persian literature to enter into the arid deserts of international politics." Mr. Fraser's book is markedly that of an eager, astute newspaper correspondent, out for stirring copy. Professor Browne's is that of a man imbued and saturated with Persian lore and Persian culture, full of zeal for Persian liberty, and with something of an intensely noble fire for the liberty of small peoples. It is not for him a matter for argument, but a theme for intensity. "Suppose," says he, "I have a beautiful garden filled with flowers of innumerable kinds which I love and which fills me with gladness and pride, and suppose some utilitarian bids me dig up and cast away these beautiful flowers and plant the garden with potatoes or cabbages, or even with one kind of beautiful flower only, on the ground that I shall thereby make more money, or produce a more useful crop, I cannot argue with him, I can only oppose him with all my strength. And when people say (as, unhappily, many people in this country do say) that Persia is a backward country, which in the hands of its own people cannot be 'developed,' or only very slowly, and that the best thing that could happen is that some European Power, whether England or Russia, should step in and 'develop' it, whether its people like it or not, I feel as I do about the flower garden, that no material prosperity, no amount of railways, mines, gaols, gas, or drainage can compensate the world, spiritually and intellectually, for the loss of Persia." That at once strikes a note that compels one's attention, for we realise we have to face a man on fire, and that that fire is the rarest of all fires, being both moral and æsthetic.

Yet it must not be thought that because Professor Browne moves reluctantly out of academic air to engage in public affairs that he comes thereby unfitted for the strife. The man who thinks that makes a very profound mistake. Indeed, it is very delightful to see him with calm scorn correcting the illimitable errors of a very positive Press—that modern hierarchy thought infallible by all save those who know the manner of its working. One pronouncement he dubs fatuous; another pompous editorial earns the comment "the usual inane dissertation;" another is studded with deft sics in correction of its errors. Nor are these mere epithets, for Professor Browne, having set these follies aside, proceeds to give a coherent and orderly account of events, with added chapter and verse for all he says. Thus, while Mr. Fraser's book is enlivened with much incident, being chiefly the tale told by a sightseer who has sought to pick up the threads of the narrative, it is to Professor Browne that we must needs go for an orderly and complete account of a vital period of history. And though he calls his book "The Persian Revolution of 1905-1909," it is to a much earlier date that he goes so as to pick up the very beginnings of the sequent narrative.

Reading this book, it is with something more than whimsical fancy we recall the fact that Italian independence, too, dated very largely from a patriotic tobacco prohibition. For as it was in Milan so it appears to have been in Tihrán, except that in the former case it localised itself in cigars, whereas in the latter case it seems to have concerned itself with everything but cigars. How deeply the question of the Tobacco Concession of March 8th, 1890, sunk into and awakened the Persian national consciousness can best be realised when it is remembered that the whole Concession was brought to futility because a people whose lives, male and female, moved in a cloud of tobacco smoke decided, at a patriot's instigation, to abjure and renounce its favourite luxury till such time as the Concession should be revoked, so that at any rate its continuance should be valueless. This may be said to have awoken the national consciousness. It did this; but it did more. It directed the consciousness against a definite object, and thus gave it the opportunity of realising itself in a definite desire. For as the consciousness awoke it realised that its governor, the Shah, had sold something that caused the country considerable discomfort and loss for a very paltry personal gain. Moreover, his obstinate holding out against the national consciousness caused the nation to perceive that, however much it chose to be aware of itself, or unitedly desire a definite object, it was powerless against an absolute monarchy. Thus there arose the two great parties into whose hands the leadership of the Revolution has fallen: the "Nationalists" and the "Constitutionalists."

It is curious to note, as one reads Professor Browne's pages, the strange affinities that there exist in revolutions the wide world over. Despotism seems ever to be put to the same shifts so as successfully to combat a people's impulse to liberty. In our own revolution, when sundry mercenary violences on the part of Charles had awoken a fierce national resentment and impetus, and had thrown an absolute monarchy into defence of its ancient privileges, it was not the people the king thought of, but himself. Therefore he did the thing of all things that was necessary to prove his inadequacy as a national chieftain (the origin of kingly power): he sought to buttress himself by selling the land to foreign Powers; he called in strangers as military auxiliaries. He endeavoured to place himself at the head, not of his country, but of his country's foes! And this same method we find faithfully reproduced in Persia. England's astonishing weakness and vacillation, now trusting her ancient instinct of liberty, and giving warm sympathy to a struggling people, now becoming cynically aware of mercenary ends, and hesitatingly aiding the Shah, put her out of the field of active influence. Russia was at hand, however, and her diplomatic craft is not less notorious than her hatred of liberty. So it was to Russia the Shah turned. A splendid opportunity fell to England to do what would have been not only a moral and generous thing, but, as events have shown, no less a sagacious and wise thing. But her preoccupation with la haute politique was in this case, as in so many another case, neither high policy nor low policy, but a very unprofitable and blundering policy.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Despite historic precedents, it is very amazing to read of a Russian regiment of Cossacks, under the command of a Russian Colonel, dominating the Persian capital at the bidding of the country's king. Of the diplomacy that led to the establishment of this Russian predominance, with the continual set-backs it entailed to English desires, it is impossible to speak in any complete sense, saving only to say that Professor Browne's book deals with it in ample detail and with an unexampled fund of first-hand knowledge. Of the granting of the constitution under the dying Muzaffaru'd-Dín Shah, and of the implacable hatred with which his successor Muhammed 'Alí 'Mírzá met the new-established Assembly, statement must suffice in the room of comment. Professor Browne's mastery of intimate detail is nowhere better shown than in his account of the Shah's various coups d'état, and the events that led finally to hostilities, and the assertion of the fact that the issue was rather less an internecine struggle than the voice of the Persian people in resolute protest against Russian predominance.

It is at this point that Mr. Fraser's book steps in with the vivid account of the eye-witness. Mr. Fraser will himself not expect it to be much more than supplementary to Professor Browne's volume, which must for some time remain the authoritative history (and the more authoritative because sympathetic history) of another nation's stirring struggle for liberty. The latter takes its place in a very noble library, whereas Mr. Fraser attempts no more than a vivid if ephemeral narrative concerning the things he saw and heard. But they both are subdued by a higher worth. For Persia is the land of dreams, the land of Firdawsi, Sadi, Hafiz, and old Omar Khayyám; whereas the powers struggling for the control and exploitation of her are concerned with neither dreams nor beauty, but only have a shrewdly calculating eye on harsh profits. It is the drama of God and Mammon that is being enacted before us: God and Mammon, Dreams and Profits, Beauty and Gain. The very intrusion of a national voice is almost an impertinence here. The situation has a cosmic significance. It must needs call earnest attention, and both these books should be read by that rare few in this or any country that lay claim to, and are possessed by, the true spirit of culture.

CARMEN SYLVA'S EARLY REMINISCENCES

From Memory's Shrine. The Reminiscences of Carmen Sylva (H.M. Queen Elizabeth of Roumania). Translated from the German by Edith Hopkirk. Illustrated. (Sampson Low, Marston and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

The critic, if he wishes to give an honest opinion of a book of this kind, must forget that Carmen Sylva is the Queen of Roumania. There is no need for him to go into the Throne-room, prostrate himself, and, with her majesty's latest volume in his hand, pour forth unstinted praise. The present volume is not without its faults. Carmen Sylva sometimes forgets that she is portraying the outlook of a child. Too often the Queen intrudes. Sometimes, as we have gathered round the shrine, through many delightful byways and never by a direct route, we are given a little grown-up moralising. These are defects in a book of this kind—inconsistencies that do not make for a well-balanced whole, and rob the reader of a charm he can only find here and there. Then, again, those who read this book will be struck by its extreme sadness, scarcely ever relieved by a lighter touch. There is always some one dying, or about to die, always some one ill, and the doctor and the undertaker seem to hover over almost every page. Of all the methods of literary expression in prose, autobiography undoubtedly makes the greatest claim upon the writer's skill. Charm can never be attained by blowing even softly on one's own trumpet. Why is Miss Matty in "Cranford" the most delightful of old ladies? Because Miss Matty has not a glimmering of an idea how quaint and charming she is. Now Carmen Sylva, though her style is for the most part wonderfully naïve, not infrequently hints at the early beginnings of her literary talent in no uncertain strain. After referring to the fact that she is a born poet, she writes:

> I am never absent-minded, but always able to concentrate my thoughts on the matter in hand, and taking into consideration my lively imagination, I think this may be looked upon as an educational triumph!

Not at all. A great poet's absent-mindedness is one of his fascinations—the one thing we can quietly laugh at after we have been appalled by the wonder of his genius. In spite of the fact that too much stress has been laid upon Carmen Sylva's precocity as a child, we must not forget her frank and refreshing remarks concerning mathematics, even simple sums in addition, which we are given to understand are as distasteful to her as Queen as they were when she was Princess Elizabeth.

We are introduced first of all to Clara Schumann, a brave, pathetic figure playing her husband's music at a time when the great composer was out of his mind. Ernst Moritz Arndt, Bernays, Fanny Lavator, Bunsen, Perthes, as well as two retainers, Masset and Lang, are vividly set before us. Carmen Sylva's shrine of memory is far from being exclusively devoted to recollections of royalties and the distinguished men and women she met as a child. She pays a splendid tribute to the devotion of certain dependents, and we like the charity that not only recognises, but loves the work of those in a humble position in life.

The fact that many of the titles of the chapters are a little misleading is rather an attraction than otherwise. We are given many pleasant surprises, and it so happens that several of the side-issues that are not honoured by capitals at the head of the chapter are often more interesting than the main theme itself. Not infrequently the main theme is subordinate to various minor happenings. Carmen Sylva is at her best when she is really describing the thoughts and doings of a child. Here is a pleasing passage :—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> How I loved that doll! It looked just like a little princess in a fairy-tale, or a fairy itself, sleeping there in the beautiful rose-coloured light. . . . Demonstrations of affection never being encouraged—in fact, being rather sternly repressed in our family—all my pent-up tenderness poured itself out on my dolls, and also on my little horse-hair pillow, which I used to hug and kiss in gratitude every night before going to sleep.

Carmen Sylva seems to fear that children nowadays have lost all belief in fairyland. She writes :—

> Poor little things! Can it really be that there is no fairy land for them, no enchanted isles in the distant ocean, no kingdoms to conquer, no heroic deeds to be performed, that their souls find complete satisfaction in the prosaic details of everyday life . . .?

Carmen Sylva need not grow alarmed. Children still clap for Tinker Bell to grow well again, still write letters to Peter Pan, and ask that delightful sprite to teach them to fly with the wings of a fairy!

Many readers will be interested in the chapter entitled "A Faith-Healer," dealing with the early days of what was then known as "animal magnetism" as applied to those who were in pain. But the moving of tables and other objects by the mere contact of fingers, and the restoring to health of Carmen Sylva's mother by Count Szápary's mesmeric power, are, after all, not so haunting or so wonderful as the concluding chapter descriptive of the little suffering Prince Otto, one of Carmen Sylva's brothers. This is indeed a powerful sketch of a child who suffered in a way we hope few children suffer. The agony of the little fellow is set before us without restraint. We endorse the remark made about him to the effect that he was too good for this world. He seemed to have within that tortured body of his the making of a saint. He appeals to us most, however, when he refrains from quoting Scripture, such as, "Thy will be done," and gives his sorrowing mother a birthday present, as well as a gift when she shall have passed through another year—when he had gone. No one can read these intimate, sorrowful pages, or hear the child cry his last word, "Help!" without silently rejoicing that he who suffered so much should have found peace at last. In these closing pages we must write of Carmen Sylva, having criticised and appreciated her work, as a Queen who has shown us her heart. It is not only a privilege to have been permitted to stand by her shrine of memory, but we feel that Roumania is a fortunate country to be ruled by one who has so much fine, deep feeling, such an understanding of the human heart in high places, as well as among those born in lowly circumstances.

WAS MONTAIGNE A PAMPHLETEER?

Montaigne Pamphlétaire : L'Énigme du "Contr'un." By Dr. Armaingaud. (Hachette and Co. 3f. 50c.)

We doubt if Montaigne is nowadays as widely read in this country as he used, and still deserves, to be, but admirers of the great French essayist will find a good deal to interest them in this curious book by Dr. Armaingaud. It represents his share in a long controversy which has taken place between him and several other scholars—MM. Paul Bonnefon, Fortunat Strowski, Dezeimeris, Pierre Villey, Henri Barckhausen, Barrère, and Edme Champion—respecting the authorship of the famous "Discours de la Servitude volontaire," nicknamed the "Contr'un," which, on the authority of Montaigne, has, until present times, always been ascribed to his friend, Etienne de la Boétie. Dr. Armaingaud, however, contends that the "Contr'un" was really the work of Montaigne himself, and sets forth his case with some degree of plausibility. Nevertheless he has convinced neither his fellow-controversialists nor ourselves. To put the case briefly, La Boétie died in 1563, and Dr. Armaingaud holds that the "Contr'un" must have been written at a later date, and that the tyrannical prince against whom it was directed was Henri III. of France. The prince in question is described in the pamphlet as a mere manikin, the most cowardly and effeminate of the nation, one unaccustomed not only to the powder of battle, but also to the sanded lists of the tournament, incompetent to command men, and even unfit to be a woman's husband. Now, La Boétie lived under three reigns, those of Henri II., François II., and Charles IX.; and there is a general agreement among the learned disputants on this question of the "Contr'un" that neither Henri II. nor Charles IX. was a prince answering the description of the one who is portrayed in the pamphlet.

None of them seems to have thought, however, of the short intervening reign of François II., to whom, in our opinion, the description in the pamphlet would well apply. We are therefore not disposed to deprive La Boétie of the authorship of this famous factum and assign it to Montaigne. We feel certainly that the latter was in error when he stated that La Boétie wrote the "Contr'un" in his youth, but we see no reason why it should not have been written between July, 1559, and December, 1560, when La Boétie was about thirty years of age. It is evident that the "Contr'un" was inspired by the great struggle between the Catholics and the Huguenots: and between the two dates we have just mentioned there occurred events which would have amply sufficed to induce an indignant man to write such a pamphlet. We refer Dr. Armaingaud to the execution of Councillor Anne Du Bourg and many other prominent Huguenots; we refer him also to the famous "Conjuration d'Amboise," and to all the acts of cruelty and tyranny which followed it. That conspiracy was largely, if not entirely, a Huguenot one, and its actual leader, La Renaudie, was a nobleman of Périgord—La Boétie's native region. Moreover, the prince is termed in the pamphlet a hommeau—a manikin. Well, François II. became King when he was between fifteen and sixteen years of age, and he was not yet seventeen when he died. He was physically weak, scrofulous, a degenerate in every respect, and by no means a fit husband for the woman to whom, for State reasons, he had been married—that is, the young, beautiful, and ardent Mary Stuart, Queen of Scots. Further, François never witnessed a battle nor took part in a tournament, whilst, as for his courage, it is on record that his uncle, the Duke de Guise, described him as le cœur le plus poltron qui fût jamais.

It is known that the "Contr'un" was not published until 1577, when Henri III. was King of France, and some suppose that the manuscript was stolen from Montaigne, in whose keeping it had long remained, and who at one period had promised to publish it. Doubtless he was deterred from doing so by political considerations and a fear of the consequences. He was, at all events, a "professed" Catholic, and when the pamphlet did appear it was under Huguenot auspices. We think it quite possible that those who gave it to the world may have revised it here and there—brought it up to date, so to say—in order that the people who read it might regard it as an attack on the reigning monarch. But we are not disposed to believe that Montaigne himself was a party to anything of that kind. His letters to Marshal Matignon and others show his loyalty to Henri III. Doubtless he was also friendly to Henri de Navarre, but there is no evidence that he ever indulged in any treasonable practices. Dr. Armaingaud makes much of the fact that Henri de Navarre appointed Montaigne a gentleman of his chamber, as though in reward for some great service. We do not think, however, that the service in question was the writing of a pamphlet against Henri III. Besides, Montaigne's father had been a Gentleman of the Chamber to Antoine de Bourbon, the father of Henri de Navarre; and the Montaignes being important folk of Guienne, and the Kings of Navarre being hereditary Governors of that province of France, such appointments may be regarded as mere matters of course.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We could bring forward other points in opposition to Dr. Armaingaud's views, but have not space to do so. We will only add that, in our opinion, he and his fellow-disputants would do well to study in Henri Martin, or Sismondi, or Michelet, or Lavisse that brief reign of François II. which they all appear to have overlooked. We feel convinced that François is the prince alluded to in the pamphlet, and that the latter was really La Boétie's work, touched up here and there perhaps when, many years after his death, it was at last sent to a Huguenot printing-press.

THE WISDOM OF WONDER

I Wonder. Essays for the Young People. By the Writer of "Confessio Medici." (Macmillan and Co. 3s. 6d. net.)

We have learned to look with pleasurable anticipation for the new volumes of sane, unpretentious, and yet thought-provoking philosophy which are put forward from time to time by the author of "Confessio Medici." Our only serious cause for complaint with the present volume lies in the title. This is not a book for young people. They might laugh at it, they might be bored by it; even if they liked it, they would almost certainly fail to understand it. We suspect that it is the author's modesty which leads him to address his philosophy ostensibly to the young. It enables him to take up the attitude of an open-minded mentor, pleasantly dogmatic in the whole-hearted fashion possible only when one is dealing with an audience presumably much younger and less wise than oneself. To all grandparents, fathers, and uncles—to all who have any intimate relations with young folk—the little volume is cordially recommended. We wish that it were incumbent upon all school-teachers to read the book at least three times, to get some of it by heart, and to be able to give an intelligible account of the whole.

The author sets a pathetic quotation from "Hard Times" upon his title-page; and it is plain that the commercialism, the worship of the fact that rules not only the scholastic world, but also the average private paternal mind, to-day, must irk this prophet of beauty and wonder as the coloured pictures presented with soap and treacle must irk the souls of such artists as Sargent and Augustus John. In an age of aeroplanes and cinematographed microbes, a day when children, taking everything for granted, would refuse to be surprised should one inform them that Pegasus himself, gold-shod, with great wings furled, waited their pleasure at the garden-end, this voice in the wilderness pleads passionately for the encouragement and stimulation of the sense of wonder. The baby finds its heritage, as Dr. Paget delightfully says, when first it discovers and ponders upon the wonder that fingers are not the same as toes; after this the wonder sense grows and grows; then, if never encouraged, but on the contrary, resolutely crushed both by precept and example, it begins to diminish, and, under ordinary circumstances, dies out for ever at about the age of seven. The author is very positive about the loss incurred. Aristotle, he says, calls Wonder the beginning of the love of Wisdom:—

> Once we have fallen into the bad habit of taking for granted what Nature grants us, and have ceased to be amazed, it may fairly be said that in the midst of life we are in death. For one might as well be dead as alive, to look with dull eyes at the world, not finding it wonderful.

He will not have us wonder if, or when, or where; or say, the wonder is—we are only to wonder at. This is very sound sense and excellent philosophy; which things are not always one. If people would stop wondering if—it would save an unthinkable amount of unnecessary worry.

A certain capacity and training are admitted as necessary factors of really capable wondering. You must learn to think and be unafraid to feel before you can exercise your wondering powers to real advantage:—

> Beware of thinking that you can think of the Infinite. Never apply this adjective to space. Finite and infinite are not words that should be used of measures, intervals, or contrasts between this and that point of the universe.
>
> Long before we get to the other, we are at the end of our powers of imagination: it takes a Fellow of the Royal Society to think of the interstellar ether.
>
> The Ego, the Self, is not measurable by any measure of space, nor of time either; and to ask, Where is Self? is like asking how far it is from twelve o'clock to London Bridge.

In the chapter entitled "The Wonder of Matter" the author sets out to prove that people never make anything. They only change something which they have into some other thing which was not there before. He illustrates the proposition by this delicious aphorism:—

> The sculptor does not make the statue; he takes a block of marble and destroys a lot of it, and the rest is the statue.

People who are accustomed to wondering should read this book, to ascertain whether they have wondered properly; and any one who has never wondered should certainly read it in order to cultivate a sensation at once new, delightful, and entirely inexpensive.

THE VALLEY OF THE SHADOW

Death: Its Causes and Phenomena; with Special Reference to Immortality. By Hereward Carrington and John R. Meader. (Wm. Rider and Son. 8s. 6d. net.)

Somebody once remarked that Man consents to die because he cannot avoid it. The authors of this treatise are of opinion that such consent is in most cases prematurely given, and they set out therein to demonstrate that there is not the slightest need in the world to die. Death is merely a bad habit, and ought to be given up. Death being the cessation of the vital functions, all that one needs to do is to live upon fruit, join the ranks of what, we believe, are technically known as "gazers," or, to put it popularly, "metapsychicists," and avoid anything tending to the disruption of vitality. If this be done one need have no fear whatsoever of the untimely approach of senile decay or other unpleasant incident interfering with our bodily and spiritual enjoyment of the good things of this life. And yet, according to the authors, what a tempting prospect is opened up by that grim and, thanks to fruitarianism, obsolete old person erstwhile known as Death! For now, largely owing to the scientific researches of Messrs. Carrington and Meader, we know with considerable exactitude what life is, and what happens when it ceases.

Life is nothing more nor less than a species of vibration. Our watchword for the future must accordingly be "Vibrate." If once you cease to vibrate—in other words, once you get out of tune with the Cosmos—out you go into the nethermost darkness. Or, rather, you do just the reverse. You become a disembodied spirit, and spend the rest of your time at spiritualistic séances, than which there could obviously be no more delightful occupation. The authors reproduce photographs of a departing spirit (the plates are rather badly "fogged," but that, of course, is due to the spirit being a little impish, perhaps, in its excitement at being for the first time freed from the fetters of the body), and these photographs emphasise the view that the "soul" is of a gaseous consistency. We are told a good deal in these pages of its other attributes. Thus, according to carefully and conscientiously conducted weighing tests, its weight is approximately half an ounce. If you happen to be a pusillanimous person, of course you may not reach that figure. Disembodied spirits are very loquacious beings, and not noted for good manners; but perhaps they do not often get the opportunity of a friendly chat, so one must make allowances.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The authors are righteously indignant at the general apathy with which the topic of Death is regarded. After all Death is a most important part of one's life. We are gratified to note that it is not so unpleasant, per se, as being born. Most of us take no pains to conceal our displeasure upon that occasion. But the authors are firmly convinced that there is too much of the laisser-aller about humanity. "Rise like some guest who hath drunk well and deep, and now no longer can his eyelids keep from closing. Rise and hie thee home to rest, and enter calmly upon the unending sleep," is an adjuration as mischievous in practice as it is misconceived in principle. As Dr. Rabagliati well puts it, "The immediate cause of human natural death is nearly always such a choking up or blocking of the human house of life by excessive exercise of tropho-dynamic—i.e, poly-siteism, kako-siteism, and pollaki-siteism, and poly-potism, kako-potism, and pollaki-potism, that anthropino-bio-dynamic is compelled to leave the body, as it is no longer a fit house for life." Unfortunate anthropino-bio-dynamic! What a dreadful death! But we agree in toto with the learned doctor; we could not have expressed it more lucidly ourselves. We are pleased to note that Count Perovsky-Petrovo-Solovovo was also among the number of those who sent in an answer in the little competition organised by the authors upon the topic "What is Death?" On the other hand we are much shocked by the replies of two or three among those selected for the honour of being approached upon the subject. One "well-known physician," who is wisely left nameless, expresses himself as follows:—

> Dear Sir,— . . . I do not take the slightest interest in either the physiological or psychological aspects of the death question. Metchnikoff, however, has considerable to say on the subject. I have no theories as to the cause of natural death, nor, in fact, on any other subject.—Yours very truly, ——— ———

Perhaps the worthy doctor was too busy keeping people alive. All crystal-gazers, table-rappers, and other species of spiritualist should peruse this work.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Religious Indifferentism. (Published by the Author, Ivan Constantinovitch Boiatzis, Doctor of Philosophy. Price 40 kopecks.)

In this interesting little work, which has been printed and published by the author in some secret printing-office in Russia or on the Continent, is contained a concise exposition of the growth of the various great religions of the world, and an explanation why so many of their adherents in all countries are becoming indifferent to the creeds they are generally supposed to follow. It is also a strong appeal in favour of more toleration between men. The author is of the opinion that the majority of religions originated from man imagining himself to be dependent on the goodwill of unknown powers, whom he called gods, and, not being able to guide his own actions with certainty, he thought that his fate depended not on himself, but on these unknown arbiters of his destiny. In consequence of that belief many faiths gradually came into existence in various parts of the globe.

The author's plea for religious tolerance and a return to the simplicity and beauty of old classical life, with all its poetry and worship of the beautiful, is nothing new, but it is seldom that so much is expressed in such a little space as in this small pamphlet of some forty pages. The whole book is an appeal for tolerance in its very widest sense, which will make the citizens of the world not enemies, but brothers to one another. According to the author—

> Religious tolerance will do away with traditional prejudices and lift the curtain separating one people from another. It will also restore peace between the different nations, and unite all the children of the earth into one peaceful, quiet, and cultured family, since the elements of these so-called religions are only bogeys to frighten children or keep them in order. Lastly, when man has freed himself from prejudice, which darkens his understanding; when he learns to understand that morality is a thing which is common to the whole human race, and that, when it is combined with good works, is all-sufficient, without superfluous ceremonies, to bring man to "the island of the blest"—then will come that blessed time when the entire human race will be freed from the yoke of the priests.

These sentiments seem exceedingly beautiful; but if we get rid of the priests how are the people to be taught the elements of morality? The priests are there because they are a necessity, and woe to them and to humanity wherever and whenever they abuse their sacred office. There is much in this little pamphlet—which ought to be translated into English—worthy of serious thought; and some things which might very well have been omitted. But every living man and woman can join the author in his appeal for tolerance and more charity between mankind, even if we cannot endorse all his heterodox, and at times startling, religious opinions.

Études d'Histoire et d'Art. By E. Bertaux, Professeur à la Faculté des Lettres de Lyon. (Hachette and Co. 3f. 50c.)

In the four studies comprised in this volume M. Bertaux has shown great skill and ingenuity in following up difficult clues. The interdependence of art and history is the central motif, but sometimes one of these two elements prevails, sometimes the other. In the admirable study entitled "Botticelli, Costumier," for instance, it is the æsthetic point of view that is most strongly insisted on. History is called in to justify art. In the other three essays the historical interest rather carries the day; art corroborates or elucidates history. Of these three perhaps the most interesting is that on the two St. Louis, the King of France, and his less-known kinsman, Bishop of Toulouse, and son of Charles II. of Anjou, King of Sicily. The frequent appearance of these two saints in the religious art of Italy, often in close association, and generally under Franciscan auspices, provides M. Bertaux with an interesting problem which the occasional confusion of the attributes of the two only serves to enhance. The essay which bears the name "Le Tombeau d'une Reine de France en Calabae" is also concerned partly with St. Louis the King, as the Queen in question was his daughter-in-law, Isabella, wife of Philip the Bold, and her death occurred during the return of the French from Tunis with the bones of the royal saint. The statue of Philip the Bold that appears on this monument is probably, according to M. Bertaux, the oldest authentic portrait of a king represented as living. The study on the Borgias in Spain throws curious sidelights on history, carrying us to the cradle of this illustrious and sinister race, and showing us that it has produced saints as well as monsters.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Botticelli, Costumier," is perhaps the most interesting study of all. It might serve as an excellent corrective to those who have been irritated by the Botticelli cant of some years ago. M. Bertaux shows how this painter used simple and legitimate variations of the fashions of his day to give eternal grace to his female faces and figures. Two points in particular are insisted upon—the daring combination of coiffure and necklace, as illustrated in the Venus of the National Gallery, and the decorative use of wild flowers. In this latter procedure, which makes the magic of the "Primavera," Botticelli is shown to have displayed the most daring originality. At the close of this suggestive chapter, dealing entirely with matters of technique. M. Bertaux makes a somewhat humorous volte-face, denounces the historical study of technique, and pays homage to the inexplicable in the mind of the genius.

Origins and Meanings of Popular Phrases and Names. By Basil Hargrave. (T. Werner Laurie. 6s.)

From a somewhat cursory examination of this book we think the author's object, as explained in the foreword, has been fulfilled. Mr. Hargrave admits at once that an exhaustive epitome of the origin and meaning of words and phrases which are in everyday use, with their explanation, must necessarily be encyclopædic, and he admits that he has found no new criterion for selection or omission except that of his own fancy. There are other works of the same character, but they do not appear to be quite so much up to date as the present volume. All such books are of great use in the library, where a writer, though perfectly well aware of the explanation of the terms which he desires to employ, is often for the moment puzzled in consequence of having too great a flow of thoughts or having too many subjects in hand which claim his attention. So far as we have been able to examine the little volume, we think that it is correct as regards derivation and lucid as regards explanation. We do not know that it is possible to say more of a vade-mecum of this kind in order to recommend it alike to those who are literary and those who would like to be.

Vergil—The Georgics. A Translation of Books I. and II. By F. P. Shipham, M.A. And Books III. and IV. By A. Irwin Nesbitt, M.A. (The University Tutorial Press. 2s. 6d.)

The renderings by the above-named authors seem to us to be good. Mæcenas, with rare intuition, saw that a work about farming, gardening, viticulture, apiculture, and the like from the pen of a literary man would appeal to the Romans, who, from the retired Consul or General downwards, were devoted to gardening. We venture humbly to follow in Mæcenas's train. We hold that subjects far less fascinating than those which relate to the cultivation of the soil and the animate and inanimate creations which draw their sustenance direct from it can be treated as literature, and can thus appeal to minds which would be repelled by the ordinary Farmer's, Gardener's, or Bee-keeper's Annual. In Book III. a passage is well rendered thus:—

> I clearly see how great a labour it is to cope in my verse with such a theme [the treatment of fleecy flocks and shaggy goats], and so give dignity to a lowly argument. But a pleasing ardour hurries me over untrodden peaks of Parnassus: it likes me to traverse crags where no track of former poets bends aside towards Castalia along an easy slope. Now, revered Pales, now must I sing in a lofty strain.

Onward from the Bucolics to the Georgics, Vergil treated homely affairs with the lofty touch and skill of the poet. The authors of the volume under review have well interpreted Vergil's spirit and literary grace.

The Origin of the Pentateuch. By Harold M. Wiener. (Elliot Stock. 1s. 6d. net.)

This is not the first essay of Mr. Wiener in the field of criticism, not of that text of the Bible, but of those critics who have at times handled the text so violently. Mr. Wiener's self-imposed task is to defend the Scriptures, or rather the Pentateuch, from the onslaughts of these critics, and he does not handicap himself by any unnecessary consideration for the feelings of his opponents in his counter-attack on them. A careful weighing of all the arguments which Mr. Wiener adduces in fairness of the authenticity of the Old Testament narrative would be out of place in our pages. It is proper to a journal of a more technical description. Nevertheless, one cannot forbear to praise the lucid manner in which Mr. Wiener sets forth his arguments, or the handy introduction which this little volume forms to the subject of the Higher Criticism.

FICTION

Perpetua. By Dion Clayton Calthrop. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

Perpetua had sat as a small child to Brian M'Cree, an artist. One day she came to his studio with her belongings in a paper parcel, and informed him that her mother was dead, and that she was pleased to adopt him as a father. Brian, being nothing if not unconventional, accepted this honour without demur. With the assistance of John Diamond, a barrister, and his very dear friend, he investigated the origins of the child, without, however, discovering more than the old story of a betrayal and desertion of her mother by her father. Meantime he had sent Perpetua to his friends the Daintrys, mother and daughter, to have a wardrobe purchased, and to be taught such things as well-bred ladies teach children. In the evening he found her imperially clothed in purple of her own choosing, and the conquest was complete. Presently Brian conceived the idea of going abroad with the child. This he did after first visiting his mother, a lady of a beautiful absent-mindedness and the unconscious maker of much laughter, in the passing sketch of whom Mr. Calthrop shows his fine skill to the full.

With the going abroad of Brian and Perpetua the most charming part of the story begins. After a delightful chapter of impressions of France and Italy, one day they meet a person who calls himself Alphonse Lamballe. He is the proprietor of a circus in monetary distress; he is also a most amusing gentleman, a compound of many stagey and usually "heavy" rôles, but always his cheery, loud-voiced, theatrical self, whom no reverse can daunt and no failure can dull. Those who remember Léon Berthelini in "Providence and the Guitar" will welcome him as a brother. With a quixotic impulse Brian comes to his aid, redeems his elephant Maria Theresa from pawn, and joins the circus troop with the object of painting scenes of its life. With the caravan he and Perpetua wander about France for some years, and become favourites with all the performers, not excepting Maria Theresa. Then Perpetua shows signs of growing up, and Brian is made by more than one person to see the necessity of sending her to school. This he at last arranges to do. On the morrow of Maria Theresa's death from eating paint, a most piteous event and perfectly told, Perpetua goes into a convent. When the door of the convent shuts upon her it also, unfortunately, shuts on the magic of the tale. At this point something went wrong with Mr. Calthrop, and he spoilt his book. What follows when Perpetua grows up we will not recount; we should be only too happy to forget it, and to remember her only as a child. There is a swindler, we think, and an ex-convict, and a dissipated young man, very rich, whom Perpetua marries; there are prayers and tears, and gnashings of teeth, and much sorrow for every one, especially for the reader; then there are lightning flashes and a murder, and a glimpse of a trial, and a happy ending of sorts.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

These things, as we have said, are best forgotten. They do not belong to Mr. Dion Clayton Calthrop at all; they are mere nightmares with which no writer has less to do. Still, this fall from grace will be forgotten easily; it is so commonplace. But Monsieur Lamballe and his wife, and Mrs. O'Cree, and Stella Daintry, and Brian, and Perpetua, during her childhood, and many bits of scenery and much charming talk will linger long in the memory.

Flamsted Quarries. By Mary E. Waller. (Andrew Melrose. 6s.)

"Flamsted Quarries" is a powerfully written book by the author of "The Wood Carver of Lympus." The city of New York and the granite quarries of Maine are the locale of the story, which is sentimental in its opening, but becomes more lifelike later on. We have sketches of Miss Aileen Armagh, the gossipy life of a small town, the carefully-nurtured hatred of a woman against another whom she knew was the only woman her husband really loved. Champney, the hero of the story, making a fatal mistake in his effort to get rich, pays the penalty. All these characters, with a lovable priest, Father Honoré, who has lived, loved, and suffered, make a more than usually interesting life-story.

We think the authoress is a little wrong in her idea of the punishment visited on a man who, using other people's money and losing it, replaces it all through a friend's aid, but still gets seven years' penal servitude, during the whole of which time he is apparently engaged in stone-breaking. This may be poetic licence, but, if true (and we hardly think it can be), a United States wrongdoer is punished much more severely than his English compatriot. The story makes quite interesting reading throughout.

Just to Get Married. By Cicely Hamilton. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

The construction of a play from a novel, although seldom encouraged by the success of the play, is yet in itself not unjustifiable. An effort must be made, in translating the story into terms of the stage, towards concentration and compression. If this be done, and the gist of the matter retained, an artistic triumph can be registered. But the reverse process, that of writing novels around plays—of late years occurring more frequently—possesses none of the stimuli of artistic difficulties to be overcome, and, we are afraid, has no raison d'être apart from commerce. The present novel embodies the play of the same name, which has been the most successful of Miss Gertrude Kingston's productions at the Little Theatre. We must thank Miss Cicely Hamilton for not clogging the action of a delightful story with unnecessary padding. The novel is, in fact, little more than a printed play, but with the stage directions unitalicised.

The story is another phase of the attitude that went towards the making of that freshly observed comedy "Diana of Dobson's." Holding the stage in each is Woman in Revolt, her back against the wall and her "hanky" in her hand; hysterical, rude, truth-telling at any cost, but quite alive. In this case it is a pretty woman of twenty-nine who is engaged upon a campaign which everyone considers "her last chance." The man is terribly shy and difficile. On the last evening of his stay at her uncle's country house her nerve breaks and she lashes out before the other women, speaking bitter self-scorn and brazenly ignoring all pleasant conventions. But that night, after all hope had left her, the man does summon up courage to propose. The night before the day arranged for the wedding she lashes out again, and, telling him she has never really cared for him, breaks off her engagement. Of course, she does really care, and all ends happily and neatly. If the man had not been so backward, if she had not grown so sick with hope deferred, there would probably have been no story; yet doubtless the exercising of her wits upon things fundamental did the girl nothing but good.

Miss Cicely Hamilton is to be congratulated upon the fine naturalness and nervous force of her conversation.

The Mistress of Shenstone. By Florence L. Barclay. (Putnam's Sons. 6s.)

Readers of "The Rosary," Mrs. Barclay's previous novel, will suffer considerable disappointment when they take up its successor, "The Mistress of Shenstone," for, although they will meet several of the characters to whom they became attached in the earlier work, they will find a regrettable decline in the authoress's skill. "The Rosary" was a novel that stood out far above the average of English fiction, and the fact compelled attention, thought, and admiration. The prevailing tone of the book was one of strength, and the reader rose from it refreshed and better fitted to cope with the troubles of everyday life. "The Mistress of Shenstone" has no such result. At the best it is merely an average novel, and certainly does not rise above the not very high level of 90 per cent. or more of current fiction. We miss the fire and glow of which we know Mrs. Barclay to be capable, and her characters and situations fail to take possession of us as did those in her earlier work. Perhaps if Mrs. Barclay had not written "The Rosary" our disappointment with the present story would have been less keen. The cause of this decline, if we may hazard a guess at it, may be due to haste—that is to say, Mrs. Barclay does not appear to have thought out a story before she commenced to write it.

Passers-By. By Anthony Partridge. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

What more can a reader want than an excellent story, cosmopolitan as to place and as to characters, with wicked, dissolute Frenchmen into the bargain? Here we have a dwarf, a girl, and a monkey (Chicot) wandering in search of a man on whom the story centres. Millions of francs are supposed to be hidden in a piano-organ. The head of the French detective police is engaged, an English peer is involved, there are murders ad lib., and the interest is maintained right up to the end. We must make one remark as to the peer's wife. Seeing that he is evidently in great mental distress, she inquires what is the matter, and if her assistance is of any use. The peer says he loves her, as she knows, and no further questions must be asked, to which she assents, saying, "It would be bourgeois of me to inquire further." We have not as yet met this type of woman, but are glad to find it exists, although apparently confined to the peerage.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE THEATRE

"A FOOL THERE WAS" AT THE QUEEN'S THEATRE

It was Mr. Herbert Sleath who brought to England one of America's best and brightest efforts, entitled "The Woman in the Case." Undaunted, he has now given us the opportunity of seeing yet another American effort; and this, if we look at it with as much of the American point of view as we are able, is even better and brighter. Upon the untravelled Englishman Mr. Herbert Sleath is conferring an inestimable favour. He is giving him a rare insight into the character and intelligence of the American nation by bringing over to this country those of their plays which have been received with respect, admiration, and even awe. The Englishman's preconceived idea of the American, obtained mostly from illustrated advertisements of clothes and food stuffs, is that he is a big, strong, square-jawed, penetrating, reserved, inventive, hard man. He gathers that he wears a mass of padding on each shoulder and rather less padding in the tips of his boots. He thinks of him gazing magnetically at his victim, at whom he points a spatulate forefinger saying "It's your money I want." Mr. Herbert Sleath gives us an unique opportunity of correcting such notions. He proves to us that some Americans are very much like the farm hands and yokels in those of our English villages that are far away from towns; that they are only able to understand and appreciate the rudimentary; and that they have no sense of refinement, no eye for delicacy, no ear for wit. "A Fool There Was," by Porter Emerson Browne, which, according to the programme, is based on Rudyard Kipling's worst poem, "The Vampire," is, like "The Woman in the Case"—the sort of thing which we are given to understand was produced in England early in the eighteenth century—and which may still be seen for fourpence in the mining districts.

It is, however, worth while to treat "A Fool There Was" with some seriousness, simply because it does provide us with an admirable clou to the intellectuality of the well-educated American. This, honestly, is the story. There is a man, high up in the politics of New York, in the confidence of the President, who is about to leave his wife and child on an important diplomatic mission. We are shown this bull-necked person in his country home. We see his willowy wife, who is always on the verge of tears and laughter, and his lisping little daughter, who has of course an insatiable appetite for fairy-stories. We also see his friend, a young millionaire, who is endowed with an almost alarming faculty of platitudinous simile. Domestic love is indulged in with great force. Husband and wife do not merely kiss. They hug and pat one another and call one another the most affectionate and distressing pet names. Between these exhibitions of seaside demonstrativeness the friend, not to be silenced by tact or clear hint, talks and talks. He is a kind of "Mr. Dooley," without his point or accent. Suddenly all the lights go down with a flick, and some one rolls a cannon-ball over a sheet of tin-foil. It is quite unlike any of the summer storms we have in England, although it may be an exact representation of a storm in Larchmont, U.S.A. "See here—if I were a superstitious man," laughs the husband as he gets into his overcoat, "I might take this for an ill-omen." Curtain.

Three minutes later we are on the promenade deck of a liner at the Pier. There are many quick-moving officers, a crowd of passengers, one of whom you will notice wears the much-discussed harem skirt, the friend, still talking, and a man who staggers to and fro, determined to attract attention. The mother and her child are there too. Then comes aboard a woman who wears a comic hat and startling clothes, who snaps her heavily made-up eyes, smiles at nothing, and carries a large bunch of red roses. Ah, it is the Vampire. . . . Nonsense! Surely we are not going to be asked to believe that such a creature can fascinate and allure? Yes; for there is creepy music on the band, and the staggering man rushes forward, presents a "gun" at the woman's head, and growls inarticulate rage and love. Her eyes snap more quickly, her smile widens. "Kisssss meeeee," she commands, rather rudely adding, "my fool." But the staggering man, more than ever determined upon attracting attention, puts the "gun" to his own head, fires, and falls. Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! from the comic lady, as she glides away in imitation of all the Salomes. Sensation among the passengers. "Dead," says the doctor. The greatly-annoyed captain orders the body away. Enter the honourable politician and the friend. The mother and the child are there too. Much kissing, while the friend talks. The comic face of the Vampire suddenly appears from a state cabin. The husband gazes, falters, trembles. "What is the matter, dadda?" "N—nothing, my d—darling. N—nothing. Good-bye. So long." . . . "All ashore! Who's goin' ashore?" . . . Much movement. Whistles blow. Siren shrieks. Stage-hands go into the wings. Silence. The Vampire is trucked into a deck-chair, nursing her red roses, more comic than ever beneath a bear's skin. She raises her snapping eyes. The husband catches them—gasps, trembles, fumbles for his hat, and is drawn forward, step by step. Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! Curtain. Tableau. Two hundred miles at sea. (Five bells.) The husband is gazing at the cabin of the Vampire. He has had no dinner. He is too deeply moved to chew gum. He has not smoked a single cigar. The mother and her child have gone. . . . "All's well and a fine night." . . . Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! Curtain.

We are back in the husband's country house, Larchmont. Five weeks later. There are roses, roses everywhere, and there is a sister, a very sensible woman, with cut-and-dried views on divorce. There is also the friend, the mother, and her child. The husband is still away. Why? The sister guesses. She is a sensible woman. The friend knows. The sister further guesses that the friend knows. She is an almost uncomfortably sensible woman. She accuses the friend, and the friend puffs out his chest, plants his right foot firmly, draws himself to what is called his full height, and denies everything. He is a good man, although he must be an indescribable nuisance at his club. He then tells the child a fairy-story with all the hills and hollows of intonation which have hitherto been the characteristic of Sir Charles Wyndham. He loves the wife—ah! yes; even as we feared—he loves the wife, and therefore he will save the husband. Then the sister, who is an imitative woman, utters a platitude: "If only women were as loyal to women as men are loyal to men!" Curtain, which is lowered for three minutes to rise on the library of the husband's house in New York City. There are several books. The husband is in disgrace. The President has punished his so trusted friend by forcing his resignation. Why? Because all the world knows that the Vampire is living in scarlet shame, scattering scarlet rose-leaves under the husband's roof. New York, you see, is a highly moral city. It is now time for the woman to show us how she allures, how she has brought about the social and physical ruin of her new victim. She proceeds to do so—earnestly, whole-heartedly, unsparingly. The semblance of covering that she wears is extremely ugly. The only thing to which her incessant roses can be fastened is a belt. She gives a very fair imitation of skating. Then she indulges in an exhibition of the methods of deer-stalkers, or Boy-Scouts. Sometimes she growls life a wolf, sometimes she barks like a hyæna. Then having, at her persistent invitation, been severely kissed, she slithers away with a Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! The friend arrives, immaculately dressed. This is the opportunity of his life for the impassioned delivery of mixed metaphor, undiluted bombast, and New York journalese. There is a scene. The men are so moved that they shout "Hell!" frequently. It is a moment of great "heart-interest." The friend almost wins the husband away from his sinful and tiring life when the woman slides in. Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! goes she, and the friend bangs the door.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Larchmont again. One year later. The friend and the sister talk each other down for a considerable time. The mother and her child are there, and so is the butler. All nice Americans have butlers, whether they have been to Europe or not. The sister advises divorce more sensibly than ever. The friend makes it quite clear to all that he loves the wife more madly, more passionately than ever, and then advises the wife not to divorce her husband, but to stick to him. "Schtick, my dear, schtick," he says, softly and repeatedly. Curtain. Rising again three minutes later we find the library in a horrid state of dust and broken bottles. The husband almost swims in brandy. His hair has not been cut for a year, but, being one of New York's best and brightest, he has shaved closely every day. The friend comes to rescue him. It is, however, useless. There are tears from both. The mother and the child are not there, but they come. Heart-interest rises to a great height. All is well. The husband is saved, but instead of taking him and getting his hair trimmed, the wife, the child, and the friend hurry away. Why? It is most unsympathetic. Ah, it is an order to permit the woman to give another exhibition of skating. She is exceedingly rude to her once lavish friend, and then, in a curious spirit of contradiction, she commands him to "kissss meeeeee." "No, no." "Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha." "No, no . . . no." He staggers forward, step by step, suddenly and excusably enough, sees red rushes forward, and clutches the Vampire by the throat. Heart-interest enormous. No exercise and much brandy have reduced him to pulp. He is flung aside. He falls. "Ha-ha-ha-ha-ha! My fool, my fool!" The inexhaustible stock of rose-leaves is drawn upon. They are scattered on the huge, recumbent, heaving body. The Vampire bends to kiss, puts her hand on the heart, draws it away in horror, hisses the word "Dead," skates all over the room, turns and flies. "He-he-ho-ho-ho."

"THE MASTER BUILDER" AT THE LITTLE THEATRE

"THE MASTER BUILDER" is certainly Ibsen's most characteristic work. It is, perhaps, except for the earlier and wholly indifferent splendour of "Peer Gynt," his greatest work; for the theme of "The Doll's House" is rapidly becoming post-dated and ancient, and "Ghosts" has something too much of the clinical to remain of permanent value. "Hedda Gabler" holds rivalry with "The Master Builder." But it is only rivalry; only a challenge that in itself admits the supreme value of the later plays. Indeed, it is strange to think that so cleanly analytical a play as "Hedda Gabler" should have preceded so mystical a play as "The Master Builder." It is as though a sharp mental cleavage had occurred in the dramatist's mind between the writing of the two plays—which is indeed a fact. The mood that started with "The Doll's House" came to its climax in "Hedda Gabler," whereas "The Master Builder" introduced a new mood that was to continue to the close of all his work in "When We Dead Awaken." It was a mystical mood. Ibsen seemed to be reaching after things that can most fitly be expressed by the movements of music. It is truer art because its meanings are less precise, its aim being more synthetic, more suggestive and loftier. There is something of hardness in Halvard Solness, the Master Builder himself, and inasmuch as it is displayed in the opening movement of the drama it is that portion of his character that springs most instantly to the mind. But it is the lesser portion of his interest in the play. So with Hilda Wangel. There is something of the eternal Dionysian about her. He is the metaphysical Viking turned sickly and morbid, afraid of the new generation, afraid of a mystical retribution, afraid of himself; whereas she is imperious, living in a wild, strange world of her mind that has but little relation to the world of responsibilities and earthly ties. He is mentally dizzy, and she is mentally ecstatic; while the play moves between them to spiritual suggestions and mystical mood, the under-play of symbolism combining to advance the spiritual motive.

All this breaks through the English translation. The stiffness and hardness of Mr. Archer's prose, its entire lack of music and colour, considerably injure the play. Those who cannot read the Norwegian original can but guess how rich the original medium must be, seeing that it defies such faults of translation; but when the identical faults of the translation are reduplicated in the acting, calamity befalls the play indeed. There is no need to speak of Mr. Norman McKinnell's acting. In a part that demands cold strength of reserve, refined power, and detailed analysis—all the cultured attributes of the drawing-room—there are few that could display clearer ability than he. But there is nothing metaphysical or mystical in him, nor has he anything of the untutored Viking—not to say the Viking turned morally sickly. In the opening scene, therefore, in which Solness repels Ragnar Brovnik, and holds his father, Knut Brovnik, at bay, despite his pitiful and earnest importunity, Mr. McKinnell is at his best. Yet, even here, he fails entirely to suggest the truth of Solness' relations with Kaia Fosli. For it must be remembered that Kaia speaks openly to Solness of her devotion to him, and this could hardly have been had there not passed from him to her something more than mere coldness and brusqueness. Moreover, Mrs. Solness suspects him, not less than her, of more than ordinary business exchanges. Nevertheless, Mr. McKinnell makes Solness quite cold and harsh with her. But it is rather when Mr. McKinnell comes to the fuller development of Solness that he fails to convey a fit portrait. Solness, by the very nature of his original mood and later development, is the very reverse of precise, whereas Mr. McKinnell is precise. Mr. McKinnell, truly enough, passes into his part; but he fails to swell it out. We miss the note of ecstasy that Hilda calls out in him; we miss the mystical sense of doom; we miss, above all, the sense of mental dizziness and limitation; and we fail altogether to understand the strange hypnotic power he casts to make others, women especially, serve his desires and unexpressed bidding.

So, too, with Lillah McCarthy's interpretation of Hilda Wangel. Hilda is a wild thing from the hills with a strange, sudden, extraordinary logic of her own. Her intelligence is preternatural sometimes, but it is never sophisticated. Her laws are the laws of the mountain-rill, full and boundless, and the slightest suggestion of social sophistication will suffice to make that mountain-rill a matter of stage-mounting. And this is what Lillah McCarthy does. A series of society parts has caused her to lose touch of the primal and ebullient. It is true she acts the part with extraordinary spirit and dash, but the spirit and dash do not always ring of truth; in fact, as she becomes quieter she becomes more convincing. In the first Act, in Solness' office, just where she should be freshest, she jars. In the second Act she is much better; in the third Act she does indeed strike conviction. In Knut Brovnik Mr. Lion had not a large part, but he conveyed it well. A noteworthy feature of his portrayal was the quiet emphasis he laid on the fact that, though he was now an employé of Solness, he was once his master. This was a very right but difficult delineation. Miss Christine Silver as Kaia Fosli and Mr. Harcourt Williams as Ragnar Brovnik were a little unfinished; Mr. Claude King, however, as Dr. Herdal was excellent, being quite masterly in the first Act. But the best acting of all was Katharine Pole as the sickly and querulous Mrs. Solness. Every line in that unhappy character was given, and yet the result was not detailed, but complete and unified.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is perhaps too late in the day to praise Mr. Granville Barker's production. He has now earned the further right to criticism. His production in this case showed all his virtues and all the vices of his virtues. There was some sameness in his angular pictures, and too much emphasis was given to the pictorial results. He studies to give pictures, whereas drama struggles to convey reality, and though there is yet no active collision between these tendencies, we often feel that it very nearly comes to being so. But this to cavil, and to foresee the result of what are now but tendencies. In the present instance his method is successful, particularly in the last act—the balcony scene. It was in this scene that the acting rose to its highest and simplest, and so the final and concluding effect on the mind was one of thoughtful satisfaction.

"ATALANTA IN CALYDON" AT THE LYCEUM

The presentation on the modern stage of a poem so steeped in the classical tradition as Swinburne's "Atalanta in Calydon" is no easy task, and the Poetry Society is to be congratulated upon its enterprise. For the second time lovers of poetry have had the delight of seeing the drama of Althæa and Œneus, Meleager and Atalanta unfold itself and rise to its climax of tragedy, while the sternness of its progress is modified by the choruses admirably set to music by Miss Muriel Elliot. On Tuesday afternoon last a large audience enjoyed the fruits of Miss Elsie Fogerty's efforts, and there were very few faults to be found with the manner in which she produced the play.

The two most famous choruses—"When the hounds of Spring are on Winter's traces" and "Before the beginning of years"—perhaps lend themselves to a musical setting more easily than any other portion of "Atalanta;" they, at any rate, were the most pleasing numbers as far as mere melody was concerned. The solemn and majestic strains of the chorus beginning "Who hath given man speech?" were effective in a different manner. The most charming pictorial impression was that of the dance of rejoicing, where balls were skilfully thrown and caught by members of the chorus. As to the acting—for which there is more scope than is apparent from a mere reading of the poem—high praise is due to Mr. Philip Merivale, who, by permission of Mr. Fred Terry, took the part of Meleager, and to Miss Hazel Thompson, who gave a very beautiful and restrained rendering of "Atalanta." Miss Elsie Fogerty undertook the arduous task of the Queen with a thorough comprehension of its difficulties, and other members of the company, with especial mention of the herald and messengers, supported the principals excellently. The whole performance, besides being educative and a joy to the eye, was a musical treat of a very high order, and we trust that the Poetry Society will have other opportunities of proving the harmony of literary, histrionic, and musical art.

GUY DE MAUPASSANT*

By Frank Harris

My memory almost invariably connects persons by likeness or by contrast—for example, I think of Emerson and Nietzsche together as opposites, while de Maupassant and Kipling resemble each other, though the talent of the one is peculiarly French and the talent of the other peculiarly English. Both are born story-tellers of the first class, though characteristically enough the domain of the Frenchman is love, whereas the domain of the Englishman is war. Both have written masterpieces. "La Maison Tellier" and "L'Inutile Beauté" are even finer than "The Man Who Would be King" or "The Drums of the Fore and Aft." Both men came to immediate popularity, which means that both were on the ordinary level of thought and feeling, and wrote for ordinary men and women. The man in the street in Paris and in London finds himself in de Maupassant and in Kipling; he has the same outlook, the same vague creed, the same hopes and fears, the same simple imperative instinct to achieve his own well-being and that of his country. Both men might have been born three hundred years ago, for neither has had anything to do with the thought-currents peculiar to our time. There is, too, a curious physical resemblance: de Maupassant, like Kipling, was short and broad and strong, and so ordinary-looking that it is difficult to make the reader see him by means of words. He was a Norman by descent, lumpy-shouldered, large-limbed, round-headed; his hair dark brown and thick; his eyes greyish blue; his moustache heavy. He would have passed unnoticed in any European crowd. If you studied his looks you could see no trace of exceptional endowment, save perhaps something searching in the regard, a certain sensitiveness in the well-cut lips and in the refinement of small hands. De Maupassant, like Kipling, was healthy, courteous, well-mannered; both were made social lions; but de Maupassant allowed himself to be swept away by the current, whereas Kipling in this respect seems stronger. Both men got the best out of themselves; but Kipling had the longer wind, though the Frenchman plunged a little deeper into life. De Maupassant, like Kipling, met you fairly, and, while conscious of his achievements, was well aware too of some of his limitations—in sum, two ordinary healthy men, rather under than over middle height, gifted with an extraordinary writer's talent. Both men, like Franz Hals, depicted the life which they saw and lived with marvellous verisimilitude, making of ordinary man unforgettable portraits—portraits that live in the memory like photographs transmuted into pictures by an incomparable brio of presentment.

This book of de Maupassant's valet ought to have been a masterpiece, for it deals with the last ten years of de Maupassant's brief life; covers all his best work and the appalling tragedy which brought his life and labour to an untimely and horrible end. The valet François witnessed the tragedy, lived through it, indeed, from the first scene

---

* Souvenirs sur Guy de Maupassant (1883-1893). By François, his Valet de Chambre. (Plon-Nourrit and Co., Paris.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

to the last; but he saw it and understood it without realising its universal significance or putting it before us so that we too must realise it and the lesson of it. His book, therefore, is not an unique book—hardly, indeed, a valuable book. There is no proportion in it, no sense at all of the relative importance of events. Hundreds of pages are filled with trivialities: the furnishing of rooms, journeyings in France and in Algiers and Tunis, yachting excursions, dinners, feeble practical jokes and ordinary distractions, which are interrupted by hints of illness, the casual mention of the visits of a "dame à la robe gris perle;" then suddenly the confession by de Maupassant of unstrung, discordant nerves—a "malaise indicible;" a casual description of the slow partial discovery; then another visit of the lady whom François now calls the "Vampire," and a day or two later de Maupassant, worn to a rag, cuts his throat in a frenzy, and ends his life in a madhouse—"Encore un homme au rancart," as he cried himself in characteristic bitter modern phrase; or as one might English it—"Another man for the dust-heap."

Here is tragedy enough to fill a volume with wonder and regret and pity; the poor gifted, passionate, foolish, human being in the toils of dire necessity, a slave of his own passion, which to him is inexorable fate:—

> Who shall contend with his lords,
> Or cross them or do them wrong?
> Who shall bind them as with cords?
> Who shall tame them as with song? . . .

For indeed "the hands of their kingdoms are strong." But there is hardly more than a hint of the astounding and awful tragedy in this book, hardly more than a suggestion anywhere of de Maupassant's trial as with fire and utter breakdown. François appears never to have seen much more than the outside of his master, and that, as I have said, was commonplace enough; but de Maupassant's temperament was abnormal and deserved careful and sympathetic study, which it does not receive in this book.

In order to give my readers an adequate comprehension of de Maupassant's passionate endowment, or the strength of his temptation, or the horror of the tragedy, I should have to use plain words, and that is impossible in an English review. The tragedy is there and the lesson flamed out in letters of fire; but Lord Radnor and Mrs. Scharlieb and the Head Masters have decided that the ostrich policy is the becoming and noble policy for English writers, and we poor scribes can only bow to such infallible dictation. "Little Marys" we may write about, and "our obligations to our betters," and "our duties in that state of life into which it has pleased God to call us;" but the great human problems are not for us; truth has no sanctuary for us, but for the free peoples and their teachers, for the Sudermanns and Tolstois and Artzibatcheffs and D'Annunzios, but not for the Grundy-ridden countrymen of Shakespeare and Bacon.

But to return to my text. If François the valet has shown himself unable to depict his brilliant master, if he has not attempted to rise to the height of the great argument and justify the ways of God to men, he has incidentally painted himself as the very model of a wise and kindly valet, as a very honest, humble, reverent, human soul, and has besides reproduced de Maupassant's daily life for us, and given us little sketches of de Maupassant's mother and of some of his friends which are immediately recognisable. This leads me to fear that because I knew de Maupassant well I am inclined to be a little unjust to this book, which does after all perhaps in a degree make up for the want of personal knowledge, and does supply some of those little personal peculiarities which bring the man before us in his habit as he lived. Moreover, there are in this book a few pages of high interest in which de Maupassant reveals himself, or at least his mind, at its best. I make no apology for transcribing those I regard as eminently worthful and characteristic.

I was introduced to de Maupassant by Blanche M——, an exceedingly fair American with magnificent red hair, who figures in the first pages of this book as "the author of several novels" and "as intelligent as she was beautiful." We dined together, and de Maupassant took away my breath by declaring that he hated writing and only whipped himself to the work by the thought of the money he would make and the pleasant yachting trips which the money would buy for him: Pegasus only valuable as a grocer's nag. To François he confesses that this is not the whole truth, not even the best part of the truth. "There are in France some fifty thousand young men of good birth and fairly well off," he says, "who are encouraged to live a life of complete idleness. They must either cease to exist or must come to see that there can be no happiness, no health even, without regular daily labour of some sort. . . . The need of work is in me," he adds. "As soon as I have finished all the novels and short stories I have in my head I shall write a sort of general analysis of my works, and then I'll review all the great writers whom I think I have understood. That would be an easy piece of work for me and of great interest to younger writers. Besides, it would delight me to re-read again all the masters who have afforded me intellectual enjoyment."

As every one knows, he admired Flaubert more than any modern writer; he used to speak of him as his spiritual father, and insisted that after France had passed through a dozen revolutions and had forgotten all the other writers of the time, Flaubert would be studied as a classic, as one "who had lent French prose Divine grace and harmony."

De Maupassant's praise was often astonishingly generous. Already, in '88, he talked of Bourget as a master, and of Zola as "a great writer . . . a considerable literary value," though he could not help adding, with characteristic frankness, "personally, I don't like the man." He did not like his work either; indeed Zola's method of work was the absolute antithesis to his own, and surely de Maupassant's method was right, and Zola's wrong. Here is the comparison as recorded by François. First of all, de Maupassant admits that "Zola is a relentless workman, willing to undergo any labour. He's now thinking of writing a novel on every different class of labourer. But a man of real talent oughtn't to do that sort of thing. He should only write what he has felt, what he has seen and understood. I'd go even further and say he should only write of what he loves and of what he hates, of what he has lived, suffered, and enjoyed. I'm not tempted to imitate Zola."

Before leaving this book I must just touch on de Maupassant's religious beliefs, for, after all, it is from what a man believes about this life and the next that we get his true measure. The pages on the death of his brother, and de Maupassant's visit to his tomb, are among the best in the book. De Maupassant did not give himself readily to strangers; but his family affections and his rare friendships were peculiarly passionate and tender. His mother was an ideal to him, and he mourned his brother as one who would not be comforted. "I saw him die," he says. "According to the doctors, he should have died the day before; but he was waiting for me and would not go without seeing me once more and saying 'good-bye' to me again. 'Adieu . . . Au revoir peut-être? . . Qui sait?'" And then this deeper word still about Jesus. Pointing to the great figure of the Christ outside a cemetery, de Maupassant said: "Surely the finest intelligence and the most perfect nature ever seen on earth when one thinks of all He did! And He was only thirty-three when they crucified Him! . . . Napoleon I., whom I admire, though only for his genius, said of Him: 'In all that that Man did—God or not—there is something mysterious, incomprehensible. . . .'"

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Yesterday I went out to "Les Ravenelles," his mother's villa here in Nice, set on a little height behind the Rue de France, where de Maupassant spent that 1st of January, 1892, his last day on earth as a man among men. In spite of his indescribable wretchedness and misery, that "malaise indicible," he would not alarm his mother by his absence on such a day; but dragged himself over from Cannes, and gave her whom he loved so tenderly the illusion at least that he was getting better. The effort cost him more than life. He returned to Cannes by train, and at two the next morning François heard him ringing and hurried to his bedside, only to find his master streaming in blood and mad. Au rancart! au rancart!

To-day I went through the little, low, two-storied villa, and sat where he had sat, and walked where he had walked. Here, on this raised, half-moon terrace; on that bright, clear day, with the sunshine sparkling over there on the blue sea he had always taken such pleasure in; here he stood, another Anthony, and fought a more terrible fight than the Roman had ever imagined. I had seen him a month before, and had a long, intimate talk with him which cannot be set down in these columns; but it enables me to picture him as he was that fatal morning. He had taken François with him to cook his food; he meant to give himself every chance of winning in the fight, and now, the meal over, the strain of talking and pretending grew intolerable, and he came out here by himself, with only the blue, unheeding sky above and the purple, dancing sea in front to mock his agony.

How desperately he struggled for control; now answering some casual remark of his friends, now breaking out into cold sweat of dread as he felt the rudder slipping from his hand; called back to sanity again by some laughing remark, or other blessed sound of ordinary life, and then, again, swept off his feet by the icy flood of sliding memory and dreadful thronging imaginings, with the awful knowledge behind knocking at his consciousness that he was already mad, mad—never to be sane again, mad—that the awful effort to hold on to the slippery rock and not to slide down again into the depths was all in vain, that he was slipping, slipping in spite of himself, in spite of bleeding fingers, falling—falling. . . .

Hell has no such horror! There in that torture chamber—did it last but a minute—he paid all debts, poor hounded, hunted creature with wild beseeching eyes, choking in the grip of the foulest spectre that besets humanity. . . . And all for what? For another long hour with the "bourgeoise de plus grand chic . . . d'une beauté remarquable," all for another kiss from the lady of remarkable beauty, "to whom he was always glad to say 'good-bye.'"

The worship of the great goddess Aselgeia is sweet indeed, honey to the lips; but the price she exacts from her devotees is appalling. How many of them I have known, and how brilliant they were: her victims are taken from the most gifted of the sons of men.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

V.—THE HOPE OF THE ARTISTS

In this age of terminological exactitudes it is a luxury to own that one has made a mistake. In writing a few weeks ago of the King of the Belgians I ventured to say that he was amiable, popular, and on the whole not very important. Writing to-day, I would say that the King is the most important man in Belgium; for in a country where native art has hitherto been uniformly ignored he has already proved himself, in the best sense of the word, a patron of art and artists. How far this may be due to the influence of the Queen—herself passionately interested in art—I do not know; but in any case it must not be forgotten that it takes a wise man to be influenced by a wise woman. Belgium to-day is a nation of extremely efficient shopkeepers; but the King has said publicly that to be great it is not enough for a nation to keep shop with success—it must also have some concern for literature and art in general; and by his own friendly attitude towards artists he has already succeeded in creating something like a revolution in the bourgeois mind. He has held a reception of Belgian artists, he has had a Belgian poet to lunch, and, in fine, he has gone far to convince the Belgians that it may not be necessary to go to Paris for their art.

The extent to which this lesson was needed may hardly be realised in England, where the majority that ignores English artists ignores the artists of other countries with equal fervour. But an amusing instance of the dependence of Brussels on Paris opinion comes to hand. Some time ago a new play by two Belgian authors, "Le Mariage de Mlle. Beulemans," was produced in Brussels, and ran for only thirty performances. It was then produced in Paris, where it was a great success and ran for three hundred nights. Paris having approved of it, it has now been revived in Brussels, and will run for ever. The play has no particular artistic merit, but the incident is worthy of the country that waited for a Frenchman to discover Maeterlinck. Similarly I was told of a picture that was hardly noticed by the critics when it was first exhibited in Brussels, but which won columns in the Belgian Press after it had been awarded a gold medal in France and purchased by a number of amateurs for the Art Collection at Dundee. The Belgian critics are still afraid to praise their countrymen until Paris has given them a lead, and naturally Paris is not eager to send many laurels over the frontier.

But now it seems likely that the interest displayed by the King and Queen in the work of Belgian artists will check this unpatriotic parasitism on the part of Belgian critics. And it must be noted that this Royal encouragement is not directed solely or even mainly to those painters and writers whose discrete revolutions and reactionary audacities already delight and flatter the bourgeois mind. For here, as in London, the artist with some technical accomplishment and a tradesman's soul can always achieve success; it is a mistake to think that it is only England that produces Royal Academicians. I went to a one-man show here the other day, where I saw fifty pictures, any one of which would have been hung by our Royal Academy; and I was told that the artist had sold the greater part of them. Portraits of women holding pocket-handkerchiefs and letters, portraits of pretty children, nudes that were not naked, all painted cleverly enough, but without a note of individuality or vision from one end of the exhibition to the other. It is artists of this type on whom most nations hasten to lavish official encouragement, though it is manifest that it is they who want it least. For the vulgar mind is always intelligent enough to recognise and delight in the vulgar in art, without any official recommendation to assist it in forming a judgment.

It seems to me that the King and Queen of the Belgians are not only spiritually but also politically wise in seeking to foster the art of their country. The late King Leopold treated artists with the scant consideration that he displayed to every one who did not minister to his laborious pleasures; towards the end of his reign he had the whole of his collection of pictures by contemporary artists put up for sale by public auction in Brussels. It is difficult to exaggerate the damage such an action may do to a monarchy. In estimating the power of the artist the Philistine imprisoned in his little moment forgets that the censure of great artists is as permanent as the flattery of politicians is evanescent, and this power makes itself felt through a hundred subtle channels. To-day, under the increasing influence of that spirit of democracy which for my part I distrust and detest, the kings of the world, as it were, stand ever on their trial. They are judged, absurdly enough, on their possession of the ordinary social qualities, as if it were any part of a ruler's mission to imitate the conduct of his subjects. Though they were probably hardly a contributing factor, the comparatively harmless peccadilloes of the King of Portugal were cited as eloquent arguments for the revolution. Yet there is always a risk that after he has achieved all the bourgeois virtues, his subjects may refuse to serve a King who differs in no wise from themselves, though his overcoat is trimmed with ermine and his bowler hat is made of gold. A democratic ruler is a paradox that can never appeal to the unsophisticated mind of the majority. But by extending his kingdom to the realms of art a King can secure his needed superiority over the common man, and be sure that his position will be strengthened and not weakened with the passage of years. This is what King Albert is doing with the aid of his clever and amiable Queen, and already it is easy to see that his policy is sound.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Perhaps this is hardly a holiday article, but I have been very much impressed by the hopeful spirit of the Belgian artists under the new régime. Everywhere I am told that Belgium is going to do big things in art, now that she has an opportunity to win free from the tyranny of the French critics. This is so different from the permanent gloom that envelops all those who cling to the ideal of high artistic endeavour in England that my spirit is infinitely refreshed. It seems that a select public of about two thousand settles the fate of works of art in Brussels, and that hitherto this body of amateurs has been united in their neglect of native art. Now all this is going to be altered, and poets and painters, musicians and architects go singing to their work.

To-day is a perfect blue day of Spring, and as I finish this article in a café on the boulevards the sap is rising in the trees, and every pretty girl who passes has a smiling face. I like writing in cafés because there is good literary precedent for it, and also because to my ear there is no music in the world so soothing as the murmur of human voices. Probably most of the people who sit round me as I write are saying things of no importance, but the united effect of their voices is tuneful, and curiously like the sound of a small brook running over pebbles. In the aggregate men and women are pleasantly childlike. Every time a brass band passes (which occurs about every five minutes in Brussels) everybody stands up to see it go by. They look regretfully at their half-finished Bocks, as if they wanted to go out and run in front with the other children.

A gentleman who is sitting at my table, and who had been watching my pen with an almost embarrassing interest, raised his glass a minute ago with a genial "Hurrah for England!" for the English are very popular in Brussels since the fire at the Exhibition. I was not to be outdone in politeness. "Hurrah for Albert, King of the Belgians," I cried, "and King of the Belgian artists!" The gentleman, who is clearly bourgeois, is still looking at me with approval, so it is apparent that the revolution has begun, for surely it is but a step from being pleased with such a toast to spending your money on pictures and books of verse.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE AUTHORISED VERSION

"IT lives on the ear like music that can never be forgotten, like the sound of church bells. Its felicities seem often to be things rather than words. It is part of the national mind and the anchor of national seriousness."

The year 1911 is the third centenary of an event which was destined to have the most important effect on the history and development of the English language—the publication of the Authorised Version of the Bible. In 1604, the second year of his reign, James I. met the representatives of the opposing religious parties with a view to discussing measures of mutual conciliation which should promote the unification of religion throughout the realm. Among the most sensible proposals put forward was that a new translation of the Scriptures be undertaken which should be agreeable to all parties and denominations alike. This proposal, of Puritan origin, was heartily welcomed by the King, who was himself a scholar and theologian of repute, for, said he, "I have never yet seen a satisfactory translation of the Bible." Not only did he endorse the suggestion, but himself laid down the principles that were to guide the translators in their work. The most important of these were that no marginal comments of a theological or controversial character were to be appended, but only such as were necessary for purposes of reference or for the removal of obscurities; and that the text of the earlier translations was to be followed wherever scholarship and accuracy allowed. It is not, therefore, by an idle compliment that James is addressed in the Preface as "the prime author and mover of the work."

Three years elapsed before the work was actually begun. No fewer than forty-seven prelates and laymen were employed on the great task. These were divided into groups, each of which was responsible for one section of the work; but all were conjointly responsible for the final decision in disputed matters. Three more years passed before the translation was actually completed, and in 1611 the first edition was issued under the sanction of the Royal authority. For three hundred years this version has held its place without a rival in all English-speaking countries, and among all denominations of English Christianity. Many other translations have since been published, but none of these have reached a second edition, with the single exception of the Revised Version and the English Roman Catholic Bible, which has been more and more assimilated to the Authorised Version with each successive edition.

No book, since books were first invented, has been multiplied into so many copies, or penetrated to so many and distant quarters of the globe, and few books have retained their hold on the popular mind undiminished through so many centuries. From these causes, the wide extent of its influence and the permanence of its authority, results the importance of its bearing on the English language. Whatever forces of disruption and decay are at work upon the language as a whole, the constant infusion of alien elements through contact with foreign nations, the constant ousting of earlier idiom by popular slang, no portion of the older English tongue incorporated in the test of the English scriptures can ever fall wholly into desuetude. However much the various sections of the English-speaking race may diverge from one another in speech and idiom, in accordance with the law of change, from which no living language is exempt, there must yet always remain a nucleus of simple and elementary speech common and intelligible to all. What the poems of Homer were to the Greek language, the Authorised Version is to the English tongue—a standard of original usage accessible to all classes, a monument of pure English more enduring than stone, a common starting-point of elementary instruction, removed for all time from the influences of change that affect the spoken vocabulary of all languages, an indissoluble link between distant ages and distant lands.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The influence of the Authorised Version upon English literature—that is, upon the language as a vehicle of sublime and beautiful thoughts, is even more striking than its influence upon the language in the more general sense. Many great writers have openly acknowledged their indebtedness to the Bible for whatever beauty of style and diction they have achieved. Many more have incurred this debt without acknowledging it. Most notable among these stands Swinburne, much of whose verse is so biblical in diction and idiom as to sound like quotation. In fact, it is scarcely an over-statement to say that the language of English poetry is the language of the English Bible. To what cause must we ascribe the spell cast by the Bible over the minds of poets and prose-writers alike, even over men who have been least in sympathy with the spirit of its teaching? How can we explain the singular poetic beauty of a translation made at a time when the art of translation had not yet been studied, and by men who, though great scholars, could scarcely be expected to prove themselves either poets or stylists? It is to be noted that the beauty we refer to is a thing apart from the beauty of the thought conveyed; it appertains to the quality of the English by which the thought is expressed. It is noticeably lacking from the original Greek of the New Testament, which is hybrid and essentially illiterate, void of all those qualities that made classical Greek the finest literary medium the world has yet invented. It is also absent from the French version, and a quotation from that translation jars like a discord upon English ears.

Moreover, the translators of the Authorised Version seem in many respects to have fallen far short of the standards of excellence by which we judge translators of the present day. Many of the things in this Version would appear extremely crude if they appeared in any modern rendering of an ancient language. Thus the Greek word which means "gathering" or "assembly" is rendered by the clumsy and cacophonous word "synagogue." The Greek word for "tent" is represented by the ponderous Latin derivative "tabernacle"—a word which does not, and probably never has, conveyed to the English mind the original meaning of "a temporary canvas erection" such as itinerant Eastern merchants are in the habit of using to protect themselves and their wares from the blazing sun; such, in effect, as it was St. Paul's trade to manufacture. Again, it is certain that the passage "Woe unto you scribes, Pharisees, hypocrites" would be rendered in any modern translation "Woe unto you scribes, Pharisees, play-actors!" for that is the literal meaning of the Greek, and it is considered weak and ineffective to render any word of an ancient tongue by its modern etymological derivative.

These and many other instances might be adduced to show that the Authorised Version cannot, according to modern standards, be considered a masterpiece of translation. From what source, then, does it derive its unique literary qualities? The root of the matter must be sought in the early history of the Bible in England. The language of the Authorised Version is not, as is often supposed, the contemporary language of Jacobean times. It is a traditional Biblical language, which originated with the first English version of Wyclif, and was transmitted through all subsequent translations down to the Bishops' Bible, the immediate predecessor of the Authorised Version. In this respect, again, it may be compared with the Homeric poems, which are now believed to have been composed in a speech never in actual use, and already archaic at the time of their composition. And just as the language of Homer was consecrated in the minds of its hearers to the narration of superhuman deeds and heroic emotions, so the language of the Bible is for us a language specially appropriated to the utterance of noble thoughts and exalted ideals. The beauty of the Bible, therefore, though distinct from the beauty of its meaning, is indirectly a result of that quality, for beauty of language is almost entirely a matter of association of ideas, and it is in this way that the Bible language has, through the centuries, acquired those qualities which we are seeking to explain. As the wood of a violin grows with time attuned to the sounds constantly passing through it, so the diction of the Bible has come to harmonise perfectly with sublime and noble thoughts, which is the essence of true poetry.

The existence of this traditional Bible-language serves also to explain those seeming errors of judgment, already mentioned, which have led the translators of the Authorised Version to introduce ponderous Latin and Greek derivatives, where a shorter and more obvious word would appear to be more in keeping with the characteristic simplicity of the version as a whole. The introduction of such words is in every case due to the translators' deference to the authority of tradition. They were attempting to steer a middle course between two extreme opinions—that of the Puritans, who held that every word of the original should be rendered by its simplest equivalent in English, and that of the Papists, who desired to retain many purely ecclesiastical words, quite unintelligible to vulgar ears:—

> We have, on the one side, avoided the scrupulosity of the Puritans, who leave the old ecclesiastical words and betake them to other, as where they put "washing" for "baptism," and "congregation" for "church," as also, on the other hand, we have shunned the obscurity of the Papists in their "azymes," "tunike," "pasche," and such like, whereof their late translation is full, and that of purpose to darken the sense, that since they needs must translate the Bible, yet by the language thereof it may be kept from being understood.

So wrote the translators in their preface, showing that we should be grateful there are not more such words rather than captious because there are a few. These considerations serve also to explain the absence of any peculiar charm from the French version of the Bible. The standard translation in France is, of course, not the French version, but the Vulgate, or old Latin version. The translation into the native tongue is in comparatively modern French, and has therefore no more dignity and charm than is to be found in the everyday speech of the people.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

"La Guerre du Feu, Roman des Ages Farouches" (Fasquelle, Paris, 3f. 50c.), must be added to the list of novels given us by J. H. Rosny aîné, since he has ceased to collaborate with his brother. He is one of the most vigorous writers of French prose, and he has not feared to attack the most various subjects. In "La Vague Rouge" he treated of modern revolutionary morals; in "Marthe Barraquin" he described popular life; but never, in our opinion, has he shown so much strength and character as in "La Guerre du Feu," which is a very forcible description of prehistoric times. M. Rosny is of Belgian descent, and the Belgians were originally composed of savage tribes skilled in hurling the javelin and throwing with the sling. May one then suppose, without appearing too presumptuous, that it is some strange, marvellous atavism—transmitted through centuries unknown—which enables the author of "La Guerre du Feu" to evoke, with such semblance of reality, those ages now buried under the dust of countless years?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The members of the Oulhamr tribe are in great distress. The Fire, their chief means of safeguard, has flickered out, leaving them unprotected before the assaults of their natural enemies. Two young warriors, Naoh and Aghoo, venture to go in search of Fire and restore it to the tribe. The victor will receive Gammla, the chief's beautiful daughter, as a reward. The two rivals start on their perilous quest, and, thanks to M. Rosny's wonderful descriptive gift, we witness the thrilling adventures which befall Naoh and his followers, Gaw and Nam. We behold them struggling against the terrible fauna of prehistoric ages, vanquishing the aurochs, the grey bears, and the monstrous lions; we see them ravishing the Fire from the Kzamms by means of their strength and wiliness. Naoh returns triumphant to the tribe after having slain Aghoo, thus winning the lovely Gammla, and becoming also chief of the Oulhamr.

It is a real relief to read a novel from which sickly sentimentalism is excluded, and which deals of another subject than the one condemned in the Seventh Commandment. "La Guerre du Feu" has many qualities, but the one which is perhaps most salient is its healthiness. It is strong, exciting, without being in any way related to "adventure books"; it might even, in a certain respect, be considered as having an historical interest. The impression of which one is conscious after reading it is one of great and sincere admiration for the extraordinary endurance, perseverance, and cunning which primitive man must have displayed so as to survive among all the fearsome creatures which surrounded him, and also in order to conquer all other beings in creation. And one understands very clearly, by means of M. Rosny's most interesting work, that so-called civilisation has made but little change in the fundamental instincts of human nature.

M. J. H. Retinger has compiled an "Histoire de la Littérature Française du Romantisme à Nos Jours" (Bernard Grasset, Paris, 3f. 50c.), which is relatively complete for the space at his disposal. It treats of the evolution of French literature since the romantic school, showing the various influences to which it has been subjected. It is much to be regretted that several typographical errors should have escaped the author's notice, and also that in certain instances the punctuation should be so neglected; indeed this occasionally confuses the sense. And M. Retinger would greatly have added to the value of his work had he thought good to add an index. It is hardly possible to give a complete analysis of "L'Histoire de la Littérature Française du Romantisme à Nos Jours," as to do so would necessitate an extremely long article. We will confine ourselves to the facts which will especially interest those who appreciate modern French literature. Passing by the chapters dealing of such well-known subjects as Romanticism, the Parnassians, the theory of "l'art pour l'art," the first decadents, and the individualistic school, we will analyse briefly M. Retinger's work from where he treats of the writers belonging to the latter quarter of the nineteenth century, many of whom are unknown even in France, except by those who follow very closely the course of modern literature.

Among the lettrés belonging to no particular school we note Elémir Bourges, for whom M. Retinger professes a deep and sincere admiration. Speaking of this writer, he says:—"Il ambitionne de faire tenir le monde entier dans son livre, de le personnifier dans son personnage principal, dont il fait un demi-dieu, ou un demi-démon." Elémir Bourges's book, entitled "La Nef," containing, so M. Retinger affirms, "all human philosophy, ranging from Anaxoras to Kant, from Buddha to Nietzche," is written in a very fine style, and forms one of the chefs-d'œuvre of French literature. His other works bear the quaint titles of "Les Oiseaux s'envolent, les Feulles tombent," "Tête d'Or," &c., and, to conclude his criticism, M. Retinger declares:—"C'est un grand écrivain, c'est un pur artiste, c'est un profond penseur qu'Elémir Bourges!"

We note with interest that the works of the majority of the novelists, poets, or philosophers with whom M. Retinger deals in the latter part of his book are issued by the proprietors of the Mercure de France, one of the most renowned French publishing houses, so well known for its advanced ideas and its tolerance for the most diverse opinions. Many of the writers spoken of in the last hundred pages of "L'Histoire de la Littérature Française" belong to the staff of that remarkable fortnightly periodical. The Mercure de France contains the very interesting feature of a "Revue de la Quinzaine," dealing with the literary, artistic, and scientific movements in all countries; indeed, special attention is given to English literature, all the newest and best books being reviewed by M. H. D. Davray, whose criticisms equal his wonderful translations of the works of Wells, Wilde, &c. M. Rémy de Gourmont, who contributes twice a month to the Mercure de France, and who is also the director of La Revue des Idées, "treating specially of general criticism," is justly considered one of the most erudite men of our time. M. Retinger says of him very truly: "Il a écrit de ces pages brèves qui suffisent a résumer et à synthétiser un écrivain. Après les avoir lues, on a l'impression de quelque-chose de définitif." And his series entitled "Promenades Littéraires" rank him amongst the most eminent of living critics. Marcel Schwob was, with M. Rémy de Gourmont, the second real prosator of symbolism. His first book, "Les Mimes," is composed of delightful and delicate sketches of antique life. In his masterpiece, "Le Livre de Monelle," Schwob gives "a gospel of falsehood" as preached by a little child. His maxim is the opposite of that of Socrates. "Do not know thyself!" he cries, whilst his other doctrines are: "Accept life as a perpetual change," "Do not regret the past," "Build on the sand."

Among the poets M. Retinger mentions Albert Samain ("Le Jardin de l'Infante," "Le Chariot d'Or") who was subjected to the double influence of the Parnassians and the decadent school; Charles Guérin ("Le Semeur de Cendres," "Le Cœur Solitaire"), whose aim is to put the "greatest amount of humanity possible" into his works; Paul Fort ("Ballades Françaises"), who seeks his inspiration at the heart of Nature; the refined and exquisite poet, Francis Jammes, who expresses the most delicate sentiments with an archaic simplicity which is charming, and whose desire finds utterance in these two verses of his, quoted by M. Retinger:—

> Laissez-moi, ô mon Dieu, continuer la vie
> D'une façon aussi simple qu'il m'est possible.

The very titles of his works are delightful—"De l'Angélus de l'Aube à l'Angélus du Soir," "Le Deuil des Primevères," "Clairières dans le Ciel," "L'Église habillée de Feuilles."

M. Retinger admires Paul Claudel, a prose writer, who, like Elémir Bourges, is certainly only known by the élite, and who is held in high esteem by such masters as Francis Jammes, André Gide, and Charles Louis Philippe, who even went so far as to say: "Il est grand comme Dante"! M. Retinger believes Claudel to have studied fervently all ancient culture, and, speaking of the author of "Le Partage de Midi," "La Connaissance de l'Est," etc, he says:—

> Il est le seul de tous les écrivains modernes qui du symbole soit arrivé à la compréhension de son sens. . . . Sa pensée est toujours le reflet de lui-même, mais à force d'aspirer le plus possible vers l'humain, il la rend généralisatrice"

M. Retinger closes his volume by a most interesting study of

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Romain Rolland, whose books he esteems "pure works of art," in that they embrace two elements – "art and life." Romain Rolland, besides being a very erudite scholar and a great musical critic, is moreover a penetrating psychologist. His leading work is the well-known "Jean-Christophe," to be completed in ten volumes, eight of which have already appeared. Art being for him the "emperor of life," he wishes to make his hero, Jean-Christophe, a "sort of genius struggling against mankind." Jean-Christophe himself is a colossal figure, ardent, convinced, intransigent, a real and true artist; he has consequently to battle against humanity, which strives to domesticate him and make him "more like everybody else," wishing, perhaps, by an unconscious envy, to push him back into the ordinary human fold. And in M. Retinger's opinion Romain Rolland, master writer and observer, musician at heart, is perhaps the "first French writer who has tried to reserve in his works an equal part to observation and psychology, and who has wished to express in them a humanistic signification, without falling into the 'roman à thèse.'"

We must be grateful to M. Retinger for having given us this interesting recapitulation of French literature since romanticism; it should certainly prove of great value to those who wish to follow the tendencies and ideas which have greatly contributed to form the existing school of French writers. But the question how many of the works generously styled by M. Retinger "chefs-d'œuvre" in the course of his study will really be considered as such in a few generations to come is one of those mysteries which time alone will solve.

MARC LOGÉ.

A JESUIT BATHING-POOL

BY W. H. KOEBEL

THE centre of a wide clearing in the forest-land is dotted by a semi-circular line of palms. The regularity with which the tall, slender shafts rise up to hold aloft their feathery tops against the sky is sufficiently marked to attract the eye from a distance, for the even distribution of the perfect semi-circle of palms is obviously the work of man rather than of Nature. Approaching more nearly, the reason of the plantation becomes evident. The graceful trees fringe the edge of a depression in the ground, the sides of which are flanked by massive stone walls and steps—the architectural remnants of a bathing-pool of the long-departed Jesuit era.

Curiously enough, the stone facings—though marred by crumblings here and there—have remained comparatively intact, though the full spread of the waters they once held has shrunk to a little, shallow lake that only covers in part the broken stone of the bottom. And even this, choked with reed and swamp flower, is the home of the loud-mouthed frogs alone now. For many generations it has been as innocent of the feet of human bathers as the stone sides upon which the lizards bask in an enjoyable peace that is broken only by the occasional lightning dart in the direction of an unwary fly.

For all its present solitude and stillness, the place was undoubtedly an important centre of aquatic ceremony and splashings some couple of centuries ago. The lengthy flight of shallow steps that closes in the semi-circle of the bath must have been thronged often enough then by the robed figures of the Jesuit Fathers and the dusky forms of the neophytes in their white frocks. One can picture the scene—the advent of the Indians as they marched to the spot to the sounds of music, and the chanting of hymns that were as inevitable in an everyday procession as the human constituents of the affair, and the kneeling of the company before the shrines that now lie in fragments of broken masonry prone on a brilliant scarlet carpet of verbena, with the great white trumpet-shaped blossoms of the datura hanging in clusters above. Then would ensue the burst of exuberance that accompanied the actual festival of the bathing, the shoutings and whoopings and splashings that the Fathers superintended from the shore, keeping a wary eye all the while upon the simple, dark-skinned converts, lest the fervour of the rejoicings should exceed the decorum that had become part and parcel of the neophyte life. No doubt there were times when the Fathers went fussing to and fro on shore as impotently as foster-mother hens with duckling broods in the water. Indeed, the nature of these northern Indians considered, it could scarcely have been otherwise, although no confession of the sort appears in the chronicles of the period.

No doubt, too, in the neighbourhood of the bathing-pool here there were official functions and gatherings of state, beside the gorgeousness of which the glamour of the ordinary processions paled. Companies of the Jesuit army would be present then; the Indian militia, whose officers were resplendent in uniforms thickly laced with silver and gold; and dusky civil officials, as proud of their distinctive coats as were the military of their trappings. Were the ceremony for the reception of some high clerical personage on his round of inspection of the Mission-towns, the clash of martial music would have swept over the waters, and the standards would have floated in brilliant folds against the verdure of the palms and evergreen trees. For colours flew, drums beat, and fifes and clarions sounded then, until the war companies of the neophytes came forward at the given signal to prostrate themselves, and to kiss the hand of the august visitor.

The spot has witnessed all this, without question, many times over, since even the greater festivals were amazingly frequent in the great Jesuit Republic of Misiones. So it is that the clearing in the forest seems to brood, notwithstanding its flowers, sunshine, and deep blue sky. Whatever may have been the intrinsic value of the clashings of music and of the tramp of processional feet, the utter stillness that now pervades the place is a little melancholy, even by force of a contrast that can only be imagined—utter stillness, that is to say, so far as the sounds of human life are concerned. Into the place upon which man has turned his back the lesser species have crowded in numbers. The birds are everywhere. Kingfishers dart from tree to tree; the shivering brilliancy of the tiny humming-birds materialises over and over again as though evolved from thin air to float for a while before the gaudy blossoms of the plants ere disappearing temporarily in a flight too rapid for the human eye to follow. Soaring in the air high above, carving bold circles in the azure of the sky, are great black vultures, and majestic black and white birds of prey that trail behind them the long feathers of a divided tail. As they dip downwards from time to time the multitudinous cooing of the doves in the trees below dies away to a silence of terror. In the face of a threat from above such as this it would seem that of all the more invisible winged creatures the butterflies alone continue to hover with a complacent mind about the clusters of great blooms that strew the earth and the branches.

Such are the dwellers that have ousted the thronging companies of the Mission Indians who went with chantings and song to the labours in the fields, and who, to the sound of music, returned of an evening to the stately towns, now deeply shrouded in the tropical curtain of the forests. This until there came scattering and destruction, and the end of the great Jesuit Republic, cursed by some, blessed by others, that stood as a monumental testimony to human endeavour, and fell as a testimony to precisely the same thing. Even of the fields there are now no traces left, although the dark foliage of the orange-trees sprouts up here and there from out of the midst of the scrub and tall grasses that cover the soil.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The fate of the orange here is typical of the spot. Unseen and uncared for, the golden balls in their thousands ripen, and fall, and rot. For who is coming to the old Jesuit bathing-place to gather oranges, or for any other purpose besides? From time to time a dusky peon may ride by. He may even force his horse down the flight of stone steps and water the animal in the remnants of the pool. But not for a moment will it enter his mind that the bathing-place entered into the history of his ancestors. To him the aspect of the spot is perfectly clear. It is a pool set about with crumbling masonry, in the midst of palms, orange-trees, and bananas. As, of course, it really is.

THE LAUNCH OF H.M.S. MONARCH

A RECORD

THURSDAY last saw a notable addition to the British Navy in the launch at Elswick of H.M.S. Monarch. The Tyne is not a beautiful river. The day was not a fine one, but the day, the smoke, and the surroundings seemed most fitting for the work to be done—grim power and work, and not play, seemed the keynote of it all.

After the launch, Sir Andrew Noble, chairman of the company, in proposing "Success to his Majesty's battleship Monarch," gave some interesting reminiscences of former Monarchs, and some instructive particulars of the vessel just launched. He said:—

The Monarch is one of the "Dreadnought" class of vessels included in the Admiralty programme of 1909 and 1910, and, like the other vessels included in that programme, she was designed by Sir Philip Watts, Director of Naval Construction at the Admiralty. She is 581 feet in length over all, 88½ feet in breadth, and her displacement exceeds 22,000 tons. Her armament will comprise the most modern and powerful weapons installed in vessels of the class. She is the forty-third warship we have had the honour to build for the British Government out of a total of 135 warships built by the firm. This number comprises vessels of every class, from the destroyer to the largest and most powerful battleship. The total displacement of the forty-three vessels amount to 200,000 tons, and the total displacement of the whole number of warships built by the firm is 500,000 tons. The keel of the Monarch was laid on the 1st April last year. Notwithstanding the strike, which lasted from the beginning of September until the middle of December, exceptional progress has been made with her construction; indeed, it may safely be asserted that no vessel of her class has ever been launched in this, or any other country, in a similar state of progress. The vessel has taken the water with the whole of her boilers and a large portion of her auxiliary machinery on board, and, as you will have observed, with the funnels, funnel uptakes and castings erected in position, and her superstructure well advanced. The armour bulkheads and barbette armour are also in place, and the launching-weight of the vessel is about 11,500 tons, including about 2,000 tons of armour. For this remarkable progress we have to thank the machinery contractors, Messrs. Hawthorn, Leslie & Co. Ltd., whose co-operation has enabled us to establish what may fairly be termed a record in the building and launching of Dreadnoughts.

Naval history informs us that the name Monarch in our Navy dates its origin from the middle of the eighteenth century. In the year 1747 there had been much fighting between the French and British naval forces, and successes were gained in the early part of that year by Vice-Admiral Anson and Captain Thomas Fox. France had collected a huge convoy for the West Indies, and a squadron of eight men-of-war had sailed from Brest to pick it up and escort it to its destination. Consequently a British Squadron of fourteen ships, under Rear-Admiral Edward Hawk, left Plymouth to intercept the French ships, and in October the French were sighted off Finisterre. After some manœuvring a running fight resulted; the French are reported to have behaved with great spirit, and to have been overpowered only by weight of numbers. Of their eight ships of the line six were captured, one of these being the Monarque, a 74-gun ship, which was afterwards brought into the Royal Navy, and was, I believe, the first vessel bearing the name in our Navy. The French convoy, consisting of about 250 ships, was saved by the devotion of the French commodore and captains under his orders.

Ten years later French vessels were sighted off Cape de Gata, and one of these was driven ashore by the Monarch, under the command of Captain John Montague. In 1778 the Monarch was one of the vessels which composed the British Fleet, under the command of Admiral Keppel, in the victory off Ushant. Again the Monarch of 74 guns figured in Sir Samuel Hood's squadron of seventeen vessels in an action with the French under De Grasse at Martinique in the spring of 1781, and later in the same year she occupied a place in the fleet commanded by Rear-Admiral Thomas Graves in an engagement with the French off the Chesapeake. The Monarch also took part in an engagement at St. Kitts Island and off Guadeloupe in 1782, and we also find a Monarch mentioned in reports of the Channel Fleet in 1793. In 1795 it is recorded that the hostility of Holland led to the despatch from England of an expedition against the Dutch Colony at the Cape of Good Hope. This expedition comprised seven vessels of the line under the command of Admiral Elphinstone, whose flagship was the Monarch, 74 guns. She was also present in February, 1796, off Saldanha Bay, when the Dutch capitulated before a superior British force under the command of the same admiral. Another engagement with the Dutch took place in October, 1797, in which the Monarch was badly mauled and thirty-six of her officers and crew were killed and one hundred wounded.

In March, 1801, a large British fleet sailed for the Baltic, the van being commanded by Lord Nelson. The leading ship was the Monarch, and in action with the defences of Copenhagen in April of the year named the Monarch lost her captain, who was killed during the engagement, together with fifty-six officers and men, and 164 were wounded The Monarch was in the hottest of the fight, as evidenced by the number of casualties.

Sir Andrew mentioned other actions in which the Monarch took part, and after alluding to a later Monarch of 84 guns, said:—

In 1868 a new Monarch was launched. This vessel was fully rigged, had two turrets, was of 8,320 tons displacement, 7,840 horse-power, and nearly 15 knots speed. Her armour protection varied in thickness from four to ten inches; she carried four 25-ton 12-inch guns, two 12-ton 9-inch guns, one 5½-ton 7-inch gun, and seventeen smaller guns—all muzzle-loaders. Thus, if you compare the new Monarch with her immediate predecessor, you will find that the present vessel has a displacement nearly three times that of the former, and a speed of 50 per cent. greater, whilst the old muzzle-loading guns have given place to the most powerful breach-loaders the science of artillery has yet produced.

Many exploits of this '68 Monarch were referred to by Sir Andrew, and it will be seen that the name borne by the vessel recently launched has had an active and almost continuous association with the operations of our Navy through more than a century and a half.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF ARTS

A VERY large audience listened with interest on Wednesday evening, March 29th, to Mr. George B. Heming's lecture on "Art Education in the Jewellery, Goldsmithing, and Allied Trades." The lecturer introduced his subject by emphasising the decline of the craftsman which began with the advent of the machine, referring especially to the working of the precious metals, and went on to describe what was being done in other countries for the encouragement of artistic workmanship. "For the last few years," said Mr. Heming, "we have placidly watched the advance of our French and German competitors in commercial matters. It behoves us to awake from our lethargy of self-complacence, and to move with the times. If the jewellery trade and those dealing with the precious metals are to be maintained against the inroads of foreign competition and saved from obliteration, we must not lose a moment in our endeavour to educate the young apprentice and improver in art, encouraging him by every means in our power."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Schools of Art of Geneva and their enterprise were alluded to, and the methods of the Society of Goldsmiths of Paris; then the lecturer went into interesting details as to the work now being done in London, with which he is intimately connected. Classes have been formed for the study of drawing and designing under the direction of the "Goldsmiths, Silversmiths, and Jewellers Art Council," which came into existence in the year 1908, and are turning out highly competent workmen who, distributed throughout the trade, will gradually raise the artistic level of the objects they create. In concluding his instructive address, Mr. Heming made some pertinent observations concerning the care which should be employed in selecting teachers: "The teacher should not make too much of his own individual ideas—he must remember that his duty is not to force the pupil into his own already formed mould, but to find out possibilities and to encourage any efforts after originality, however tentative they may at first glance seem." The beginning thus made might seem small, but great progress was already on record, and Mr. Heming invited discussion on the subject.

Sir George Birdwood, who presided, remarked that he had heartily shared the pleasure of the audience, and commented upon Mr. Heming's work as an educational reformer. Touching upon the tendency of art, he observed that all art reached its highest expression in religious feeling, and that if the beauty of holiness and the holiness of beauty were not one, they were at least inseparable.

A lively discussion followed, in which Dr. Garnett, Mr. Henry Wilson, Mr. Lowen, and several members of the gold and silver-smithing industries took part, some differing from the lecturer on minor points. The suggestion of Mr. Henry Wilson that a general Conference should be held on the subject of trade education was applauded, and there is no doubt that Mr. Heming's stimulating lecture will bear fruit in an increased interest in the problem of artistic education, especially with reference to the precious metals, which afford such exceptional opportunities for beauty of design and workmanship.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE ARBITRATION DISCUSSION: SOME NEW DEVELOPMENTS

By Lancelot Lawton

The announcement of Sir Edward Grey that Great Britain was eager to enter into a general arbitration treaty with the United States has been followed by a world-wide discussion as to the practicability not only of this contemplated measure, but of all efforts aimed at the ultimate establishment of universal peace. It is undeniably true, and at the same time deeply to be deplored, that the cause which statesmen in both countries seek to serve should have suffered to some extent by reason of the over-enthusiasm of the extreme pacificists. While the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs wisely made an appeal for the education of public opinion, it is hardly likely that he was prepared for that confusion of the public mind which has revealed itself in the sanguine utterances of many prominent leaders of thought throughout the country. With characteristic license the ultra-humanitarians have strayed far beyond the limits prescribed by diplomacy. In their writings and discourses on arbitration and its principles they have not hesitated to indulge in a wealth of optimistic allusion to the possibilities of general disarmament as a prelude to the utopian state of universal brotherhood among the nations. Unwittingly, rhetoric of this kind defeats the very object it seeks to encompass, for raising, as it does, suspicions in certain quarters concerning the question of motive, it embarrasses the only policy that, by the gradual process of evolution, is capable of embracing the highest ideal of all true civilisation. At a moment when wise statesmanship has realised the urgency for moving circumspectly, irresponsible zealots on both sides of the Atlantic have sought, with a precipitancy not shared by the angels, to father upon their Governments a deep-laid scheme to curb the growing activities of the more ambitious nations. Consequently the impression is abroad that Great Britain has become the advocate of peace simply because she has fallen into decrepitude, and therefore stands in need of peace.

Naturally the pulpit regards the subject as one peculiarly within its province. But religion should bear in mind that while endeavouring to promote peace, it is in no sense relieved of its stern duty towards patriotism. The unfortunate tendency exhibited in certain pious quarters to emphasise the savagery of war, while making light of the heroic qualities of self-abnegation which distinguish those who take part in it, is directly opposed to the best interests of State; for in spite of the harmony existing among the Anglo-Saxon peoples, the international situation at the present moment is such as to render it imperative that the martial spirit in this country should be roused and not dampened.

Some of the old religions of the East preach that death in the service of the State carries with it everlasting reward. Strong in this belief, the Japanese marched steadfastly to victory over the plains of Manchuria. With the Christian soldier in the field there is, however, no such solace. Already the martial spirit is rigorously excluded from our schools; and if now, from pulpit and platform, the masses are to be told that war is nothing more or less than wholesale murder and pillage, they must not be expected to display a super-abundance of heroism when the hour of England's crisis is at hand. The culpability will rest with their leaders, who in this feverish, though, doubtless, well-meaning, desire to bring about the millennium, have not hesitated to conjure up visionary ideals out of Anglo-American arbitration, and incidentally to preach doctrines the effect of which they may not have foreseen, but which, in plain language, tend in no small measure to undermine the morale of the King's forces. Momentous though the contemplated treaty may be, reduced to its proper proportions it is essentially what Mr. Birrell has termed, "a family affair"—that it is to say, it embodies the common-sense decision of the two great branches of the Anglo-Saxon race to set an example to the rest of the world by elaborating a tribunal before which to compose their "domestic" differences.

By all means let the religious bodies continue to preach enduring peace. It is a good thing to keep in view so long as we do not delude ourselves into the belief that it is within reach. To rail at the profession of arms, however, is tantamount to an attack upon the foundations of State. In our fervent advocacy of peace we should not forget that the pages of history disclose many examples of peoples who, in consequence of their neglect of the art of war, have become decadent, and illustrations of a like nature are not wanting in recent times. Korea has passed away because she was incapable of defending herself. Until within the last few years the Chinese soldier was an object of contempt to his countrymen. What is the moral? With all her immensity China's utter helplessness has exposed her to strife from within and attack from without, until to-day, in everything that makes for progress, she is a laggard on the highway of nations.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The speech of the German Chancellor is a timely rebuke to the peace "cranks," and should be read in conjunction with the recent debate in the House of Lords on the subject of national defence. It is clear that Germany has already translated her policy into unalterable law. So long as any one nation holds aloof, it would be suicidal for Great Britain to take the initiative in reducing armaments by doing away with so much as a single gun. On the contrary, she must draw her own lesson from the attitude of others, and redouble her defensive measures.

Even were it possible for the nations of Europe to arrive at a common agreement as to the limitation of their military forces, this would not be sufficient. The nations of the East also must be induced to take practical steps towards the realisation of the peace ideal. A helpless Europe would soon fall a prey to a militant Asia. Therefore, a state of abiding tranquillity can only be attained providing that it is universal in the strictest sense of the term. In the meantime, readiness for war will alone act as the deterrent of war. There is a serious danger lest this paradoxical truism be lost sight of in the world-wide discussion which Sir Edward Grey's speech has prompted. Even allowing for the stimulus of Anglo-Saxon harmony, the acceptance of comprehensive arbitration with America is in itself highly significant of the trend of the times. But it cannot be otherwise, relatively speaking, than a very small and elementary step towards the grander ideal. So soon as an attempt is made to interpret lofty principles into the cold text of an international compact, grave difficulties are encountered. To begin with, care has to be exercised to overcome the susceptibilities of the Senate at Washington, whose treaty-making prerogatives are involved; and already there is a significant suggestion that while accepting a declaration in favour of arbitration on all occasions, it will insist upon issues, as these may from time to time arise, being first submitted for consideration. Then, as I anticipated in THE ACADEMY at the outset, the Anglo-Japanese Alliance is proving a complicating factor. I suggested, it will be recalled, that in all probability Japan would seek to meet the new situation by herself proposing a general arbitration treaty with America, and the latest despatches from Washington indicate that, with this end in view, overtures from Tokyo have already been made. The precarious state of Japan's exchequer certainly dictates that she shall adhere to a policy of peace for some time to come; but who, possessing knowledge of her military preparations and of her scheme of imperial expansion, no less deliberate than that pursued by Germany, believes for one moment that at heart she is a sincere advocate of universal peace? In all the circumstances, the conclusion is compelled that, while arbitration will undoubtedly reduce the risks of war, it is essential that, in the background, the Powers should keep, ready for emergencies, strong armies and navies. In this way alone will they maintain national virility and inspire mutual respect.

THE SALTING COLLECTION

THE private view of the Salting Collections—which have since been thrown open to the public—was a revelation of what may be accomplished by a single collector with an enormous income at his disposal, and a real gift for finding out and acquiring true works of art. Mr. Salting came of a Danish family which had settled in Australia. He was educated at Eton and at the University of Sydney, and in early middle life he came to England and devoted himself to forming the great collection which has now been housed worthily in the five splendid galleries in the east wing of the new Victoria and Albert Museum—excluding, of course, the prints and drawings which were first selected under the terms of his will by the Trustees of the British Museum. Mr. Salting was not of the type of collector who hands over a lump sum to a firm of art-dealers with instructions to acquire for him a collection of such objects as he thinks it will make for his personal dignity to possess; such methods of collecting are far from being unknown, but they were not his. He depended upon his own judgment, and that judgment seldom failed him. When it did, he was not above rectifying the error, and replacing the peccant object with something better. Thus it is that the first note of this wonderful collection is excellence And it could find no worthier home than in the spacious and well-lit galleries of Sir Aston Webb's magnificent building at South Kensington.

Many of the objects here shown have been exhibited before in the museums in larger or smaller detachments. The advantage of the present arrangement is that they can now be studied, as it were, in the mass; lines of development can be traced, and parallels with the contemporary art of other countries noted. In this work the admirable illustrated Guide—it is not a complete catalogue—issued by the authorities is of great service. Room 128, the first to be entered, is devoted to Italian and Spanish art of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, associated with certain French and German medals, plaquettes, and medallions for convenience of study. There are many splendid Italian bronzes, of the type described by Cellini and Vasari which finds its culmination in the great Perseus by the former master. The influence of Donatello and other masters is traceable in the beautiful work of the Florentine School of that period, which includes an exquisitely ornamented bell, decorated in low relief with a band of dancing children, and the fine bronze Sphinxes by Riccio, which are illustrated in the Guide. The collection of medals, numbering some 250, is superb, including, as it does, no less than six specimens of the work of Antonio Pisanello, the first and greatest of Italian artists in this direction. The French and German contemporary work is equally well represented in point of quality, though the specimens are not so numerous. Among the French work the medals of Anne of Brittany, Philibert le Beau, and Margaret of Austria deserve a special mention. The plaquettes are curious and beautiful; they are practically limited to Italy, and display many exquisite touches of grace of fancy, in addition to their wonderful technical finish. There are some delicate wax portraits of the kind familiar to us from Hertford House. More, we have often thought, might be done in the way of collecting wax portraits, which were very popular a hundred and fifty years since: probably the perishable nature of the medium accounts for the paucity of the survivals of such work.

The three cases of Hispano-Moresque ware present a peculiarly fascinating series; its origins are uncertain, we are told, but of its results there can hardly be two opinions. In grace of design and richness and depth of colour, shining through iridescent lustre, it would be hard indeed to surpass. Its glory, alas! was short-lived: by the sixteenth century the inspiration had departed and decadence had supervened. Closely connected with this phase of art is the Italian majolica ware in the adjoining cases, which took its rise, at least as regards Italy, at Faenza, though it was subsequently produced in great numbers and excellence at many other Italian towns. The artistic quality of this ware is quite as high as that of its Hispano-Moresque rivals, and the originality of design is even greater. These were the days of the Renaissance, when Italian art, at least, took all humanity for its subject, and treated it with a freedom and even licence which is sometimes startling, though its apology—if apology be needed—is to be found in the artistic perfection with which it was handled, even in its most daring phases. Other cases in the same room exhibit some splendid specimens of Venetian glass and carved and coloured rock crystal, together with beautifully-damascened steel and metal work of Oriental origin, some dating back as far as the thirteenth century. In this room, too, are the magnificent specimens of Renaissance furniture and woodwork, which must be seen to be appreciated—a very riot of massive design and splendid craftsmanship combined with the most poetic fancy and perfect delicacy of execution. Some noble Italian tapestry completes the collection in this room.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In Room 129 is shown the art of the Near East, including some beautiful Greek and Roman antiquities—Persian pottery of the thirteenth century, Turkish and Syrian ware of somewhat later date, and some excellent bronze work of various sorts. The terra-cotta statuettes of the "Tanagra" type, if not from Tanagra itself, are well chosen and particularly graceful and beautiful—speaking strictly for ourselves, we should covet them as much as anything in Mr. Salting's collection. There are also several beautiful Greek vases and a remarkable bronze bust or two, notably one of the Emperor Commodus as the god Mithras. One is tempted to linger in Room 131 with its wonderful furniture, its fascinating Limoges and Delft enamels, and noble goldsmiths' work by Flemish, French, and Italian craftsmen, produced in the fifteenth century, when the Church was still a power in Europe; its exquisite illuminated MSS. and its well-chosen groups of miniatures. These last, indeed, deserve a far longer notice than we can possibly bestow on them. They include specimens (and very good ones) of the work of Holbein and Hilliard and Oliver, who first practised the art in England, and their great followers, Cooper and Hoskins, together with the great eighteenth-century miniaturists who preceded the slow death of that art in the Victorian era—Cosway, Engleheart, and Plimer. So perfectly representative a collection can never before have been brought together in so small a compass.

The remaining two rooms, Nos. 144 and 145, are given up to a fine collection of Chinese and Japanese exhibits, not less valuable and distinguished than the other collections downstairs, but needing more detailed treatment than can possibly be accorded in a necessarily brief notice. They include pottery and metal work of superb finish, full of that mysterious mastery of difficult and unmanageable material which has marked the immemorial East for ages past. Perhaps the most abiding memory that one carries away from this section, among a bewildering medley of lovely things, is the great porcelain vase with its bright and graceful decoration of cherry-blossom on a lustrous black ground. But this, like everything else that we have named, must be seen to be appreciated. Our advice is, therefore, "Go and see!"

We would call special attention to an exhibition of the exceptionally fine water-colour work of Mr. H. Franks Waring at the Baillie Gallery in Bruton Street. In Mr. Waring's pictures there are all the best qualities—freedom with restraint, and strength with sensitiveness. They are full of weather, and wholly beautiful.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE present account should, by all the rules of the Stock Exchange, be dull. Yet it has been, if not exciting, by no means stagnant. The plain truth is that the bears have once again saved the situation. In Home Rails, the dealers who are ultra-Tory cannot change. They have been bears so long that they can hardly realise the change in public opinion. In Foreigners, the Ehrhard failure frightened them. In Kaffirs and Rhodesians, they have not turned as quickly as the market. Thus we have seen a bull public buying all the time and a House cynical and short. This has kept the position sound.

The Brazilian allotments came out, and were just disappointing enough to cause a steady market. There are many grumblers, but I see no cause of complaint. The small people got as much as they deserved and the big people got as much as they expected. As a result the premium hardly fell at all. Few other issues attracted any attention. No one was drawn to that belated Westralian Mines flotation, which offered a strange selection of prospects in West Australia, and must have been promoted by a Rip Van Winkle who went to sleep in 1896 and only woke up in 1911. Our temper has changed since then. The rubber company that tried to get a mortgage on a million acres of land in the depths of Bahia, and called itself Villa Nova, was a sad spectacle of a good house in a bad position. Fry Miers should have known better. The Central London 4½ per cent. preferreds were a pleasant bonus to the Central London shareholders, but to no one else. The Oil Trust has promoted a reasonably good Grosny Oil property, and I hear of other Grosny Oil shows that will follow suit. A Bolivian Rubber and Rum Company will ask for money, and the Zongo people should profit by the energy of Mr. Gray. The Hambro Canadian Trust went as soon as the lists opened. There is now talk of a Sakalien proposition being put before the public, backed by Princes and Peers.

MONEY has been dearer on technical grounds, but no one need be alarmed, for though the money crowd will fight for dear money as long as they can, they cannot stand against hard facts. Of course the rise in Home Rails will have a tendency to make money dear, for many people will borrow money from their banks and buy Home Rails. But such borrowing cannot seriously affect the market, for it only transfers credit, and creates no real scarcity of either credit or coin.

FOREIGNERS have been as dull as ditch-water. But Paris is gradually recovering, and I am assured that the position is now much sounder. The troubles have more or less passed, and the French are ready for a new gamble. They have been amused by the attempt to catch the bears in Maltzoff—an attempt that will be successful. When I first pointed out the bear-trap that had been laid these shares were 1,300 francs. They are now 2,100 francs, and they say will go to 2,500 francs. But the clever French dealers will not push the game too far or they may lose the lot. The whole of the shares are in Russia, and the Petersburg people will not sell. Peruvians are steady, and I expect a fresh rise in Russians. Russia is also buying Lenas on the ground that if Lena holds two-thirds of Lenskoi they are worth £6. It looks as though the English holders had been fooled into selling their Lenas too cheap.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Home Rails have continued to rise, and all the House declare that the dealers are still short. Duguid tipped the North Stafford in the Observer, and at once the House, which respects Duguid as an honest adviser, began to buy, which was pleasant for North Staffords. Brums and Great Westerns have also been bought with good reason, for both stocks are much too cheap. The bulls in Great Centrals got tired, and we have seen a small reaction; but these stocks will again rise. There is a good chance of Great Easterns being given another turn next account if the holiday traffics are good. I expect that we may get a general set-back in Home Rails, but it will not last long, for the intrinsic merits of the lines are too good for any serious relapse to continue.

Yankees are dull, and must remain dull. I do not attach much importance to the Supreme Court decision about which Wall Street talks all day long. It will not have any practical effect upon trade. But it is a good talking point for the big houses, who do not desire to see any great gamble in rails. They want a steady market in which to place short-dated notes and bonds, and they want to keep their cash liquid in order to hold up their London credits. If they lend money on shares in Wall Street they will be compelled to withdraw their balances from London, and this will stop the negotiations of the short-dated notes. I think Yankees will be a dull market for some time to come.

Rubber.—The public declines to buy Rubbers in spite of the fact that Mincing Lane has put up the price of fine hard-cured Para. The Lane can do no more, and I think this market will gradually fall back to the old prices of a few months ago. When all the leading shares show a clear 12½ or 15 per cent. on the price, then we may get the public to come in again. In the meantime half the rotten swindles are breaking up under their own weight, and not a day passes but one or the other does not come into notoriety in a most disagreeable manner. However, I hope no readers of The Academy have been hurt. If they have taken my advice they are immune.

Oil looks quite cheerful. We have seen really good buying of Shells, and Paris has steadily bought Spies. Lobitos have also recovered, as I expected they would. These, with Burmah and Californias, are the pick of the basket. There is much talk of Premier Pipe Lines, which are under the wing of Hollebone Brothers and Trench. A deal is on.

Kaffirs.—The dealers are very short of shares, and the magnates are now watching the markets with the idea of putting up prices. This may be done. But perhaps we shall have to wait till the reports come to hand. They will be coming in now by each mail, and buyers may take heart of grace, though I confess I see nothing to boast about in the Princess which is a Goertz Company, and one of the first to arrive.

Rhodesians.—Chartereds have been strong in a meagre way. At any rate, they have not been sold. The rest of this market also looks moderately steady, and as all the weak bulls have been shaken out the big Rhodesia houses may decide to make a move. But they are tricky people, and all I can say is that as they now hold all the shares they have a chance they have not had for many months.

Tin.—This market seems almost dead, and the Bastard crowd missed their market. They had a chance when Tin was at £200, but they did not act with boldness, and to-day they are forgotten.

Miscellaneous.—The whole talk in this market is of Cements and Omnibus, both of which seem to me much too high. The markets are so narrow that a very little buying is of great value. Those who run cements are rich, and they can make the price what they like; but they cannot pay dividends, which is what most of us want.

Raymond Radclyffe.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE WHOLESALE MANUFACTURE OF PEERS

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—If I understand rightly the meaning of the Manchester Guardian's leading article of the 22nd ult., there does not exist an exclusive prerogative of the Crown to create peers; but, in fact, this is the constitutional prerogative of the Prime Minister, and that the consent of the Crown to such a wholesale manufacture is only a matter of form. In short, the Prime Minister is for the time being a kind of Protector over England, Scotland, and Ireland.

For the sake of argument I will agree to such a preposterous proposal, but I say categorically that the Parliament, obdurated or not, has no power whatsoever to curtail the privileges of certain peers, and this for the following reasons.

By the Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland the number of peers and their full privileges are expressly stated: there are for the Crown certain limitations to create peers, but it is distinctly laid down, "That the peers shall have all the privileges of the peerage"—this means, of course, in the sense of the time of Union for Scotland in 1707 and for Ireland in 1801, and not in the time of the twentieth century.

The position of the peers for Ireland is to that of the peers for this island; their number and their constitutional rights are expressly stated and recognised.

Should a Conservative Government purpose the reduction of the number, or the curtailment of the power, of the Irish members of the House of Commons on the plea that Ireland is over-represented in Parliament, that the population has decreased from eight to four millions, although a great majority could be found in favour of the proposal, nevertheless such a Bill, even if carried through both Houses, would be not only unconstitutional, but also illegal, because it would impair the Act of Union with Ireland.

What holds good for the members for Ireland in the House of Commons holds also good for the Scottish and Irish peers, and any curtailment of their privileges would impair and nullify the Acts of Union with Scotland and Ireland.

It is true we have had in recent years a precedent for a similar Parliamentary measure in the incorporation of Finland with Russia by the Imperial Duma; but the Prime Minister of Russia is M. Stolypin, to whom the Daily News has given the sinister nickname "the necktie Stolypin," and it looks very much as if Mr. Asquith is jealous of M. Stolypin's laurels.—I am, dear Sir, yours very truly,

J. Gersony.

59, Ronald's Road, N., London, 25th March, 1911.

"THAN WHOM"

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—The discussion of this idiom seems to be drifting into dangerous ground. Latin constructions do not necessarily govern English sentences, nor does "preferable to me" justify "better than me." Yet I sympathise with "W. C. M." and "N. W. H." rather than with the other side. Usage and euphony must be considered as well as logic, and when we find our best authors writing "than whom" it is surely dangerous to pronounce it a solecism. There is something repellent in "than I" or "than who" following a nominative case. Of course, "you love him better than me" means one thing, and "you love him better than I" another; but I think that in the latter case most people would prefer to write "than I do." I should myself be sorry to write any such sentence as "Sidney Smith, than who no wittier cleric ever . . .," &c.; I should prefer to turn the sentence some other way. As "W. C. M." pointed out, some of our best critics have pronounced such a sentence as this last "intolerable;" the authors of "The King's English" advise recasting any such sentence, and add that "perhaps the convenience of than whom is so great that to rule it out amounts to saying that man is made for grammar and not grammar for man." When authorities are thus in doubt, probably the safest course is to avoid using the phrase; it at least saves us from assuming that we are better grammarians than Milton, Dr, Johnson, and Dean Alford.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are so many undeniably faulty locutions that it seems a pity to waste energy in denouncing doubtful ones. Another book by an author already named contains this sentence: "He received notice that a seller—no matter whom—was possessed of . . .," &c. Surely whom is quite wrong there. In a popular novel I read "his whereabouts are known." When did whereabouts become a plural substantive? Has not the author been deceived by its apparently plural ending? It would be easy to quote many instances which transgress elementary rules of style or grammar, and one cannot help wishing that some acquaintance with these formed part of every popular writer's outfit. At least,

"THEM'S MY SENTIMENTS."

OLIVE SCHREINER'S "DREAMS"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I read Mr. Frank Harris's article on the work of Olive Schreiner with interest, but must say that he rather depreciates her book of "Dreams."

There is no doubt that it has less intrinsic value than the "Story of a South African Farm," but to me it has a more direct and human appeal—every "Dream" might serve as a motto for one of us. Personally, I have loved the little parable of the artist who painted his pictures with his own heart's blood, so that they glowed with a wonderful fadeless red, whilst he grew pale and paler and all the people wondered at the marvellous tint until they found him dead with a great wound within his bosom, more than anything else from her pen. It is one of the sweetest allegories ever written in this sad world in which we strive to glean a little gladness from fairy-tales, only to find that even a story with so joyous a title as "The Happy Prince" is full of pathos.

REGINA MIRIAM BLOCH.

8, John Street, Adelphi, W.C.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION.

Where the Shamrock Grows: the Fortunes and Misfortunes of an Irish Family. By George H. Jessop. Murray and Evenden. 3s. 6d.

The Case of Letitia. By Alexandra Watson. Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.

Brazenhead the Great. By Maurice Hewlett. Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.

The Unknown God. By B. L. Putnam Weale. Macmillan and Co. 6s.

Mrs. Noakes, an Ordinary Woman. By C. A. Dawson Scott. Chapman and Hall. 6s.

The Irresistible Husband. By Vincent Brown. Chapman and Hall. 6s.

For a Woman's Honour: a Mystery of Mount Street. By Christopher Wilson. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

The Leaning Spire. By George A. B. Dewar. Alston Rivers. 2s. 6d. net.

The General Plan. By Edmund Candler. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

Brother Copas. By "Q." (Arthur Quiller-Couch). J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. 6s.

The Complications at Collaroi. By Rose Boldrewood. John Ouseley. 6s.

The Governor's Daughter. By Norman Innes. Illustrated. Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.

The Major's Niece. By G. A. Birmingham. Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The Speakers of the House of Commons from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, with a Topographical Description of Westminster at Various Epochs and a Brief Record of the Principal Constitutional Changes during Seven Centuries. By Arthur Irwin Dasent. With Notes on the Illustrations by John Lane and a Portrait of every Speaker where one is known to exist. John Lane. 21s. net.

The Gay King: Charles II., his Court and Times. By Dorothy Senior. Illustrated, Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.

William Ford Stanley, his Life and Work. Edited by Richard Inwards, F.R.A.S. Illustrated. Crosby Lockwood and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Russian Flashlights. By Jaakoff Prelooker. With a Biographical Sketch of the Author translated from the Italian by Helena Frank. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.

Origins and Meanings of Popular Phrases and Names. By Basil Hargrave. T. Werner Laurie. 6s. net.

Man—King of Mind, Body, and Circumstance. By James Allen. Wm. Rider and Son. 1s. net.

Ipsissima Verba: Strictures on Dr. R. R. Madden's "United Irishmen" and Mr. W. J. Fitzpatrick's "Sham Squire," with reference to Notices of Major Sirr; with the Conclusions of Recent Historians. By Harry Sirr, F.R.I.B.A. The Whitwell Press. 2s.

A Study of the Development of Infantry Tactics. By Colonel Beca. Translated by Captain A. F. Custance. With a Preface by Colonel Hacket Pain, C.B. With Plans. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d.

The Locket. A Play in Three Acts by Edgar Lee Masters. The Rooks Press, Chicago. 50 cents.

Eileen. A Play in Three Acts by Edgar Lee Masters. The Rooks Press, Chicago. 50 cents.

Mearing Stones: Leaves from my Note-book on Tramp in Donegal. By Joseph Campbell. Illustrated by the Author. Maunsel and Co., Dublin. 3s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

Musikalische Märchen. By Elise Polko. Edited, with Notes, Vocabulary, &c., by Mrs. M. G. Glazeboook. Macmillan and Co. 2s.

The Training of Village Choirs. By the Rev. W. Kerr Smith, M.A. S.P.C.K. 2d.

A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. (Vol. VIII., Q—Sh.) Scouring—Sedum. By Henry Bradley, Hon. M.A., Ph.D., F.B.A. Henry Frowde. Double section, 5s.

Groundwork of French Composition. By Ernest Weekley, M.A. University Tutorial Press, Ltd. 2s.

VERSE

Medea and Circe, and Other Poems. By Arthur K. Sabin. With an Introduction by Richard G. Moulton, M.A. The Temple-Sheen Press. 4s. net.

Songs and Sonnets. By Webster Ford. The Rooks Press, Chicago.

The King's Temptation, and Other Poems. By James E. Pickering. A. C. Fifield. 1s. net.

THEOLOGY

Sermons on the Coronation. By the Rt. Rev. Bishop Welldon, the Rev. J. H. Pemberton, the Rev. E. Grose Hodge, and the Rev. Douglas Macleane. S.P.C.K. 6d.

Forms of Prayer for Use on the Occasion of the Coronation. Henry Frowde. 3s., 4s., and 5s. per 100.

Form and Order of the Service and Ceremonies to be Observed at the Coronation. Henry Frowde. Paper covers, 1d., 2d., 3d. each. Rubricated, on hand-made paper, bound in buckram, 2s. 6d.

PERIODICALS

Fortnightly Review; English Review; Blackwood's Magazine; Bird Notes and News; Literary Digest; St. Nicholas; Cornhill Magazine; Educational Times; Nineteenth Century and After; Bookseller; Century; British Journal of Photography, Colonial and Foreign Number; School World; Cambridge University Reporter; Empire Review; Ulula; Transactions of the Essex Archæological Society; Mercure de France; The Vineyard; Popular Magazine; Deutsche Rundschau; Boo' Monthly; Revue Bleue: The Young Liberal; Univer Correspondent; The Idler.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria S reet, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Vià the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

* * *

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Now Ready. Price 6d. The April

BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Swing of the Pendulum in the World of Letters.

DICKENS'S LOVE STORY. Full News of the Letters to his Friend, Henry Kolle.—By B. W. Matz.

A LONDON LETTER. On Topics Concerning Current English Books and Authorship.

APRIL ALL SORTS. The Plots and People of Six Recent Stories.

A TWO-FOLD BIOGRAPHY. Charming Mrs. Craigie and Gifted John Oliver Hobbes.

THE BIBLE TERCENTENARY. The Moving Story of the Book of English Books.

THE BOOK NEWSMAN. Current Events and Comments Possessing a Literary Interest.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of March, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some April Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Note the Dickens Article, and do not fail to get the APRIL BOOK MONTHLY, which is published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN. (By Shire Line.)

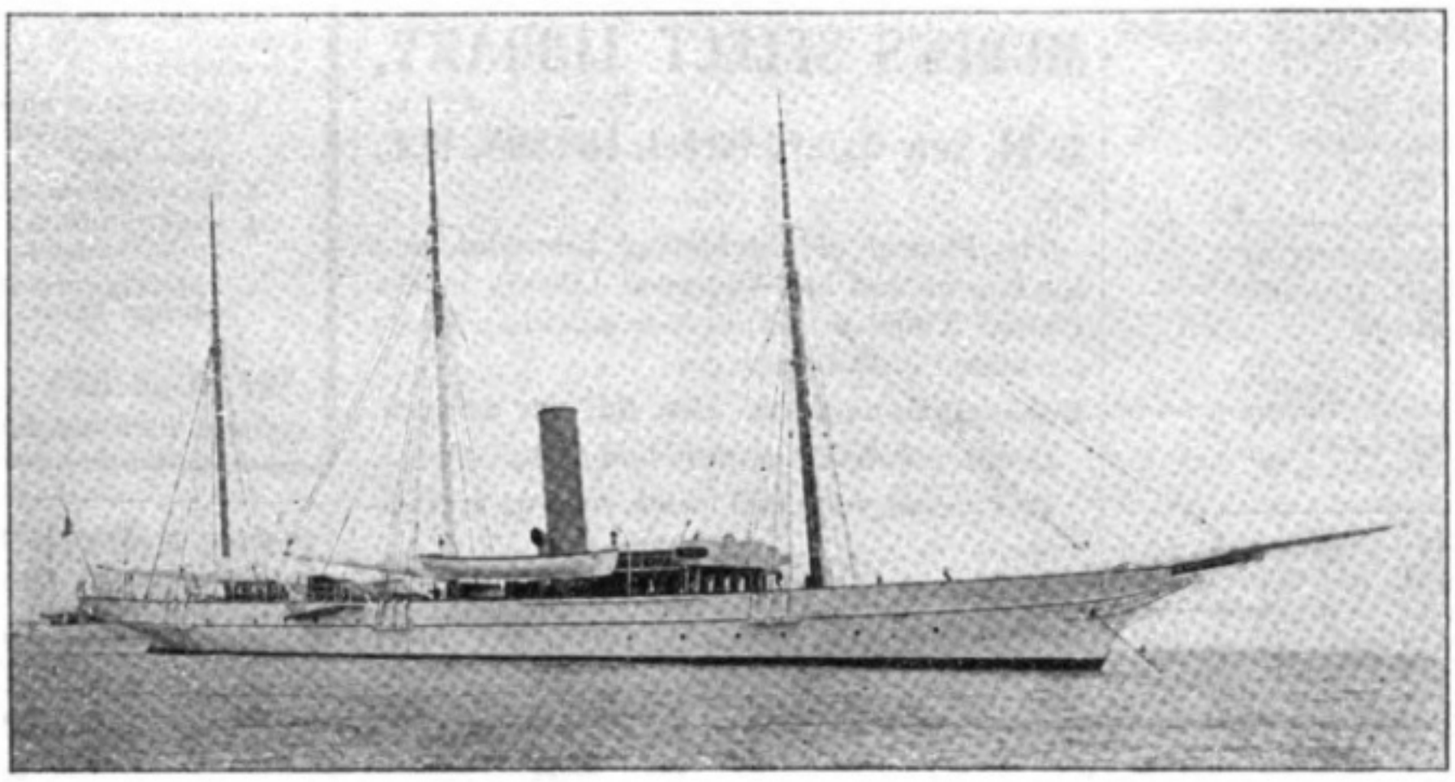
For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by Odhams Ltd., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

No. 2032 [Registered as a Newspaper.] APRIL 15, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL."

Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements.

Yachts economically managed for Owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Highest References.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

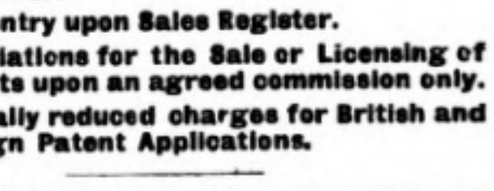
CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.



Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.
COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.
The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

SHEPHERD'S EXHIBITION OF EARLY BRITISH MASTERS
includes works by

Gainsborough	Wilson	Cotman
Raeburn	Crome	Chandler
Lawrence	Constable	Downman, &c.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY,
27, King Street., St. James's, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	443
Love's Enemy	444
The Income-tax Payers' Slumber	444
Cowper and his Poetry—II.	445
Reviews :—
Marriage and Common Sense	446
The Land of the Pharaohs	447
The Reformation Settlement	448
Haines of Inkerman	450
The Yellow Peril	451
Napoleon at St. Helena	452
A Pioneer Chorus-Master	453
A View of Rome	453
Shorter Reviews	454
Fiction	455
The Theatre	457
The Life of Rachel	458
The Speakers of the House of Commons	460
An Oxford Poem by Henry Vaughan—I.	461
Nature's Rest	463
The Poet's Holiday—VI.	464
Travelling Pictures	465
France from Two Points of View	466
The Magazines	467
Foreign Affairs	468
The Royal Water-colour Society	469
Art Needlework	469
In the Temple of Mammon	470
Correspondence	471
Books Received	471

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE influence of the new system of taxation which an illogical and impressionistic Government thought fit to introduce as a basis upon which to build a reputation for philanthropy that will prove, we fear, as short-lived as the Government is short-sighted, is felt to a more far-reaching extent than may at first glance be obvious to the business man, who is often compelled to study politics somewhat hurriedly. Like the ripples caused by a stone cast into a pond, this influence spreads wide and more widely—with the difference that as it spreads it by no means dies away. Many powerful landowners have been forced to a policy of retrenchment and self-defence owing to the vast change that the legislation of recent years has brought about; large estates are being broken up, hundreds of the men for whom they find pleasant employment have been discharged—with the greatest reluctance, be it noted; investments that should have been made in this country and added to the sum of the national prosperity are being made abroad, and the whole confidence and stability of the relationship between employer and employed is gradually being undermined and threatened. In a letter to the Times on Monday last Lord Onslow gave personal experiences which illustrate our point admirably, and although we cannot perhaps quite agree with his closing remarks to the effect that the landowner can now "spend his time and money as an absentee with a clear conscience" and live abroad on his foreign investments, yet there is quite enough in his letter to open the eyes of any thinking man to the evils of super-taxation. It is, for one thing, a direct cause of increased unemployment, since few landowners are so happily situated as to be able to say, with Lord Onslow, that they have every hope of finding work in the same neighbourhood for most of the discharged staff. Increased unemployment means increased discontent, and an increased inclination on the part of the workers to give heed to the Socialistic orators of the Marble Arch and the East-end park type—whose creed of Socialism consists in living on other people's money and brains in leisured idleness. Thus the wheel comes full turn—the Government penalises the landowner, adds to the army of idlers, and then, with meretricious sympathy and vote-catching, showy philanthropy, makes laws to "relieve" those whom its own absurd and dangerous methods helped to create.

The recent debate at the small Queen's Hall between Mr. G. K. Chesterton and Miss Cicely Hamilton on the perennial theme of Women's Suffrage was productive of more epigrams, aphorisms, and innocent amusement than the average man obtains in a month. Mr. Chesterton's burly form shook not a whit—save with subdued chuckles—under the impetuous onslaught of his opponent; and indeed Miss Hamilton gave herself no fair chance of success when she permitted herself such a faux pas as the remark that "Motherhood has become a somewhat degraded thing," and urged her audience not to listen to the popular notion of the beauty of motherhood. Mr. Chesterton quickly perceived that Miss Hamilton viewed the relations of the average man and woman through the distorting-lens of a too-vivid imagination, and did not fail to take advantage of the fact; he emitted characteristic coruscations in a characteristic manner, and refused to acknowledge himself beaten. So, likewise, did his fair antagonist—which is as it should be; for when neither side gives in the essential qualities of a debate—vivacity and interest—are present in no small degree. The chairman, Dr. Cobb, of St. Ethelburga's, remarked truly that neither of his debaters had stuck to the point. We do not know that this matters much, for they provided a most entertaining, if not particularly instructive, evening, for which an audience which packed the hall to its utmost capacity was duly grateful.

On Monday next, at Stratford-upon-Avon, begins the annual series of dramatic performances in commemoration of Shakespeare, under the direction of the indefatigable Mr. F. R. Benson. For three weeks visitors and townsmen will have the opportunity of seeing Shakespeare's most famous comedies and tragedies, and the programme will be judiciously varied by the performance of "The Critic," by Richard Brinsley Sheridan, "Four Chester Mystery Plays," "Seven Irish Plays," "The Piper," and by discourses from Miss Ellen Terry on Shakespeare's heroines. It is a very happy idea to include in such a festival of the dramatic art the unforgettable work of J. M. Synge, the mystical conceptions of W. B. Yeats, and the charming embarrassments of Lady Gregory's "Hyacinth Halvey;" in fact the time is at hand when no such celebration can be considered complete without the aid of the sister island. We presume that since no celebrity-worshipping American has yet been able to carry off Stratford-upon-Avon stone by stone, and rebuild it on the banks of some secluded river in his own country, many visitors from across the ocean will put in an appearance at this national—almost international—festival, and we recommend all who can beg, borrow, or steal the volume of short stories by Mr. Henry James, entitled "The Better Sort," to read therein the little study, "The Birthplace." It will inspire a suitable mood for wandering round the tranquil English town so rich in memories, so full of echoes from the past. If it is not to be found in the library of Stratford-upon-Avon there is a blot upon the escutcheon of those who so admirably uphold the banner of the master's name.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

LOVE'S ENEMY

Sweet, if I praise you,
Count it but a folly;
Nor let amaze you
All the melancholy
Lays you have earned.

Say when I twine you
In a wreath of song,
'Tis a design you
Weary of ere long—
Mine you've still spurned.

Do I beseech you
For one little boon?
Prayers cannot reach you,
Grief of mine would soon
Teach you new mirth.

Love never kissed you
On those proud-curved lips;
Through no sweet mist you
Watch Love's freighted ships—
Wist you their worth?

Calm waters bound you,
Yet his fleets sail by;
Long since he found you
Cold as those that lie
Round your fair shore.

Clear skies above you;
No kind haven nigh;
From your heart drove you
Love's best gifts—and I
Love you no more.

F. H.

THE INCOME-TAX PAYERS' SLUMBER

> Thy free, proud fathers slumber at thy side,
> Live as they lived, or perish as they died.

INDEED they sleep, but they rested after unjust burdens were removed and their special task was done. The modern Income-tax payer resembles the lotus-eater, to whom "Slumber is more sweet than toil." Shade of Hampden! can ye view the servile herd who quiescently—if not contentedly—submit to exactions imposed by a motley Chancellor? Ye who withstood and defeated the exactions of statesmen and Kings!

Ship-money! That is the excuse now put forward to conceal extortion which is not referable to the needs of defence, but to an insane commercial policy and Socialistic experiments financed on the model of Blount, Harley, and Knight of "South Sea" blessed memory.

The fact is—and the sooner it is faced the better—the nation is being run on lines financial which would quickly spell bankruptcy if adopted by any commercial house. We hear of a surplus; it is not, it is true, as large as might have been anticipated, because laxness in the collection of revenue has recently marked the disorganisation of our financial system which prevails. There is, however, a surplus—a nominal surplus—of $5\frac{1}{2}$ millions, as the result of raids on the hen-roosts of the Income-tax payer. Why do we say a "nominal surplus"? We say so advisedly, because it is true. It is part and parcel of the fraudulent presentment of the case for Free Trade. There is in reality not a surplus, but a deficit. Why? Because the Chancellor has raided the hen-roost of the allotted repayment of the National Debt. Will it be believed that the Free Trade Budget shows a deficiency of $4\frac{1}{2}$ millions? We do not suppose it will be believed by those who do not wish to believe it. "If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though One rose from the dead." So Father Abraham; and our enthusiasm in the cause of truth is damped. We know the net result of endeavouring to convince people against their will.

Nevertheless we will engage in the futile operation of setting out a perfectly simple and absolutely irrefutable statement of fact, and in order to shelter ourselves from unkind observations we will quote the published statement of a most eminent public man, Mr. Samuel Storey.

Mr. Storey was formerly a Liberal. He has, however, no sympathy with the predatory instincts of Socialism. The enlightened electors of Sunderland thought Mr. Storey was good enough to place at the head of the poll in January, 1910. But having discharged his Parliamentary duties with extraordinary efficiency, they decided, in their wisdom, that the bottom of the poll would be the right position for him to occupy in December, 1910. Bacon, otherwise Shakespeare, remarked, "Vox populi habet aliquid divinum: nam quomodo aliter tot capita in unum conspirare possint?" This is a conclusive acquittal of the charge of fickleness which might apparently have been suggested against the electors of Sunderland. Those of them who pay Income-tax are then, we may assume, voluntary subscribers to the support of Socialism.

We have digressed somewhat because we wished to make it plain that after his rejection at Sunderland we should not have presumed to have quoted Mr. Storey as an authority on opinion; but may we, we wonder, quote him as an authority on demonstrable fact? We take the plunge.

Thus Mr. Storey:

> The Chancellor was bound, according to an agreed rule of sound national finance and in duty to the future, to pay off twenty millions of debt. He has paid off ten millions. His balance-sheet under the audit of Truth would display the result as follows:—
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | I. Payment of debt deferred..... | £10,000,000 |
> | II. Pretended surplus because of I. ..... | 5,500,000 |
> | III. Deficiency if debt paid as usual ..... | 4,500,000 |

Blessed is Free Trade, and the results thereof. Mr. Storey further remarks, which is also fact, "The Chancellor has raised the Income-tax to war level, and imposed taxes oppressive, sectional and unjust, and because unjust, intolerable to honest men." And later he sums up thus—"Free Trade finance, applying to it the vigorous phrase of Sir Edward Grey, 'is dead and damned.'"

The system is not dead because the Income-tax payer persists in pumping the oxygen of the fruits of his toil and industry into the already decaying body of a rotten system of finance.

CECIL COWPER.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

COWPER AND HIS POETRY*—II.

To most poets whose names shine brightly through the gathering mists of years, as beacon-lights leading us to some little haven where we may rest awhile, distinctive qualifications have been attached, for good or ill, by critics of various degrees. Browning is often condemned hastily as the poet of obscurity; Swinburne is adjudged a pagan; Meredith, with truth, is known as the singer of Earth, and of humanity as Earth's children; Wordsworth is the poet of Nature, Keats the worshipper of Beauty. Cowper has been called the poet of trivialities, but if it is necessary thus to docket and label each name with some real or fancied predominant attribute, we should prefer to characterise him as the poet of placidity—a placidity, however, which was occasionally broken by storms of sad emotion when, as in many of his hymns, the conviction of sin and impending doom overwhelmed his sensitive soul. A casual glance down the titles of his "Poems" certainly gives some justification for the charge of triviality: "The Faithful Bird;" "The Poet, the Oyster, and the Sensitive Plant;" "The Nightingale and Glow-worm;" "On Finding the Heel of a Shoe;" "The Retired Cat;" "On a Mischievous Bull, which the owner of him sold at the author's instance"—these, and others, do not ring with any particularly inspiring sound. But it is not by such work that Cowper lives as a poet; nor does he live only by the Olney hymns. There are passages in his lengthy blank-verse epics of the home which remind us irresistibly of Wordsworth—passages which are liable to be overlooked in that formidable mass of print so discouraging to any but the persevering student. Let us disinter one of these delightful interludes from its mass of verbiage, and note, as we read it, that it occurs in Book I. of "The Task," having for its title the curiously incongruous title "The Sofa:"—

> Nor rural sights alone, but rural sounds,
> Exhilarate the spirit, and restore
> The tone of languid Nature. Mighty winds,
> That sweep the skirt of some far-spreading wood
> Of ancient growth, make music not unlike
> The dash of Ocean on his winding shore,
> And lull the spirit while they fill the mind;
> Unnumber'd branches waving in the blast,
> And all their leaves fast flutt'ring, all at once.
> Nor less composure waits upon the roar
> Of distant floods, or on the softer voice
> Of neighb'ring fountain, or of rills that slip
> Through the cleft rock, and, chiming as they fall
> Upon loose pebbles, lose themselves at length
> In matted grass, that with a livelier green
> Betrays the secret of their silent course. . . .
>
> Ten thousand warblers cheer the day, and one
> The livelong night; nor these alone, whose notes
> Nice-finger'd Art must emulate in vain,
> But cawing rooks, and kites that swim sublime
> In still repeated circles, screaming loud,
> The jay, the pie, and e'en the boding owl,
> That hails the rising moon, have charms for me:
> Sounds inharmonious in themselves and harsh,
> Yet heard in scenes where peace for ever reigns,
> And only there, please highly for their sake.

This is the poet in his sane and sunny mood. "His spirits, when he was in health," said Southey, "were far more buoyant than ordinary men were blest with."

Cowper rarely was inspired to write the thrilling line, the splendid phrase that flows molten from the furnace of the soul into the mould of exquisite language, there fixed and memorable and suggestive for all time; nor by his sheer labour did he forge and fashion many unforgettable stanzas, though there are a few to be noted. That he laboured at his writing, if it were not evident in the careful verse, we could prove from his letter to the Rev. William Unwin, dated November 9th, 1780. "I am glad," he wrote, "when I can find a subject to work upon; a lapidary, I suppose, accounts it a laborious part of his business to rub away the roughness of the stone; but it is my amusement, and if, after all the polishing I can give it, it discovers some little lustre, I think myself well rewarded for my pains." "There is a pleasure in poetic pains," he confessed, "which only poets know," and celebrated—> the shifts and turns,

> Th' expedients and inventions multiform
> To which the mind resorts, in chase of terms.

But if we are rarely thrilled with the divine ecstasy, we are never annoyed by the tortured phrase, the word wrenched from its meaning for the sake of a mock-archaic or meretricious effect, the pathetic distortion of language, with which some minor poets of to-day so often mar their work. No trace of the pedantic ever appears, although we know that Cowper was a successful student of the classics while at Westminster School, and have his translation of the Iliad and the Odyssey as evidence of a more than ordinary scholarship. Cowper's scholarship—such evidence of it as can be gathered from his poems—was not of the description which delights in ornamenting the lines with classical and erudite allusion; it was rather, as Walter Bagehot observed, the "general and delicate impression which the early study of the classics leaves on a nice and susceptible mind;" which is often, we would add, the truest and finest scholarship of all. It is not the kind of learning which puts a man at the top of a list of successful candidates at an examination; but it pervades the intellect, tests the hasty phrase lest it ring falsely, and influences subtly every spoken or written sentence of the maturer life. It is the scholarship of gentle George Herbert, Fellow of Trinity, rector of at tiny Bemerton: never blatant, always subconsciously work, timing, rounding, and harmonising the cadences of song.

No reader with any pretension to a critical taste can deny that Cowper's poetry at times makes tedious reading, even for many consecutive pages; but no man's writings can be considered as separate from his life—least of all those of William Cowper. The "religious conversation till tea-time," which often seems to have filled the afternoons in the garden at Huntingdon, and which was doubtless continued as a digestive recreation at Olney, does not sound very exhilarating fare for a man who was temperamentally morbid, persecuted by illusions both of the eye and ear, convinced that he was eternally lost, and shrinking before an angry God created by his own disordered imagination. The dullness, however, is partly due to the forbidding length and closeness of texture of the longer poems, partly to the occasional old-fashioned manner in which Cowper would enlarge upon a familiar and well-worn theme. One theme which was possibly particularly well-worn—the heel of a shoe picked up at Bath in 1748—will give an example of the grandiloquent style now obsolete, the style which was

---

* Olney Hymns. By William Cowper. Edited by William Willis. (Published for the Cowper Society by Farncombe and Son.)

Cowper and his Connection with the Law. By William Willis, K.C., LL.D. (Printed for Private Circulation.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

the lineal progenitor of the Early Victorian "annuals" and "garlands:"—

> This ponderous heel of perforated hide
> Compact, with pegs indented, many a row,
> Haply (for such its massy form bespeaks)
> The weighty tread of some rude peasant clown
> Upbore: on this supported oft he stretched
> With uncouth strides along the furrowed glebe,
> Flattening the stubborn clod, till cruel Time,
> (What will not cruel Time?) on a wry step,
> Severed the strict cohesion; when, alas!
> He, who could erst with even, equal pace
> Pursue his destin'd way with symmetry
> And some proportion formed, now, on one side,
> Curtailed and maimed, the sport of vagrant boys,
> Cursing his frail supporter, treacherous prop!
> With toilsome steps, and difficult, moves on.

And then the inevitable moral is drawn, and the poem closes, having "severed the strict cohesion" which should exist between poetry and beauty. To employ the majestic pentameter on such a subject seems rather like employing a steam-hammer to crack a nut; but it is extraordinarily careful work for a lad in his eighteenth year. Nearly forty years later, after many tribulations, Cowper was engaged on "The Task," which was published in June, 1785, and we find lines which have passed into our memories:—

> O for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
> Some boundless contiguity of shade,
> Where rumour of oppression and deceit,
> Of unsuccessful or successful war,
> Might never reach me more.

In this poem appears that placidity which seemed to alternate with Cowper's wild and harassing fears during the later years of his life. "England, with all thy faults, I love thee still—my country!" he exclaims; and perhaps the finely patriotic passage which follows that opening vocative inspired Bagehot to say (forgetting half a dozen other names which might be mentioned) that there is no writer "more exclusively English." "The Task," like "The Prelude" and "The Excursion," is one of those poems which most people can quote from, but which most people prefer to "take as read."

It would be interesting, had we space, to draw a few comparisons between the work of George Herbert and the sacred verse of William Cowper. It is certain that Cowper read and pondered over the quaint poems of Herbert, and we can see how, in certain moods, such stanzas as the following would appeal to the lonely-souled dweller in the vale of Olney:—

> Lord, I confesse my sinne is great:
> Great is my sinne. Oh! gently treat
> With thy quick flow'r, thy momentarie bloom;
> Whose life still pressing
> Is one undressing,
> A steadie aiming at a tombe. . . .
> Broken in pieces all asunder,
> Lord, hunt me not,
> A thing forgot,
> Once a poore creature, now a wonder,
> A wonder tortur'd in the space
> Betwixt this world and that of grace. . . .

But we must pass over the fascinating hour which might be spent with the two volumes side by side; pass over, also, the many passages and separate poems which are familiar—those of lighter vein, as "John Gilpin," or those of solemn cadence, as "Toll for the Brave"—and glance, in a final article, at the life and wonderful correspondence of the poet.

W. L. R.

REVIEWS

MARRIAGE AND COMMON SENSE

By Arthur Machen

Marriage and Divorce. By Cecil Chapman, Metropolitan Magistrate. (David Nutt. 2s. net.)

> I have been told on good authority (says Mr. Chapman) that amongst the Jews of Bombay there is absolute freedom of divorce by consent for both sexes, and its effect upon conduct is such that divorce never, in fact, takes place. I am not arguing for such complete liberty in this country, but it cannot be too strongly insisted upon that greater individual freedom invariably creates a greater sense of individual responsibility.

There are two interesting points in this quotation from "Marriage and Divorce"—the former an affair of reasoning, the latter of hard matter of fact. Bombay Jews, says the author, may have a divorce for the asking; and as a result of this indulgence they never want to get divorced. I must say at the outset that I am utterly ignorant as to the manners and customs of the Jews of Bombay; but it is quite evident that the author's reasoning is technically extremely vicious. Granting that these amiable persons may divorce each other; granting, again, that in practice they do not divorce each other—we have no right to conclude that the second proposition is the necessary result of the first. We might be told that the Esquimaux have no law against murder, and that, as a matter of fact, murder is unknown in the Arctic circle but we should not be entitled to say that the mildness of the Esquimaux was the direct result of their lack of the Sixth Commandment. And if we were to go on to argue that if we repealed the laws against murder in England wilful homicide would at once cease to exist, we should evidently be talking very sad nonsense. If these Jews aforesaid can get divorces, and don't get divorces, it is clear that they don't want divorces: perhaps because they are decent people, perhaps because they are indecent people—the question is one of fact and investigation.

Secondly, Mr. Chapman says that individual freedom invariably creates a greater sense of individual responsibility I should like to be told the reasoning process that has led him to this conclusion. The members of a mob, confronted either by no police at all or by a wholly inadequate force of constables, have undoubtedly a great sense of individual freedom; but it is news indeed to hear that mobs are remarkable for their display of the sense of individual responsibility. The inhabitants of the "Wild West" of America a generation ago certainly enjoyed an enormous sense of individual freedom—they were "west of the law," as somebody remarks of the Galway people in a Lever novel. But the cowboy of those vanished days was a notoriously irresponsible fellow, if the habit of discharging revolvers at random may be held to indicate a lack of the sense of responsibility. Going back in history, the French revolutionaries simply revelled in the sense of individual freedom, and guillotined each other's heads off—a practice which is surely highly irresponsible. And applying the author's general maxim to his especial subject-matter, it is a notorious fact that the marriage laws—or concubinage laws, rather—of the United States of America have utterly failed to produce that sense of responsibility which Mr. Chapman thinks desirable. They have produced the existence of a place called Reno, where male and female citizens who are tired of their companions go and stay for a while, and get easy and automatic release. The place was denounced the other day by a prominent American as a disgrace and a scandal to the whole country. And lest any one with anti-American prejudices should say that this most deplorable and disgusting state of things is due to some defect inherent in the American nature, I must give the instance of the Awemba (or Wawemba), an African tribe of savages. With this simple and uncivilised race divorce is so free that not even the Jewry of Bombay has greater liberty. But individual freedom does not seem to have produced the desirable responsibility. An official whose task it is to help to govern the Wawemba tribe told me a few weeks ago that it is possible for a lady to have half-a-dozen "husbands" in the course of eighteen months. Indeed, so free from responsibility are the Wawemban ethics that all succession is through the female line, paternity being a matter of mere conjecture and surmise.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

So much for a specific piece of reasoning and a specific statement of fact in Mr. Chapman's book. As for the main thesis that divorce should be made much easier and much more accessible than it is now, there are one or two points that seem at least doubtful. The author says, for instance, that difficulty in gaining divorce encourages immorality, and one would like to know what he means by immorality. If he is speaking as a Christian, then the remarriage of a divorced person is against the Christian law, and is, therefore, profoundly immoral, since immorality is nothing more or less than an offence against the rule of religion. So the result of Mr. Chapman's licence would be to substitute for the immorality of adultery the immorality of adultery plus the immorality of profaning a sacrament of the Church by a bigamous remarriage. One hardly sees reason in disturbing the law of the Church for so small a gain as this.

If, on the other hand, the Christian Church be dismissed from the case, and it is merely a matter of Mr. Chapman saying: "What I like is moral" and "What I disapprove of is immoral"—well, it is extremely interesting and pleasant to hear Mr. Chapman's views on the matter, but one would like to know who has made him a defining authority on the subject of morals. As he must be aware, if we once set the Christian ethic on one side morals become a mere matter of taste and climate and period; that Wawemba tribe, for example, has a method of ridding itself of mothers-in-law which strikes the good black fellows as innocent, useful, and indeed humorous, whereas an Englishman who employed this interesting little device would be branded with the harsh term of murderer. Mr. Chapman, speaking with an authority the sources of which are to me at least obscure, says it is not immoral to divorce one's wife and marry another woman, while it is (apparently) immoral for a married man to have a mistress. And I really cannot see that Mr. Chapman's opinion matters in the least. He talks freely of "immorality" as if he knew what it meant; but he might remember that many nations and tribes at least as respectable as the Bombay Jews have sanctioned the second wife and even the third and fourth wives. Who is Mr. Chapman to dismiss Islam and China and Japan as nests of immorality? One may strain the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Magistrate a little too far.

The fact is, of course, that the author of "Marriage and Divorce" thinks that he has made out a strong, an irresistible, case for the "reform" (as he would call it) of the marriage laws of the Church because he proves without any difficulty that these laws are attended in many cases by great hardships. But he should have remembered, as a lawyer, that hard cases make bad law. You can take any law on the statute-book and show that in certain cases its enforcement must be attended by well-nigh intolerable hardships; but it has always been held that this fact is no argument for the repeal of the law in question, though it may afford good reason for treating this or that offender with a wise leniency.

And secondly, Mr. Chapman forgets, it would seem, that the Catholic religion bristles with intolerable hardships, as we call them. It calls upon men in express terms to do violence to their fondest desires; to return good for evil, for example, and to love their enemies; to pluck out their eyes and to cut off their hands. So the marriage law of the Church, in so far as it makes for hard cases, is perfectly congruous with the rest of the Church's discipline. We readily allow, of course, that not only in the matter of marriage, but in many other matters, nay, in all matters, we fall very far short of the ideal placed before us. We confess that we must not steal from our brother, or defraud him, or go beyond him in any way—and some of us are burglars and some of us are company-promoters, and some of us know how to frame a prospectus so as to rob our brother with security and despatch. Still, in spite of all these divagations, we have not yet had the gross indecency to demand the erasure of the Eighth Commandment and the laws against theft and swindling on the ground that these regulations are "counsels of perfection." We are vile sinners, and we know that we are vile sinners; but we have not yet fallen to that dark depth which denies the existence of sin.

Generalising more widely still, one may say that Mr. Chapman's thesis is founded on the belief that if people are allowed to do exactly as they please—like those Bombay Jews—they will be perfectly happy. Every child is of this opinion, and so it sucks boiling water from the kettle-spout and digs its fingers cheerfully into the depths of the burning flames. Still it is not perfectly happy; and still—if it survive—it will repeat the physical process in the ethical field; continually assuaging its thirst in the waters of Phlegethon, continually toying with the fires of Gehenna, continually surprised to find that, after all these efforts, it is not perfectly happy.

THE LAND OF THE PHARAOHS

Egypt. By PIERRE LOTI. Illustrated. (Werner Laurie. 15s. net.)

In the Land of the Pharaohs. By DUSE MOHAMED. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

EGYPT is the land of perennial and varied interest. If we remember rightly, exponents of prophecy have chosen it as the seat and pivot of portentous happenings on this terrestial globe. Certainly they have excellent cause to do so; and they cannot be blamed if their attention gravitates thitherward as the needle to the pole. Back beyond the beginnings of Babylon, even before the warlike splendour of Assyria stirred to glory, Egypt had not only a finished organisation and jurisprudence, but a considerable conception of Art. Its traffic with the occult in those far days has given it a psychic atmosphere, and this in itself is sufficient to set the Land of the Pharaohs in the forefront of attention, for the mind is ever ceaselessly occupied with mysteries.

Not only, however, back in remote times is the interest of Egypt centred. It is not less the centre of interest for modern statesmen occupied with modern problems than it is the centre of interest for the archæologist occupied with the beginnings of history. There is no other example of a country whose interest has been so continuous and so sustained. And not only so, but it seems no less to have played a crucial part at the very crisis of every empire from the earliest days to this very moment. It was Egypt that set the boundary to the conquests of Assyria, finally bringing decay into that power. Indeed, the Tel-el-Amarna Tablets seem actually to suggest that Egypt even more actively promoted the causes of the final fall of that power. It was in Egypt that Alexander set up the memorial of his conquests, and it was there that he chose the chief city of his empire. It was with Egypt the fight was fought that shattered the decaying Roman Republic and set up the Roman Empire. It was to Egypt Napoleon went after his furious conquests in Italy, and it was from Egypt he returned to snatch the chief power in the new French Republic. It was in Egypt that the first blow was given to his omnipotence by Nelson. It was when her hold loosened on Egypt that France fell away from her place of power among the nations. It was Egypt that gave England the key to the East. It is Egypt that is the key to the East now. And it will perhaps be Egypt, one way or another, that shall decide what is to be the future of the British Empire.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Plainly then, Egypt is a matter of more than ordinary interest; and, since this is so, the more varied the lights in which we can see her the better it will be for our intelligent appreciation of the problems she raises. It is only a fearful man who hesitates to hear all the voices, or who cannot give an opponent attention. Not so very long since, in Lord Cromer's monumental work, we had the English point of view. Since then, in Mr. Roosevelt's speech, we have had what one might call, despite possible protests from the other side of the water, the American point of view. In the two books before us we have yet two more points of view wholly at variance with these. M. Loti is a Frenchman, and a member of the French Academy. On the other hand, Mr. Duse Mohamed is a native Egyptian in full sympathy with the aspirations of his countrymen, with full knowledge of their aim, and thoroughly acquainted with England and the people of England, having been resident here for some twenty-seven years.

It is little that these two have in common, save a hatred of England, if that word does not rather demean their mutual attitude. To M. Loti Egypt is "a place of dream-like aspect, fraught with mystery. . . . A world in which everything is suffused with rosy colour beneath the stars of midnight, and where granite symbols rise up, ghostlike and motionless." His attitude to the country is poetic, in the lesser and lower meaning of that word. He sees it as the land of mystery and antiquity. He is therefore roused to bitter anger at the sight in it of "that special type of humanity which patronises Thomas Cook and Son (Egypt Ltd.)." He goes to the Temple of Abydos, glorying in its smooth, ancient silences, and strikes on a party of tourists having a noisy luncheon in a litter of greasy paper, at which his anger knows no bounds, and seeks its revenge by impugning the beauties of the daughters of Albion. He has nothing but anger for the Nile works, and he imagines that ancient river of mystery made eternally hideous in a near day by factory-chimneys belching vile smoke. He wins sympathy in all this, for his descriptions—even though they appear in a translation that sometimes does but scant justice to the music and colour of his French—show him to be a lover indeed of the country, or, rather, not so much the country that is as the country that was.

To Mr. Duse Mohamed, however, Egypt is not a country of antiquity, but a country of a thriving modernity. He does not see it as a country of lapsed glory, but a country of achievement and promise. His glance, in other words, is not backward, but forward. The sub-title of his book is "A Short History of Egypt from the Fall of Ismail to the Assassination of Boutros Pasha," and consequently there is no hint in it of earlier splendour. We do not mean merely that he gives no history earlier than the fall of "Ismail the Magnificent." It would, of course, obviously be impossible to do so—and improper, too, since a book must be its own entity. It is a deeper question than this, for he is so occupied with the completely modern spirit (with which M. Loti is so wrath), that he seems totally impervious to the glamour of the country, even as a stockbroker in the whirl of a changing market is totally unaware of the extraordinary revelry of colour the clouds over his head are having in the last rays of the setting sun.

Nor is this an unimportant matter. It is just this lack of colour in the modern Egyptian Nationalist Movement that is perplexing. We may not agree with the movement; but we do say that if those who take a considerable part in it showed themselves possessed with a completer sense of all that their country has been, if they used the word Egypt more as a word to conjure with, they would perhaps strike more conviction on their protestations. This is just where M. Loti's volume throws such cross-lights over this book penned by an Egyptian hand. M. Loti sees the colour of the country, and nothing else. Mr. Duse Mohamed sees everything but the colour of the country.

In the earlier portion of his work Mr. Duse Mohamed treads over familiar ground, and, although there are passages enough where we cannot follow him, it is not that portion of his book in which he comes to issue with his subject. It is when he refers to Fashoda that he becomes not the historian, but the Nationalist protagonist. Sir Reginald Wingate calls the Fashoda incident "a nightmare which is better forgotten," and Lord Cromer, in his history, dismisses the subject with a footnote, declaring that the reason he gives it prominence is that then for the first time Egyptians realised that England did not propose to evacuate Egypt, and that it was impossible for her to do so seeing that she had possession of the upper reaches of the Nile. Surely this displayed a considerable shortsightedness on their part. England's inability to evacuate was manifest long before then. And in his strictures on Lord Cromer it would be well for Mr. Duse Mohamed to remember that the rôle of critic is an easy one. It is noticeable that he refrains from comment on the assassination of Boutros Pasha.

We would not be so churlish as to neglect Mr. Mohamed's work simply because we do not agree with him. Moreover, in much of his book, due perhaps to his life in England, he is far more open-minded in his dealings with fact than many of his co-workers. But we would advise him, with all possible courtesy, to two courses. One is not to vilify his opponents when there is no need to do so, and the other is to pay heed to that spirit in which M. Loti approaches his subject, and to let his patriotism move more in the light of the history of the wonderful country which knows him for citizen. The concluding paragraphs of his book are conceived in a mood that is just and weighty. They ring with conviction.

THE REFORMATION SETTLEMENT

[First Notice]

Visitation Articles and Injunctions of the Period of the Reformation. Alcuin Club Collections. Vols. XIV., XV., XVI. Edited by Walter Howard Frere, D.D. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 1910. £4.)

Students of the Reformation Settlement owe a debt of gratitude, primarily to the Alcuin Club, and then to Dr. Frere and his fellow-workers, for these fine volumes, full of most important and interesting matter, which give original sources in which "the religious changes of the sixteenth century in England may be followed year by year, or even at times month by month, with an amount of detail which is enough to be illuminating, and not enough to be burdensome."

Froude, whose ignorance of ecclesiology was colossal, had the hardihood to say in his history, in a notorious passage, that "the Church of England was a limb lopped off from the Catholic trunk; it was cut away from the stream by which its vascular system had been fed," adding that the Anglican Episcopate was an illusion dependent on the Throne of Elizabeth, "a thing merely of this world—a convenient political arrangement." History as a science has advanced considerably since Froude's partisan day, and though Roman controversialists, notably Dom Birt in his "Elizabethan Religious Settlement," have made the most of Froude's unhistorical statements, research into contemporary records, like those now before us, shows clearly enough that neither Henry VIII., nor Elizabeth, nor even the prig-child reformer Edward VI., had the slightest intention of trying to found a brand new Church. The continuity of the Ecclesia Anglicana of the Customs of William I. and of Magna Charta is shown more plainly every day by the unbiassed production of original documents. However drastically reformed, the Church of England in her doctrines, rites, and ceremonies still remains, despite the influence of the German and Continental reformers, a branch of the Catholic Church. Much may be learned from these Visitations and Injunctions to this effect. In the first place, we naturally ask what was the object of the Royal Visitations of Henry VIII., who put aside for the time the ancient custom of episcopal Visitations, except by special commission? Even the German Protestant historian Haüsser admits that "Henry VIII. hated the Reformers and the Reformation with a passionate hatred." He believed in Papal authority, till it collided with his own in the matter of the annulment of his marriage with Katherine of Aragon. So his object was to overthrow the Papal and to establish a Royal supremacy. In his very able introduction, which occupies about one-half of the first of these volumes, Dr. Frere shows how Henry suspended by inhibition the jurisdiction of the Ordinary so that the Royal visitors should have the whole jurisdiction in their hands: an intervention never before attempted by the Crown. From the "Documents" edited by Hardy and Gee (quoted) it appears that Henry, having assumed the style and title of Supreme Head of the Church of England, forthwith appointed Thomas Cromwell his Vicar-General, and Cromwell in 1536 issued in the King's name the First Royal Injunctions of Henry VIII. Now the real importance of these Injunctions lies in the first article, which commands the clergy to observe, and cause to be observed, all the laws and statutes made "for the abolishing and extirpation of the Bishop of Rome's pretended and usurped power and jurisdiction within this realm, and for the establishment and confirmation of the King's authority and jurisdiction within the same, as of the supreme Head of the Church of England." The Eleventh Item of the Second Royal Injunctions (1538) enjoins the presenting to the King's Highness of "any favourer of the Bishop of Rome's pretended power, now by the laws of this realm justly rejected and extirpated." It is true that these Injunctions contain certain minor reforms, but there is no suggestion of any attempt to break the ecclesiastical continuity of the Church of England as part of the Catholic Church. Nothing was further from Henry's mind. And to speak of Henry VIII. as the founder of the Church of England is simply a controversial device and a grave historical blunder.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

But the claim for a Royal Supremacy was in itself nothing new. As Dr. Frere points out, "Justinian had claimed no less, and his intervention in the affairs of the Church had been minute and widespread. Charlemagne had carried through reforms relying on the like claim," and very similar to his was Henry's method of procedure. After these Royal Visitations the episcopal inhibitions were relaxed in some cases, while in others a commission for visitation was issued to certain Bishops. The second volume of this collection gives no less than fifty-nine sets of Injunctions and Articles for various dioceses and cathedrals, also for the University of Cambridge and for certain colleges at Oxford, during the reigns of Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary.

One of the most important facts to be learned from these Injunctions is that, although sufficiently drastic reforms in flagrant abuses were regularly and consistently enforced, there existed throughout a clear intention that there should be "no departure from the Catholic Faith."

The nature and purport of the Visitations may be determined from some examples.

First, Royal Injunctions (1536), Item 4: "They shall not set forth or extol any images, relics, or miracles for any superstition or lucre, nor allure the people by any enticements to the pilgrimage of any saint."

Item 5: Children and servants to be taught, "even from their infancy, their Pater Noster, the Articles of our Faith (i.e., the Creed) and the Ten Commandments in their mother tongue." This, however, was an ancient provision dating back so far as the Council of Cloveshoe, A.D. 747, and the order of Archbishop Peckham in 1281.

Item 7: Every parson . . . to provide a book of the whole Bible, both in Latin and also in English, and lay the same in the choir, for every man that will to look and read thereon."

Item 10: "Every parson having yearly an hundred pounds shall give competent exhibition for one scholar . . . in the University of Oxford or Cambridge, or some grammar-school."

A curious tariff regulating the preaching of sermons is revealed in Archbishop Lee's Injunctions for York Diocese. Item 12: Every curate resident and able shall make four solemn sermons in the year, one every quarter: not resident having £5, one solemn sermon; having £10, two; having £15, three; and so on. Multiplying these sums by ten for the altered value of money, the clergy in this present day of much preaching would be wealthy indeed if paid on a like scale; or the plethora of sermons would be satisfactorily reduced. Item 15: The people "may in no wise yield worship to any images, lowtinge or bowing down or kneeling, nor offering them money or wax, or unlight, or any other thing. . . . Nevertheless, they may still use lights in the rood-loft and afore the Sacrament."

Bishop Shaxton, of Salisbury, makes short work of the "intolerable superstition" of so-called "holy relics"—viz., "stinking boots, mucky combs, ragged rochets, rotten girdles, pyld purses, great bullocks' horns, locks of hair, and filthy rags, gobbetts of wood, under the name of parcels of the holy cross, and such pelfry beyond estimation. . . . Therefore in remedy thereof . . . I command you and every of you that you send all such your relics (as they be called) one and other unto me at mine house at Ramsbury or other-where. . . ." But there is no account of the good Bishop's disposal of all this quaint and unsavoury pelfry.

Bishop Bonner enjoins the clergy of London that "Priests shall not rehearse no sermons made by other men within these two or three hundred years," and that "no preacher shall rage or rail in his sermon, but coldly, discreetly, and charitably declare and set forth the excellency of virtue." Bishop Voysey, of Exeter, endeavoured to put down the Celtic custom of death wakes. Item 11: "That every curate within my diocese, and especially within the Archdeaconry of Cornwall, exhort effectuously their parishioners, that at the death of their friends they have no solemn night watches or drinkings, whereof ensueth many offences, slanders, &c."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

HAINES OF INKERMAN

The Life of Field-Marshal Sir Frederick Paul Haines. By Robert S. Rait. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

It is not unusual, but natural, for a biographer to see a hero in the protagonist of his story, but when Mr. Rait applies the term in passing, without explanation, to Sir Frederick Haines, he must not expect general concurrence. Haines, throughout his career, whether in action or on the staff, as a subordinate or in command, showed himself to be a very capable officer: he attained a great age—very nearly ninety—and was a Field-Marshal: but he would have been the last to regard himself as a hero. Mr. Rait is evidently fond of the word. "Heroes," he says, "is too weak a word for the battle of Inkerman," and in his preface, "There were many heroes at Inkerman."

At the age of twenty Haines went to India to join his regiment. His eldest brother had married Sir Hugh (afterwards Lord) Gough's third daughter. This family connection proved an important factor in Haines's life. Gough became Commander-in-Chief in India, 1843-9. In November, 1844, Haines was appointed Gough's A.D.C., and served as his Military Secretary through part of the first Sikh War, the Sutlej campaign of 1845-6, and the whole of the second Sikh War, 1848-9. The late Sir Patrick Grant, Adjutant-General in India, 1846-51, had also married a daughter of Gough. When Grant became Commander-in-Chief at Madras in 1856 Haines accompanied him as Military Secretary; also to Calcutta during the two months, June to August, 1857, when Grant officiated as Chief in India before Colin Campbell arrived. Family interest doubtless helped Haines to positions in which he was thrown with distinguished men; he saw behind the scenes, and was concerned in a variety of important military affairs. But he would not have risen as he did unless he had utilised his opportunities and exhibited a fitness for higher employment. In due course he succeeded to the command of the Mysore Division 1865-70; he became Quartermaster General in England in 1870-71, held the chief command in Madras 1871-5, and the chief command in India 1876-81. Thus, although belonging to the English Army, he served nearly thirty years in India, with intervals of regimental duty, staff employ, and commands in the United Kingdom and in the Crimea which need not be particularised.

It was the Crimean war that gave Haines the chance of distinction and of showing his real grit. He landed in the Crimea a regimental Captain in the 21st Royal Scots Fusiliers, but a Brevet Lieut.-Colonel. He was engaged in the battle of the Alma, and describes the action; but "Inkerman," on the 5th November, 1854, was "the day of our hero's life," says Mr. Rait. General Pennefather some years later acknowledged that the wing of the 21st, posted at the stone "Barrier" across the road, held its ground most toughly, though constantly attacked and pressed by heavy odds; and that Haines, succeeding to the command, conducted himself admirably—"never a man more efficient, more cheery, more cool, and more with his wits about him;" he "knew no man whom he would sooner have under him on active service as a brigadier." It was near nightfall when Haines was permitted to withdraw his Fusiliers from the "Barrier," having held for six hours the post where the Russians fought persistently, remorselessly. He received full credit for his defence of the "Barrier," but not for the aggressive movement, undertaken, when feasible, on his own responsibility on the Shell Hill held by the Russians, from which they were driven. The credit for this particular movement was given to another officer, but Haines recorded the true facts in a memorandum quoted in this volume.

Haines saw no fighting in the Mutiny: Madras was quiet. From Sir Patrick Grant he was gaining much experience; so early as February, 1857, Grant remonstrated against the use of the greased cartridges as opposed to the religious prejudices of both Hindus and Muhammadans. He foresaw danger in certain changes which had been introduced, and which were likely to give only too good a handle for arousing among the sensitive Sepoys suspicions of the intentions of the East India Company. When the Mutiny occurred he advocated an immediate move upon Delhi. Haines's diary of June 23rd records how an old native officer told his English commander at Fyzabad: "This (Mutiny) has been long planned. We have long since determined on taking the country and re-establishing the old Muhammadan dynasty," the native officer adding, "the Hindus were formerly against the Muhammadans; they are now united against the English." Sir Colin Campbell had one day at Balaclava reproved Haines for taking excessive precautions, and remarked to a companion, "that d—d fellow was with the chief (Gough) at Chillianwallah." In Calcutta "Sir Colin was immensely civil to me," wrote Haines; "I am his 'dear friend' here. At Balaclava I was that d—d fellow."

The difficult time of Haines's career was while he was Commander-in-Chief in Lord Lytton's Viceroyalty. Lytton was constitutionally obliged to consult Haines on military affairs, but really relied on his Military Private Secretary Colley for military advice. Colley, a brilliant theoretical Staff College Professor, differed in toto on all military questions from the views, alleged to be antiquated, held by Haines, which were based on personal experience and the responsibility of his position. The Afghan war of 1878-80 brought out their differences. The Viceroy, by his superior position, supported by Colley's knowledge and military capacity, could overrule Haines. Mr. Rait takes the latter's side. Nothing could remove the responsibility of the chief except the assumption of higher responsibility by the Viceroy. The tension was notorious at Simla during the war. Haines might have resigned, but that would have done no good. Colley, a strong believer in the breechloader, thought "quite seriously that a British regiment, one thousand strong, armed with Martini-Henry rifles, ought to be able to march at will through the length and breadth of Afghanistan, when once clear of the Khyber and Kuram Passes." Haines's policy was to avoid all dashing expeditions and to make sure by overwhelming strength. Thus he was opposed to the wonderful idea of rushing through Afghanistan to attack the Russians in Central Asia, and to Cavagnari's project of a surprise attack on Ali Musjid. The Kuram Valley was Colley's avowed hobby. Haines thought it useless for military purposes. While he thoroughly sympathised with the aims of Lytton's "Forward Policy," he constantly disapproved of its methods. He desired to find an opportunity of establishing a British garrison at Herat. He wished to take command at Kabul, but was detained by Lytton at headquarters; his scheme of commanding from Peshawar led to strained relations and had to be abandoned.

Lord Lytton's complaint of the powers of military darkness against which he had not unsuccessfully struggled for four years must have referred to Haines. Their differences of opinion subsisted throughout the war. But it was Haines who first anticipated disaster from Ayub Khan, the victor of Maiwand, and who first suggested the despatch of the force which Roberts led from Kabul to Kandahar. In other respects his foresight is now published. Early in 1849 he wrote: "The Panjab will become the granary of Britain; you may eat bread of Goojrat flour." In 1881, while opposing the Indian Army Commission all he could, he proposed the abolition of the military Member of Council, which Kitchener succeeded, against Lord Curzon, in effecting in 1905. In 1882 he wrote of Germany "using every effort to develop her naval resources. Give her time and she will be a naval factor in the solution of the Eastern question of enormous power. . . . She has that organising power which enables her to provide enormous and efficient naval as well as military resources at comparatively small cost to the country." On military subjects he had his own views, against the Staff Corps, for instance; like others, he advocated the retention of Kandahar; he was intensely loyal to his former chiefs, Gough and Grant, differing from Dalhousie's estimate of Gough's merits; he generously showed no jealousy of younger men and exercised great self-restraint; he refused a baronetcy. Mr. Rait records Lord Granville's remark that during the war Haines's arrangements never failed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Rait's well-written book will enhance Haines's reputation as a military administrator, a brave officer, and a far-sighted observer, as a man of culture and taste. It contains, too, some fresh information. His slips in Indian words should not have occurred. He writes Mesh, Devra-i-noor, Karsauli, Burkhak, Synd, for Misl, Darya-i-noor, Kasauli, Butkhak, Syud; and surely, on page 261, Ayub should have been Yakoob. Aliquando dormitat Homerus: but why cannot writers using Indian names be more careful?

THE YELLOW PERIL

The Conflict of Colour. Being a Detailed Examination of Racial Problems throughout the World, with Special Reference to the English-speaking Peoples. By B. L. Putnam Weale. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.)

One of the most recent additions to the literature of the philosophy of history is the above-mentioned book, in which the mutual relationship between the white and the coloured races of the world is discussed, and the possibilities of the future are foreshadowed not altogether to the satisfaction of the average European citizen, whose self-sufficiency will probably receive a severe shock therefrom. Mr. Putnam Weale has many qualifications for his task which some predecessors in the same field have lacked. He is not the armchair theorist who writes and essays to direct human thought without having obtained any practical acquaintance with his subject. He knows the coloured races—or, rather, one section of them—well. In the Far East he is at home, and his earlier books show him to be an authority on the subject of its politics and its peoples. In spite of all this, however, intelligent readers of the present volume will feel some hesitation in accepting all Mr. Weale's conclusions without qualification. They will feel somewhat of a shock, for instance, when they find such an inaccuracy as the omission of the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony from the tale of Britain's African possessions. The annexation of these two States, although recent, occurred sufficiently long ago to render the satisfactory explanation of such an omission impossible. It will also be felt that his deductions from history sometimes appear faulty, and doubt will occasionally arise when his generalisations are considered. Despite these defects, however, the book is one which undoubtedly justifies itself, and those who study it will find therein much that will cause them to think deeply.

Mr. Weale is frankly a pessimist. On almost his first page he states his position in the following passage:—"To the white races in the lands of the coloured peoples, the twentieth century, unlike all its predecessors, can only prove a century of retroaction and redemise; and it is from this point of view that the whole vast question of the conflict of colour will be considered." East is East and West is West, and in the future the dividing line between them will be even more definite than in the past. Yet, if the coloured races wrench themselves free from the domination of the white, there will be a certain poetic justice in their liberation. From out of Europe were derived Europe's religion, her philosophy and much of her arts. It was the exploits of Europe out of Europe by which the last fetters of the Middle Ages were struck off. Thus Europe is, and always will remain, deeply in the debt of the remainder of the Old World. But now that the era of the nineteenth and the previous centuries is closing, a new era is at hand. "The old conditions have disappeared. Europe and Asia—and later, Europe and Africa—must inevitably return to something similar to the relationship once existing between West and East. The equality between the two which once existed will surely be re-established—the relationship which has now definitely existed for more than four centuries, and which owes its origin to the white man's sudden conquest of the ocean, while his abandonment of land routes must give place to something which, though it sounds very novel, is really a revival of something very old. By his conquest of the sea the white man gathered wealth from far and wide, and shook off his provincialism. Knowledge naturally followed; with knowledge came power; and this power led to his world-dominion. Marvellous indeed is it thus to follow out the long yet eminently simple chain of antecedents which brings us to the present day." In this passage is summed up Mr. Weale's philosophy.

It must not be thought, however, that Mr. Weale foresees the possibility, much less the probability, of the subjugation of Europe or of North America by the black or yellow races. To him such a dénouement is unthinkable. Within certain limits, he holds, the boundaries of all the races are now fixed. There will, of course, be readjustments of frontiers, but these will be relatively trifling. In the future, he states unhesitatingly and unequivocably, there will be no more migrations en masse as in the past. "To this rule there are no exceptions." Is he not, however, somewhat too positive in this prophecy? The most far-seeing of us can after all see but a few years ahead. There is no present prospect of an invasion of Europe, but yet it is not altogether inconceivable that the Chinese should one day arise and march westwards, and if they did they would penetrate far into Europe before the movement would be checked. In another direction some onlookers already see an Asiatic immigration. The Japanese islands are already full of inhabitants, and there is an overflow on to the Asiatic continent as well as to the neighbouring islands. What may prove to be the beginnings of a Japanese invasion have already been felt on the other side of the Pacific, and there are those who fear for the future of Australia at the hands of immigrants of the same race. And it must be remembered that when a nation moves no conceivable anti-alien legislation can stop its march. Mr. Weale considers the principal defence against this possibility is the increase of population in all countries. The world is so rapidly filling that there will soon be no room for any considerable movement. For instance, it will still be very many years before the lands of Russia are over-populated, while the population of America and Australia will remain sparse for a still longer period.

It will be seen that Mr. Weale says that, generally speaking, the boundaries of the races are now settled. There are, however, still some debatable regions, and these he foresees will fall, probably without an exception, to the coloured races. America south of the United States, with the exception of the Argentine, Chili, and the coast districts of Brazil, cannot finally remain dominated by the whites. Africa must ultimately become black, with the possible exceptions of Algeria and the extreme south of the continent. Even Northern Queensland may be recovered by the Polynesians, and the Pacific provinces of Siberia are already in danger from the yellow man. The tide has turned. The future will see no more conquests from black, brown, or yellow. They, on the other hand, are more likely to recover some of their lost ground.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Anglo-Japanese Alliance Mr. Weale considers the greatest mistake in recent international politics. It is an unnatural alliance, the mating of white and yellow, and, like all other unnatural alliances, it can result only in misfortune. For the first time in history since Europe came into existence, a coloured race has been accepted by a white one as an equal. The consequences of this terrible mistake will be widespread. They will be found far beyond the boundaries of the island kingdom. The Anglo-Japanese Alliance will react throughout Asia, and its offsets will be found throughout half of the coloured world. It was the white man who secured the command of the ocean, and it has become his prerogative. "He learnt it in the bitter school of suffering, and not solely by the aid of the mariner's compass. . . . Now on the Pacific that prerogative has been partially lost." In this refrain does Mr. Weale continue, and, as we said earlier in this notice, the perusal of this volume will tend severely to shock the complacency of the average European citizen. It is as a Jeremiah that Mr. Putnam Weale comes forward. Yet if England will only mend her ways and reform her policies, the future is indeed not yet lost. The resources of diplomacy are not yet exhausted. "China must be made to balance against Japan as she once did; in the Nearer East, India of her own strength must be made to balance against the chaotic world lying beyond her frontiers and reaching to Egypt and Turkey, as well as against any new European menace." Along these lines, says Mr. Weale, and along these lines alone, lies the path of salvation.

NAPOLEON AT ST. HELENA

Conversations with Napoleon at St. Helena. By Henry Meynell. (Arthur L. Humphreys. 2s. 6d. net.)

There is no sign of any diminution of Napoleon literature. One may presume, therefore, that there is no lessening of the world-interest in his personality. This argues a true sense of proportion. Napoleon strode the world like a Colossus, and men—smaller men—must learn to preserve their reverence. Lord Rosebery's "The Last Phase" told authoritatively the history of those five and a-half years Napoleon spent upon the rock at St. Helena. But this little volume is a record of conversations with him during the years 1816-1817, when Captain Meynell "was serving in the Newcastle, the flagship of Rear-Admiral Sir Pulteney Malcolm, who was Commander-in-Chief at St. Helena Station, specially appointed to enforce a rigid blockade of the island, and to keep a close guard on Bonaparte." In some degree these records refer to conversations already recorded fully in a Diary of St. Helena, 1816-1817, published by Lady Malcolm in 1899. But they are valuable for the different forms of expression which give a fuller glimpse of the meetings, and also for the new matter they afford.

The conversations range over the whole list of human interests, almost from battles to gardening, from the method of electing the Scottish Peers to the construction of an ice-machine. Everything seemed to interest Napoleon, and he directed the conversation in such a way that he always managed to obtain the information he required. He seems to have been both gracious and great in his manner to his visitors. Here are a few samples as recorded:—

> He then observed that there were more Chymists in France than in England, and that the study was more general. The Admiral asked him if he had heard of Sir Humphry Davy. He replied he had seen him in Paris. He then proposed to the Admiral a walk in the garden. . . . He reverted to his favourite topic—Egypt. He asked How much of a Ship of the Line could be hightened to, so as to take her over a Shoal into a Harbour. He said, Had Admiral Bruix taken my advice he would have saved his Fleet by getting it into Alexandria. . . .

The conversation continues about shipping, and then goes on:—

> He asked what nations had abolished the Slave trade, and said that we ought to have obliged the Portuguese to relinquish it entirely. . . . He asked what we did with the slaves that were seized. . . . He said that in time, Africa, by their spreading into the Interior, might become civilised. There was an iron tank at Longwood taken out of one of the ships. He asked, How long they had been in use in the navy. He thought it an excellent invention, and wondered he had not before heard of it.

Another conversation a few days later:—

> He asked me if I was married. I answered, No. And the Admiral observed that I was young enough. B. next asked my age. The Admiral then added, laughing, that sailors ought not to marry soon, as they were often absent a long time from their wives. B. was silent a short time, and then said, Yes! I believe you are right: Les Femmes quelquefois font des sottises.

We are told of the next visit: "He was dressed in a plain Green Coat, double-breasted, with a Fall-down Collar, and a handsome Star of the Legion of Honour." Of another conversation we learn—

> The Admiral particularly remarked this day that in his description of various events he made use of the strongest expressions, and that he was not very nice in the expressions he used. He generally keeps his cocked hat in his hand, but this day, when he was energetic, he often laid it down and took it up again. He this day, and has before said, on the Admiral observing that particular plans of his had not succeeded, J'étais trompé.
>
> Lady Malcolm remarked that if he had remained on the Throne of France he would never have liked the English. "Pardon me," said he, "I had always the highest opinion of the English character, and as a proof I trusted to it and was duped, otherwise I should not have been here. If I had not preferred coming to you, I could have gone to my Father-in-law and have had one of his Palaces to live in."
>
> He took notice of Lady Malcolm's gown, and asked her if it was of Scotch manufacture. She replied in the affirmative. He said: "That is right; we should all wear the manufactures of our own countries."

We have heard that view with a more recent application. Here is our final quotation:—

> He then exclaimed: "I have worn the Imperial Crown of France, the Iron Crown of Italy, but the English have done more for me than they: they have given me a more glorious one—that which was worn by the Saviour of the World, a Crown of Thorns. Every insult and oppression offered to me by the English adds to my fame, and I want nothing more to complete my renown but to bear my misfortunes with firmness."

This little book is certainly worthy of a place on the shelves of the student of Napoleonic literature.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A PIONEER CHORUS-MASTER

Dr. Henry Coward: the Pioneer Chorus-Master. By J. A. Rodgers. (John Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)

A book that tells us about a man who is at once a Mark Tapley and a Bismarck must be worth reading, and Mr. Rodgers in this book describes Dr. Coward, the well-known choir-trainer of Sheffield, as a "Sexagenarian Mark Tapley," though in music he "is a man of blood and iron." Truly the little book was worth writing, and it should appeal to the sympathies of all who can admire a man who has carved out for himself a fine and honourable career as a musician, having started in life as a cutler's apprentice. "The child had not had six months' successive schooling when hard necessity drove him to help in the bread-winning for the family." The story of this child's determination to educate himself, to use his brains, and eventually to follow the voice which told him that Music was to be the true business of his life, is very stirring As boy and as young man he was "splendid," and the best lesson to be learned from his life is found in those early years. Were it not for the importance of Dr. Coward's work as a trainer of first-class choirs, we should have to say that he is less interesting as a man of fame than as the boy who gave up the high wages earned by an expert maker of knives to become a pupil-teacher at 20*l.* a year; the young man who, after his day's toil, gave up five nights a week to the conducting of small choirs, and studied so incessantly to educate himself and others, that he could afterwards say "At forty I took my first holiday."

Dr. Coward was that age when the Charity Commissioners suppressed the school of which he was head master. He determined to turn to music for a livelihood, and, without instruction from any one, worked till he had matriculated at Oxford and taken his degrees as Bachelor and Doctor of Music, supporting himself by the fees he received for conducting singing-classes. No doubt he knew that Yorkshire's love of music would keep him from starvation, though he must have remembered one of his employers telling him, "You may as well go to the devil as learn music." It was the fashion in the present writer's boyhood for fathers to assure musically-inclined sons that if they learned music they were certain to end by breaking stones upon the road.

Gradually Dr. Coward earned competence and fame, for when the first "Sheffield Musical Festival" was held it was at once apparent that the teacher who had trained that chorus was a man of exceptional gifts. Now his activities are not confined to Sheffield; he goes far afield to train choirs and conduct them. His genius has certainly consisted in the power to take pains. Mr. Rodgers devotes a chapter to the exposition of Dr. Coward's methods of teaching, and the thoroughness of these is amazing. We should like some of the easy critics of choral singing to read that chapter and learn what diligence, what capacity is demanded from both master and pupils. And we recommend everybody who has to do with a choir, every village school master or mistress in Great Britain and America, every lady who teaches a church choir or a factory-girls' class, to buy Mr. Rodgers' book and learn from it some of Dr. Coward's secrets of choir-training.

Mr. Rodgers' claim for Dr. Coward that he is "the pioneer" chorus-master is probably an overstatement. There was much excellent choir-training in Yorkshire and elsewhere before Dr. Coward's work was begun. But it may well be that in the vigour of his methods and in his perception of the further possibilities of chorus-singing he deserves to rank as a leader of compelling influence.

In a recent issue of the Contemporary Review an article appeared on the subject of chorus-singing, the writer of which takes a very optimistic view of the possible development of choirs and their influence on composition. He thinks that Great Britain possesses several composers of genius (we wish we knew who they were!) who cannot afford to compose for the costly modern orchestras, for no publisher will risk printing their sublime efforts. It seems that these compositions are "bandied about and studied and admired" by a select group of sympathisers. Now choirs are not expensive, and owing to such organisers as the late Miss Wakefield, and such trainers as Dr. Coward and others, we have what may fairly be styled "virtuoso" choirs. Let the unknown composers write for the choirs, suggests the Contemporary, and give up their symphonic poems. It is quite true that some composers (but they are not entirely unknown, though they may not be numbered among the men of genius) are attempting, in their writing for choirs, to arrive at "hitherto undreamed-of effects in tone, colour, dramatic description, and lyrical expressiveness." We know well enough by this time that the music can be too difficult for some of the choirs which Great Britain can boast of, and it is heartily to be wished that our composers may continue their design of writing special music for these companies of virtuosi, for when a choral concert is given without orchestra, the programme-maker would be only too glad to know of pieces which will enable the choir to show that it is as capable of varied effects as an orchestra if only it is allowed scope.

A VIEW OF ROME

Sixtine Rome. By J. A. F. Orbaan, D.Ph. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

It was no mere random selection that suggested to the inventor of the proverb "When you are at Rome do as Rome does" the choice of his city. The counsel is no doubt of general application; but, taken in its most literal sense, it has a quite particular significance. At no other place in the world do association and imagination play us such tricks. Paris may be learnt in an elementary way from the Ritz or the Elysée Palace, a notion of Oxford may be formed from a base of operations at the Randolph; but to attempt to know Rome from the standpoint of, say, the Quirinal Hotel is to court disaster. Dr. Orbaan is a missionary of this truth; like many another archæologist, whose province is the Eternal City, he carries with him a poet ever ready to praise his task in lyrical language. Dispensing with a formal introduction, he plunges us into the enchantments of a Roman evening; for accessories he gives us a gust of the invigorating "Tramontana," and one of those bright moonlight nights that suggest the Coliseum to the tourist on his beat. At the same time Dr. Orbaan has better things in store for us; it is towards the Pantheon and its glamorous surroundings that he next directs our steps:—"There is no better method to ensure an evening of fruitful investigation than to take a walk after sunset in Old Rome, between the Corso and the Tiber. . . . In a few minutes you will be lost—that is absolutely certain. I envy you that privilege. It is almost prosaic to know one's way round every corner of the ancient city. In your wanderings you will happen on some square or bridge which you know, and return thence with a provision of questions." Our wanderings in this particular case, after taking us past old Roman houses and shops of la vieille roche, where the business of life is still carried on after mediæval formulæ, conduct us at length to the Porta Furba, which is the starting-point of Dr. Orbaan's main thesis. For it is this Porta Furba that records in an inscription one of the enormous feats of Sixtus V., who "gathered the waters from afar, and brought them onward to Rome" along the great aqueduct; the water, the Acqua Felice, commemorates its first taskmaster by its name, Sixtus having started in life as Felice Peretti.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Sixtine Rome is for Dr. Orbaan "one of the many Romes in Rome awaiting to be discovered." It is a thread to guide us through the labyrinth the bewilderments of which he has so excellently indicated. It is a most satisfying answer to the question, "Where to begin?" Unfortunately, our guide rather belies his early promise; it is as though he led a band of disciples to the unlocked door of a treasure-house, and then, having let pass the elect of them, closed the door roughly on the rest. For it cannot be denied that the book is very hard reading; there is a regrettable absence of plan, and too many of the passages have to be read twice. Even the grammar is not always above reproach. With regard to the absence of plan, this is a defect we could easily pardon, having in view the flaneur attitude of the author—an attitude, as we have already hinted, not necessarily prejudicial to the study of Roman antiquities—but Dr. Orbaan leaves too many things unexplained that need explaining, or he explains them too late to be useful To know Rome from this book it is necessary to have known Rome beforehand. The work is divided into five chapters—"Porta Furba," "The Sixtine Chapel in Santa Maria Maggiore," "The Vatican Library," "Domenico Fontana," and "The Destruction of the Septizonium." This arrangement serves well to indicate the chief achievements of Sixtus V., but in its effects it is rather arbitrary. The last headline, for instance, is a very loose description of the contents of the chapter. We should have welcomed a little more preliminary history in the matter of Santa Maria Maggiore and the Dome of St. Peter's. The life of the Pope is given in the chapter on the Sixtine Chapel; but whereas, forty pages later, we are told that Sixtus was a Franciscan, here we are merely informed that "early in life he entered a monastery."

Still, with its many defects of form, this book is an extraordinarily suggestive one, and, reinforced by a copy of Browning—the best guide to Rome, after all, for most Englishmen—could not but increase the sum of happiness of those who feel the magnetism of the Eternal City. All the pictures are apposite, and many of them are excellently done; the map of Sixtine Rome and the plan of the Vatican are very engaging, but call imperatively for the magnifying-glass.

SHORTER REVIEWS

The Tyranny of Speed; or, the Motor Peril and its Remedy. By E. H. Hodgkinson. (John Lane. 3s. 6d.)

A curious book; a cool and calculated indictment (with here and there a lapse into diatribe) against all motor-cars that can exceed a pace of twenty miles an hour. It cites reported cases of gross and dangerous driving, but entirely ignores the uncountable miles covered harmlessly and decently by the great majority of drivers, and contains proposals for restrictions of motor-power and its use of the most absurd and retrograde kind. It might almost be accused of having an axe to grind in the shape of puffing one or other of these clever inventions already heard of for mechanically and automatically controlling a car's speed against the will of the driver. In certain circumstances any speed is dangerous, so that any particular fixed limit has its absurdities, and any automatic means for preventing a car from exceeding a specified limit might on occasion lead to awkward and even fatal results. Statistics have stated that steam-rollers have caused more fatal accidents in proportion to their number than other vehicles, yet their pace cannot have been the responsible factor. The author seems to be one of those who think competition a crushing evil instead of recognising it as the principle of life, and his book virtually advocates the wrecking of a great and important industry. Nevertheless, though he goes much too far, he commands a good deal of sympathy in voicing the cry of the multitude which suffers from the "hoggish" driving some motorists are still guilty of, the dust curse (which, after all, is merely due to improper road construction), and the disgusting vitiation of the air of cities with exhaust-gas fumes. Beyond this the book is about six years too late in its object, and is too sweeping and indiscriminate in its condemnation of speed qua speed.

Notes on Wiltshire Names. By John C. Longstaff. Vol. I. Place-Names. (Wm. Dotesio, the Library Press, Bradford-on-Avon. 3s. 6d. net.)

The present volume takes the form of a catalogue raisonné of a number of the names which have become attached to different places within the county of Wiltshire. A companion volume on the personal names of the county is promised later. Archæology is an extremely attractive study even to those who are but apprentices in it. To archæologists, therefore, amateur and professional, this little volume, although, of course, by no means perfect in every detail, will prove of interest. There will not be unanimous agreement with all Mr. Longstaff's derivations, and many of them will be subject to considerable criticism; but any errors of which he may have been guilty will be easily forgiven in return for the wealth of material which he has collected.

In his Preface the author modestly disclaims any original research. He describes his work as little more than a compilation. Nevertheless, even if he describes it properly, it is none the less valuable. Without the compiler to put existing knowledge into order, the discoverer or creator would find much of his labour stillborn. After an introductory chapter outlining the indebtedness of Wiltshire nomenclature to Celtic, Roman, Saxon, Scandinavian, and Danish origins, Mr. Longstaff proceeds to deal in greater detail with a number of place-names which he has collected. He classifies them as derived from enclosures, open spaces, and water. In the last chapter names variously derived are treated.

Many curiosities in nomenclature arise in the course of this volume. They are too numerous for quotation, and no selection confined within the limits of this notice would be fair. The best advice to those who are interested is to obtain this book and enjoy it.

The Danube with Pen and Pencil. By Captain B. Granville Baker. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 15s.)

The book of which Captain Baker is both author and illustrator traces the Danube from its source to the sea. The illustrations, which are very numerous, are good, especially the pen-and-ink sketches. The author treats more of the ancient history of the countries through which the river flows than the modern. When he arrives at Vienna, however, we get an idea of the present-day life of that charming capital, and ample tribute is paid to the Emperor Francis Joseph and his popularity with his people. There is no infringement, happily, of the privileges of Baedeker in the pages, but the author must have worked hard at his ancient history.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The result however of his joint efforts as author and artist is evidently a labour of love, and the book will be welcome to idle readers who will drop down with the Danube stream a day at a time and study at their leisure the silhouette-pictures of the cities, towns, and peoples on its banks, and renew their German, a quantity of which they will find sandwiched in the text. There is a very full analysis of the contents of the book which forms quite interesting reading apart from the work itself.

Religion of the Civilised World and Judaism. By H. J. Kisch. (Routledge and Sons. 1s. net.)

In this booklet Mr. Kisch sets out to argue the case of Judaism as the universalistic faith of the future. His method is a comparison of the claims of Judaism and Christianity, but his argument is very slight, and on that account, if on no other, can hardly be considered convincing. The subject is far too large a one to be treated so sketchily as Mr. Kisch has dealt with it. If the subject interests him, as presumably it does, he should take it up seriously and afford it adequate treatment. Then his views and opinions may have far more effect than the present little volume can secure. This book is intended for Jews as well as Gentiles, or, perhaps, one ought to say for Gentiles as well as Jews.

FICTION

The Princess of New York. By Cosmo Hamilton. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

Beautiful diction, nice people—whether English or American whether straight or not straight, graceful and effective writing, and, rarest of all in novels, correct grammar—and yet the literary critic of a leading weekly journal has described Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's novel as a "pot-boiler"! The reviewer in question, however, proceeded to bestow high praise upon the characterisation. How a book which undeniably possesses the features which we have mentioned above, and also presents perfect characterisation, can be called a "pot-boiler" we must leave this literary giant or juggler to explain.

The plot, it may be said at once, is not intricate, and does not possess the outstanding features of the author's former famous novel, "The Infinite Capacity."

This, however, is a small matter. "The originality of the subject is in its treatment." The commentary is that of Disraeli, and few men knew how to treat commonplace subjects, such, for instance, as the House of Commons—not the present House of Commons, but the House of Commons even of his day—with elegance and the literary touch which compels interest and admiration.

Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's plot is quite simple. It is this. The steel king of America has a very beautiful daughter who is going to do the European trip. She is placed on board one of the big liners. Just as she is about to start a Wall Street intrigue against her father threatens him with ruin. In these circumstances Hutchinson D. Stanton begs his wife, who has been his standby in all the ups and downs of his financial career, to forego chaperoning his daughter to England, and to remain by his side to help him to weather the storm. This did not appear to be so difficult, because Mrs. Dempster Fiske Raffan, a life-long friend, is on board, and it is felt that Mamie Stanton may be safely left to her care. It so happens that two refined and polished adventurers of the Rawdon Crawley and Becky Sharp type are on board—Lady Merstham and her son Allan. Having scented the fact that Mamie is the daughter of a millionaire, Lady Merstham proceeds to claim acquaintance with Mrs. Raffan:—

> With consummate histrionic ability Lady Merstham drew up short and held out her hand with an air of delightful cordiality. "Oh! how do you do, Mrs. Dempster Fiske Raffan? What ages since we met!" Mrs. Fiske Raffan took the hand with the small tapering fingers, and her eyes ran over the tall, slight woman with the beautiful profile and well-modulated voice. "Oh! how do you do?" she said, hastily searching her memory. "You have forgotten me. I'm Lady Merstham. I met you some years ago at a garden-party given by the American Ambassador."

Mrs. Raffan, flattered and very desirous of crediting Lady Merstham's statement, exclaims, "Why, sure, how well you look." From this point onwards it is not difficult to surmise that Mamie gets into the hands of highly educated, delightfully mannered, and most execrable sharpers. Everything plays into the hands of the gang. Mrs. Raffan, on arriving in England, is called away in consequence of the serious illness of her sister. Mamie is placed in the charge of the Mersthams in their hired house in Half Moon-street. Sir George Merstham, who is one of the most delightfully unscrupulous old rascals to whom it has been our privilege to be introduced since Thackeray's days, on the strength of the engagement of his son—which he somewhat prematurely announces—to Mamie, collects divers sums from several notorious confrères and gentlemen whose adopted names are to be found in the peerage; hires a comfortable-looking butler, footmen, and an immaculate motor. Mamie is naturally delighted with her surroundings in the town house of members of the old aristocracy. We mention "town house" because Merstham Court is sometimes referred to by the inimitable Sir George. From this point we do not wish to spoil the reader's enjoyment of the extraordinary adventures into which Mamie is drawn owing to her association with the Mersthams. They ought to be read, and they will well repay reading. We should like to say that the character of Geoffrey Kingsward, a young Oxford man, is quite delightful. He is a clean, honest, athletic young Englishman, and he talks as a young man would in the entirely unliterary language of the University—the young man who will develop into a Judge, statesman, or literary man when the time is ripe. Here is a passage which we feel bound to quote. After many vicissitudes, when Mamie has returned to America, and is apparently out of the orbit of Geoffrey's life, Geoffrey, who has left the University, and who is condemned to law-books and keeping terms at the Temple, is going to give himself a holiday in Devonshire:

> He made up his mind exactly to what spot he was to swim, let the sea be as rough as it might. Nevertheless, there was one face, one beautiful face always framed in the trees, in the sky, and wherever else he looked. He took up a book and found that its frontispiece was "Mamie." He opened illustrated papers and discovered that every photograph was of "Mamie." In every song of the birds there was the word "Mamie." Mamie's name was whispered by the breeze, and the light of the sun was never as golden as the gold of Mamie's hair.

Who will not wish to read a novel in which passages such as this abound?

We regret that we are a little bit nettled at certain disparaging remarks about the Bench and Bar. The portrait of the Bow-street magistrate—not reminiscent, we hope, of anyone of the author's acquaintance—represents a person who is distinctly forbidding; and when Mamie asks Geoffrey whether he likes her father and mother, Geoffrey found his voice thus—"As I like the tree," he said, "upon which the rose blooms." "For a barrister," said Mamie, "that's rather good."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We think there has been nothing more deft and delightful since Lothair announced his acceptance by Lady Corisande—"I have been in Corisande's garden, and she has given me a rose"—than the conclusion of Mr. Cosmo Hamilton's novel. When Geoffrey said to Mamie, "Princess, oh Princess! I love you! Is there any chance for me?" Mamie hid her face, slipped the little ring which he had given her from its old finger, and put it on the finger next the little one. "Mamie! . . . Mamie!" When Mamie looked up there were tears in her eyes, but a smile upon her lips. "Cancel 'brother,'" she whispered, "I love you."

CECIL COWPER.

Brazenhead the Great. By MAURICE HEWLETT. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

FOR sheer entertainment, albeit a trifle gory, this latest adventure of Mr. Hewlett's would be difficult to excel; but if we discuss it from the literary point of view, Mr. Hewlett has himself excelled it several times. "Open Country" and "Rest Harrow," to name two recent examples, were both more to the taste of critical readers, and there is no need to put "Brazenhead the Great" in any especial niche as representing a development of the author's particular art—it seems to us to fall into the catalogue of those books which fine writers occasionally sandwich between two better ones, as, for instance, when Mr. Arnold Bennett amused us with "The Card" between "Clayhanger" and its promised sequel.

Captain Brazenhead, ardent lover and consummate fighter, moves in an atmosphere—or rather a tempest—of hard knocks, chopped hands, lurid language, and stolen kisses. As murderer to the Duke of Milan (we find ourselves, it should be said, in the early part of the fifteenth century), who "collected murders as other men bronzes," he was to "kill daintily, and report every night the means and manner of his killing." He was to be an artist, to "compose his murders, give them a lyrical pitch." Verily a delightful subject, this touchy giant, for the pen of Mr. Hewlett. And a thoroughly entertaining blackguard does he make of Brazenhead for those whose stomachs are not too squeamish. "I took slices off him here and there," remarks the gallant hero, "till he gleamed before me in stripes of red and white." And again—one can see him glowing with the pride of the artist—"I carved my name out upon him, and he died of the dot on the i." Ingenious fellow!

But the Captain is not always belligerent. A buxom wench, whether she were another man's property or not, could always move him to enthusiasm of a different kind. Coming upon the bewitching Nicole la-Grâce-de-Dieu, he calmly trussed her lover and perched him on a shelf in the loft, and started in to woo the fair in heroic fashion. "To my eye," he remarked, "you need a flower in your mouth. Not that your lips are not already a flower, but that the obstacle may provoke me." Nicole protests that they cannot live on kisses. "'We can try, however,' said the Captain—and tried."

Of the pilgrimage to Canterbury, with its varied and amusing adventures, and of the scandalous behaviour of Brazenhead upon every possible occasion, we need not tell. We prefer "The Captain of Kent," the third section of this series, to the others; it is not so brilliant with sword-play nor so encrimsoned with blood; it gives room for more humour, more exhibition of Brazenhead's less pugnacious qualities, and the love affair between Master Percival Perceforest and Mawdleyn Touchett is an idyll of the prettiest description—as dainty in its way as "Aucassin and Nicolette." Few readers will complain of this book, but many will wonder when Mr. Hewlett's master-work is coming.

Sampson Rideout, Quaker. By UNA L. SILBERRAD. (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s.)

IT is some time since we met in the realm of fiction two more interesting people than Sampson Rideout and Lady Falkirk, the two principal characters in Miss Silberrad's account of the lives of some Quakers of Salisbury a generation or so ago. Lady Falkirk one day chances upon a Quakers' meeting; her presence saves the members from being arrested by the soldiers who invade the barn where these simple folk are met together. Through the misdoings of one Darry, who Sampson helps when in trouble, and finally takes into his employ, the latter falls under the displeasure of Mr. Bellor, a Justice, who seeks to arrest him. The news is wafted to Lady Falkirk, who warns the Quaker of his danger, and insists upon concealing him in her house, although rather against his keen sense of truth and honesty. The way in which she shields and protects him, and the account of their cosy little chats, unknown to any save a faithful maid, make very pleasant reading, and show the faith and devotion of a brave woman to the man she is anxious to befriend, and afterwards unconsciously loves.

By the ragged appearance of the title-page it would appear that the book was originally printed in America. We suppose if this be the case it will account for some of the very peculiar sentences we find on so many of the pages. Two auxiliaries and no principal verb do not convey a very clear meaning; neither do sentences beginning "The which," nor such split infinitives as "to never get," "to either hold," "to at least send," "to most suitably offer" sound pleasantly to English ears; while "and doesn't suspicion he may himself be the quarry" and "The which saying displeased the overseers some and surprised them much" seem to set at rest for once and all any doubt as to the country of the book's production. It is a pity that errors of this kind have been allowed to creep into an otherwise charming story.

Letters from Fleet-street. (Frank Palmer. 5s. net.)

IN a couple of nearly furnitureless rooms in a court off Fleet-street there lives a besotted and drug-imbibing old journalist, who makes believe to edit some miserable paper that no one buys, and who spends most of his time, when not lulled to sweet dreams by morphia, in Fleet-street public-houses. This gentleman is visited by a beautiful girl who is desirous of selling him a short story, and for that purpose tells him something of her circumstances and her ambitions. The talented editor strikes up an instantaneous friendship with her, invites her to lunch with him off the contents of a sardine-tin, and begins to write to her letters in which he displays to the full all the varied stores of a meanly cynical, cheap, and unpleasant mind. He calls his young friend a fairy, promptly falls in love with her, and addresses her in writing as "My Daughter," "Sweet Little Fairy," "Dear Wonder-Child," "Baby-Woman Dear," "Little Ray of Sunshine," and so on ad nauseam.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

He exhorts her to steer clear of the stage, to work hard, to go to church, and to take sanatogen, with other interesting morsels of advice. Sometimes he lets himself go and pens hysterical love-letters. Through all this she apparently likes him. In the end, however, she becomes engaged to a decent young man, and her delightful platonic "Father" commits suicide because she can never be his—which is just the sort of thing that sort of individual would do. Such are the "Letters from Fleet-street." Whether they are written from life or not we cannot say; there certainly is an unpleasant "actuality" about them, and we notice that the author does not oblige with his name. We commend his discretion.

The Old Dance-Master. By WILLIAM ROMAINE PATERSON (Benjamin Swift). (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

THE old dance-master is an Austrian, Herr Habenichts, who possesses immense erudition and the more evident, if lesser, quality of good-heartedness. He has a captivating vein of poetic optimism and love of his kind which, with the permission of the author, works wonders in the tangled miseries of life and with the unstable characters that cross his path. There is something of Dickens lurking behind the inspiration of the story; it is certain that his influence biasses the author's conceptions of modern London life. We must warn the author that in his "low life" colloquialisms he is often fifty years out of date. Cockneys do not now confuse "v" and "w"; the malapropisms he records are quite out of the period. Herr Habenichts plays the part of an unusually beneficent intermediary betwixt the characters and their means of happiness, between lovers, and between humble people and wealthy.

Mr. Paterson has felt compelled to give us a picture of a brilliant salon of to-day. We are sorry, for he is even less successful in this than with the studies of "low life." Monsieur Dumaresq is the most noted scintillator in the salon of Arabella, Duchess of Berkshire. "It was he who divided mankind into latitudinarians and platitudinarians, and he claimed priority for the remark that philosophers are either utilitarians or futilitarians," and a great deal more after the same formula. Towards the end the author's good will insists on shovelling gold and good fortune upon the heads of the deserving characters. The story is anything but a work of artistic pretensions, for, although it has spirited description, the style is often slovenly. It is the lovable personality of the old dance-master which sustains the interest in the book.

Mac's Adventures. By JANE BARLOW. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

THE adventures recorded here come to Mac between the ages of four and eight years. His infantile dignity and strong-mindedness are original, and the quaint turns of speech caught from his Irish environment make his conversation an unfailing delight, and show that the author knows Ireland and the Irish intimately. In "The Field of the Frightful Beasts" Mac has conceived a terror in his little soul of walking with his nurse along a certain road. It is because a wall rises up from it as high as a house, and along the top of the wall are to be seen the heads of a donkey and some cows—a frieze of dreadful portent to Mac, whose imagination dwells on the outrageous length of their hidden legs with horror and loathing. This terror is lifted from him, for, when accidentally brought to the other side of the wall, he discovers a hillock. "But how was a Person to know that a wall would be pretendin' it was the height of a house along the road and then turn into a little quite lowish one on the wrong side?" "Some Jokes of Timothy" and several of the other short stories also show a gift of delicate fancy and imagination.

The Lord Dollar (Don Dinero). By HARPER CURTIS. (Blackwood and Son. 6s.)

SEÑORITAS, mestizas, gringos, padres, and mystery—such are the component parts of "The Lord Dollar." The local colour is excellent; the heat and dust create an enviably expensive thirst; and the Englishman is a sportsman. But—and there is a big one—what is it all about? Every one is apparently some one else, and one's ever wearier brain struggles hopelessly in a blinding fog of mystery. At this moment, when the back cover has been finally closed—with a certain relief—the identity of the Padre is still veiled. Neither have we pierced the cloud which conceals the connection of the prologue with the rest of the novel. Undoubtedly Mr. Curtis has been big with Mexican life and atmosphere, and in his strivings after a plot to act as a peg on which to hang them has crossed the bounds of the conceivable. As a result, although the life and movement and sunshine were very enjoyable, the book is tantalising and not a little annoying. Not even Sherlock Holmes, with all his cryptic and apparently unmeaning actions, bewildered us so much as the characters in "The Lord Dollar," for at least in Sherlock Holmes we were sure of a final clearing-up of the tangled chaos. Mr. Curtis, however, pays his readers the too high compliment of crediting them with occultism, or at least the power of second sight; for without the possession of one of these faculties they are left in a condition of mental muddle as to the secret of each character in his book.

THE THEATRE

"JAMES AND JOHN" AT THE HAYMARKET THEATRE

"LADY PATRICIA" is preceded by a one-act play which no wise person will miss seeing. There should be a future for Mr. Gilbert Cannan as a playwright. "James and John" is the best example of the tragedy of the commonplace that we have ever seen. It is like one of Whistler's etchings of a scene in which no other artist would have found any beauty. Its complete sincerity, the unassuming manner in which it is written and the superb way in which it is played, make it remain in the memory.

Mr. Cannan has chosen a very painful subject. He gives us a little ordinary room in a suburb at night. Mrs. Betts and her two sons, James and John, are killing time characteristically. The mother in a state of carefully repressed emotion is asking foolish questions. The two sons are endeavouring to play "Ludo" or some such foolish indoor game. The mother is old, but her sons are older. They are pale, grey-faced men with hair streaked with white. All three seem to have been struck by lightning and to have survived without really being alive. James seems to have made up his mind that life doesn't matter, but John kicks against the pricks. It is he who bursts out suddenly, unable to put up with his mother's tearfulness, and clears his soul of its burden of pent-up anger. There is no excuse for the father. He is a thief, and the effect of his thieving has ruined the family. Much against his will John has invited the father to come to his house when he leaves his gaol after a long term of imprisonment. Let there be no sentimentality. It would have been far better if the man had died. This is John's mood, and, having rasped out all these cruel things, he puts on his glasses, fetches the volume of Pickwick and reads aloud to his mother—the mother whose ears are strained to catch the shuffling feet of the husband she has not seen for many years.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

James, who is equally appalled at the mere thought of seeing his father again, the once hail fellow well met, now broken down under the prison system, slips away and presently returns with his father's old chair, pipe, tobacco-pouch, and slippers. It is raining. It rained on that night when Mr. Betts, bank manager, came back to his wife, muddy, dishevelled, and drivelling, having failed to commit suicide. The time passes slowly. At last the bell rings. Mother and sons stand up, the mother all shaking. The man is her husband and the father of her boys. He was not a bad man. James answers the bell. A letter of no importance. So John returns to Pickwick. His dry voice fills the room for several minutes. No one hears it, and he is perfectly well aware of the fact. Then the bell rings again, and again James leaves the room. Presently there enters a man with the face of a priest, a very refined, almost ethereal face, pale, and heavily lined and bloodless. He comes in like a man walking in a dream, feeling his way back to a place which he recognises faintly. His clothes hang upon him. He seems to have been walking the streets without an overcoat. The wife totters forward weeping rather loudly. Without any emotion the visitor takes her into his arms. If he is difficult to recognise, so are the others. It seems to the father that his wife and his two sons are old. John refuses to shake hands, and bows. The father agrees silently in the justice of this treatment, and returns the bow. James wishes to temper the wind to the shorn lamb, points to the chair and the slippers. The old man, seizing rather hungrily upon a little physical comfort, removes his muddied boots. He is given a glass of whisky. The smell of the liquor is unfamiliar. He presently recognises it with a little smile, and sips carefully. He is further warmed by the sight of his old pipe and pouch, and presently he lights the pipe and smokes with relish. He has nothing to say. The fire is very pleasant. When his wife rises to go to bed he kisses her, and sits down again. He and his two sons can find nothing to say. They take everything as said. James goes off to see that his father's fire is burning, and John is left alone with the man whom he had treated to such hard words. The pipe won't keep alight, so the father crosses the room to go to bed. John puts out his hand. "Good-night, father," said he. "Good-night, John," says the father. He passes on to the door and goes out, very quietly, very unemotionally, and then John turns out the lights in the room and in the passage. He also goes to bed, and the little ordinary room in which has been enacted a tragedy more frightful than murder and sudden death is empty for a few hours, and the curtain falls upon it, to rise again in one's imagination on that room peopled with those people for days and weeks and possibly years. Nothing is missed by Mr. James Hearn as the father, Mr. G. Fisher White as John, Mr. H. R. Hignett as James, and Miss Helen Haye as Mrs. Betts. The exquisite art of these four players must be seen to be appreciated. Mr. Herbert Trench is to be congratulated upon having discovered Mr. Gilbert Cannan.

THE LIFE OF RACHEL*

REVIEWED BY FRANK HARRIS

SOMETIMES the author of a book is greater than his subject, though more usually the subject dwarfs the author. In this case the subject and the author are on much the same level: Mr. Gribble has a subject which suits him, and if he treats Rachel's passionate vagaries a little contemptuously it must be admitted that they are difficult to handle at all, except humorously, being too numerous for significance; and in spite of them he gives cordial appreciation to Rachel's extraordinary talent. He writes like a tolerant man of the world endowed with much knowledge and a sprightly, vivid style. Something more than this would, perhaps, be needed in order to get the ultimate of emotion out of the story of Rachel's brief but glorious life; but these qualities are more than sufficient to make an extremely interesting and amusing book. In his light and somewhat superficial way Mr. Gribble is a literary artist; his book is a whole; he tells about Rachel all that the ordinary reader cares to know, and a little more for the reader who wants at some moment or other to come face to face with the soul of a gifted woman.

One is indeed tempted to retell the life of Rachel by simply combining a dozen extracts from Mr. Gribble's work, and it would be difficult to give the book higher praise. There it stands, a coherent whole: it is built like a playhouse, so to speak, with a pedestal in it, on which we see the actress Rachel; but with the stones that form the playhouse one could build if one pleased a temple, and perhaps put the woman's likeness over the high altar.

Before dealing with Rachel let us first of all ask ourselves whether Mr. Gribble was justified in separating her life into two parts—the "real" life and the "stage" life—as he has done. Of course, the biographer who was also an artist intent on perfection would make no such arbitrary distinction: he would rather delight in showing that Rachel's real life was the counterpart and complement of her artistic life. But let us follow Mr. Gribble and take her "real" life, and see how much it teaches us about Rachel.

There was no time in her life, she used to declare, when she was "innocent;" she was corrupt, if we may use for a moment the words of the moralists, "from early childhood." Sainte-Beuve wrote of her:—

> Rachel is behaving very badly. She is not by any means living the simple life but has any number of lovers, and with an income of £4,000 a year or more finds herself hard up. Still, her status in the world of fashion is not affected by her conduct. . . .

Mr. Gribble sums up her life in a few sentences:—

> She had been born in a position in which life is an ignoble struggle for the means of living. She had risen almost without effort, as one who runs lightly up a ladder, to a position in which every morning and every evening of life might bring fresh pleasures. Having achieved that position, she wanted all that it could yield—glory, the homage of princes, wealth, and, if not love, at least that passionate make-believe which goes by the name of love. So she pursued glory from Paris to St. Petersburg, and from St. Petersburg to New York, and took lovers and bore children to them, and having earned one fortune by her talents acquired a second by spoiling the Egyptians. . . . .

"Shocking, shocking," cries the moralist, but the true critic must be tolerant as God's sunshine, and show the evil as the good. Yet even from this point of view it must be admitted at once that no one of Rachel's many loves is significant enough to enable us to see her very soul. That is the one fault of this biography, a fault, however, which classes it and determines its fleeting place. Had Mr. Gribble found such a love, he would probably never have tried to separate her "real" life from her life as an actress: he would have seen that it was necessary to reconcile them both and show that what Rachel was as a lover, she was also as a queen of tragedy. Her true biography then has yet to be written: perhaps it is only Rachel who could have written it, and she may have neglected to do so; I don't know; I should like to hear Mr. Gribble on the subject. But if he has not given us her "top-note" in passion, he has given us amazing incident on incident, no one of which is much to her credit. Mr. Gribble is not afraid of shadows in his picture; he tells us at length how shamelessly Rachel plundered her admirers, and even comparative strangers. Mr. Gribble retells the famous story of her dinner with Count Duchâtel. Rachel admired the silver centre-piece on his table; Duchâtel at once begged her to consider it hers, and regarded the incident as closed. Towards the end of the evening he told her he intended to send her home in his carriage.

Rachel, her Stage Life and her Real Life. By Francis Gribble. (Chapman and Hall. 15s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> "Good," she cried, "for then I can take home that centre-piece which you gave me."
>
> "Certainly," responded Duchâtel, "but I hope I may ask you, madam, to return the carriage!"

Not a Juive, says one of her, but juif was Rachel; and we are therefore not surprised when we read in Mr. Gribble that she gave with both hands to her brother and sisters, paying their debts over and over again. She forced the Théâtre Français to take her sister Rebecca into the company, and like a queen gave her a flat for herself. Rachel's generosity to her family was as boundless as the impudence with which she plundered the rest of mankind; I must confess that both qualities seem to me to be equally artistic.

Her treatment, however, of her famous predecessor, Mlle. George, is more difficult to excuse. Mlle. George, Mr. Gribble tells us, had been in her time "a queen of tragedy and the mistress of the first Napoleon." Fallen on evil days, she called on Rachel to beg her to play at her "benefit." Rachel declined to receive her, and sent down a message asking her to put her request in writing. Mlle. George refused to humiliate herself, and replied with exceeding bitterness. The whole incident is a sort of object-lesson in heartless arrogance and the hate it breeds.

All these faults in Rachel, and many more, would be tolerable to us were there any noble feature shown us of devotion or even of passionate self-abandonment; but Mr. Gribble forgets the high lights, and so the portrait, while vivid enough, is superficial: the soul of Rachel is not to be found in this so-called "real life."

We get a little nearer the true Rachel when Mr. Gribble tells us of her life as an actress. Acting is often termed a half-art, but if compared with a true half-art, such as rhetoric or reporting, it is seen to be inferior. The speech lives when the speaker is dead: it appeals to generations who never knew the author: they can judge him and their debt to him. But the actor once dead is dead for all time, like the violin-player or the dancer. During his life-time even, once he is past his prime, the mummer makes no further appeal; Rachel at the end is no better than a Ristori. There is something pathetic in this tragic insignificance; the actor's triumph is but for a moment; he is an echo, not a voice, and we have reason even to suspect that the best echoes are not given by the best voices. This is the kernel of the whole matter, and allows us to bring even the actor of the past to present judgment.

It has been noticed that every actor is a success in "Hamlet," while no actor has yet been able to make Hamlet his own. No one fails in the great part; your Fechter, and Irving, and Robertson each finds a moment in it which allows him to display his full powers; but at other moments he fails. The humanity of Hamlet is too large for them all; they can fill his shoes with ease, even his trunk-hose and his doublet with a little padding, but his hat is too large for them; he has thoughts that dwarf their utterance. We prefer to read his soliloquy to hearing the best of them mouth and deform it. No actor yet has made Hamlet his own as Salvini, for example, annexed Othello, and as Possart annexed Shylock, and Hamlet is but a part of Shakespeare. The greatest of actors put to this test show as men of ordinary stature with a little special endowment in this or that direction. One of them can show jealousy, another tenderness, another valiance, or pride, or hate; but the whole gamut escapes all of them: they are at best good echoes of one or at most of two or three emotions. And if actresses appear more satisfactory to us, it is because imitation and echoing seem more natural in a woman. For if we bring the great actresses to the same test they fail in the same way: the Duse is at her worst in "Cleopatra;" Bernhardt is at her best in the "Dame aux Camélias." The "Demi-Monde" or "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" are the plays which show our actresses at their best; the tight-laced modern figure gives them ample scope. And if we place Rachel under this standard she seems a little larger, but not much. Her greatest success was made in half-singing, half-reciting the "Marseillaise," and, so far as one can judge, her "Phédre" was for her as for Bernhardt the best part among the great plays. A little bigger than Bernhardt probably was Rachel; but that is not much, for even a Charlotte Brontë, as we shall see, will measure herself beside her, and come off victorious.

We have all sorts of estimates from gifted contemporaries of Rachel's power as an actress. Fanny Kemble in London declared that "neither Ristori nor Sarah Bernhardt was worthy to be mentioned in the same sentence with her." Matthew Arnold put it on record that Rachel's art began where the art of Madame Bernhardt leaves off, and if this is not enough to convince us, we have that magnificent page in "Villette," in which Charlotte Brontë, then a poor little governess at Brussels, gives her vision of the sister-soul:—

> I had heard this woman termed "plain," and I expected bony harshness and grimness—something large, angular, sallow. What I saw was the shadow of a royal Vashti: a queen, fair as the day once, turned pale now like twilight, and wasted like wax in flame.
>
> For a while—a long while—I thought it was only a woman, though an unique woman, who moved in might and grace before this multitude. By and by I recognised my mistake. Behold! I found upon her something neither of woman nor of man: in each of her eyes sat a devil. These evil forces bore her through the tragedy, kept up her feeble strength—for she was but a frail creature; and as the action rose and the stir deepened, how wildly they shook her with their passions of the pit! They wrote HELL on her straight, haughty brow. They turned her voice to the note of torment. They writhed her regal face to a demonaic mask. Hate and Murder and Madness incarnate she stood.
>
> It was a marvellous sight: a mighty revelation.
>
> It was a spectacle low, horrible, immoral. . . .
>
> Vashti was not good, I was told; and I have said she did not look good: though a spirit, she was a spirit out of Tophet. Well, if so much of unholy force can arise from below, may not an equal efflux of sacred essence descend one day from above?
>
> I had seen acting before, but never anything like this: never anything which astonished Hope, and hushed Desire; which outstripped Impulse, and paled Conception; which, instead of merely irritating imagination with the thought of what might be done, at the same time fevering the nerves because it was not done, disclosed power like a deep, swollen winter river, thundering in cataract, and bearing the soul, like a leaf, on the steep and steel sweep of its descent.

I have put three lines of this wonderful report in italics: they are the three lines in which the poor little passionate governess discovers her own soul, and puts on record her hope that she herself may be found to be as great an influence for good as Rachel was for evil. But Charlotte Brontë ought to have known that Rachel too, though she came straight from Hell, must have cherished in her human soul at least as lofty an ambition. Fortunately Mr. Gribble has not omitted to give us this side of Rachel the actress. She writes to Legouvé towards the very end of her life:—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

> What would you say if I revealed my inner thoughts to you? You admire me, I believe. You are in ecstacies when I play. Well, I assure you, there is a Rachel in me ten times superior to the Rachel whom you know. I have not been one quarter as great as I might have been. I have talent, but I might have had genius. Ah, if only I had been brought up differently! If I had had different friends around me! If I had lived a better life! What an artist I should have been in that case! When I think of it such a regret steals over me. . . .

If Charlotte Brontë had read this letter she might have learned from it that the chief difference between herself and Rachel was not one of virtue or of vice, but one of circumstance and opportunity. Here at length we have a glimpse of Rachel's tormented soul—a passionate aspiration, a passionate regret.

THE SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS *

[First Notice]

By Sir William Bull, M.P.

"I have just said such a silly thing," it is alleged a well-known M.P., who is now a Peer, once remarked to Willie Peel. "Forgetting he was the son of his father, I said to Edward Gully, 'I firmly believe Lowther is the best Speaker we have ever had.'"

"If you go into Brooks's this afternoon you will probably meet one of the Brands," said Peel dryly.

Whether the present distinguished occupant of the Chair is or is not the best occupant it ever had can be partly solved by a perusal of this delightful volume. In 450 pages it is a Constitutional history from the year 1226 onwards, and a vast amount of careful research and reading must have gone to compile it; yet it is apparent all through that its publication will bring forth further facts which will make a second edition more complete in every way. It is curious to find on reading the book that as a rule the Speakers were not interesting characters. Some were great men, like Moore and Coke; but, as is pointed out, the tenure of the Chair was merely a passing incident, and had little to do with the work of their lives or their influence on their times. Hence we shall cull from this volume such occurrences as throw light on the institution rather than on the biographies of the Speakers.

Of all of them Mr. John Lane has only been able to collect portraits of eighty-one, and he pleads in his "note on the illustrations" for a Royal Commission on Historical Portraits on the same lines as the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts: "For I have abundant proof of surprising ignorance on the part of many owners of portraits of distinguished Englishmen, who neither know the names of the subjects of the portraits they possess nor those of the artists who painted them." The head of one notable house sent him three portraits of successive ancestors, each bearing the same Christian name, but which was which, and which was the man he wanted, he had to discover for himself. He gives other instances of indifference and ignorance which support the aims of the "Art Collectors' Protection Association."

The book is no dry-as-dust compilation, with a chapter devoted to each speaker, but a light and very readable account of Westminster and Parliament, and the influence the Speaker for the time being had upon the House of Commons. The scope of the work is described in the Preface, and even here out-of-the-way scraps of information are interjected. For instance, how many Londoners who think they know London are aware that there is a custom still annually observed of opening the gate leading from Dean's Yard into Great College Street on the first day of a new Session and no other? This practice, apparently far from being a mere police regulation of modern date, carries the mind back to that remote period when the Plantagenet Kings, in conjunction with the Abbots of Westminster and the Archbishop of Canterbury, watched with jealous care the growth of representative institutions. Mr. Lane's interesting note on the illustrations in the same way bring in odd bits of information. He refers to an artist, one John Michael Wright, as the only man he can recollect who was endowed with two Christian names in the seventeenth century, and notes that the present Mace has lost in weight since it left the silversmiths no less than twenty-three ounces.

The chapter dealing with the Genesis of Westminster is written in that light, sketchy style which reminds one of John Richard Green's stray study on "Lambeth and the Archbishops." We are told how the Church and the adjoining Abbey had much to do with the gradual evolution of the Mother of Parliaments. Thorny Island, on which Palace Hall and the Abbey stand, is clearly described from a topographical point of view.

The early speakers and their precursors are next dealt with; incidentally we are shown the gradual decline of the feudal aristocracy of the Norman Conquest, and the expulsion of foreigners which enabled the great Simon de Montfort (whose shield, a double-tailed lion, is reproduced on the cover of the volume) to realise his dream of "England for the English." Thus we see that the Alien Immigration Question is not an affair of yesterday. In 1304-5 the Irish question had apparently commenced to loom on the political horizon, and it is interesting to learn in these days of would-be Separation that two natives of the sister Isle actually petitioned the King to be placed under English rule.

The exhaustion of the English nobility owing to the Wars of the Roses caused an increase in the representatives of the upper middle-classes in the House of Commons, but for a period, perhaps naturally, the House became more subservient to the Crown under the House of York. The thirty-three Speakers who sat under the Tudors saw further restrictions of the power of the House of Commons; whilst the power of the Privy Council increased. A reference to the Speakership of Sir Reginald Bray brings out the fact that he was not, as is generally supposed, the architect of Henry VII. Chapel; and Mr. Dasent gives an appreciative criticism of the present Houses of Parliament. From investigations recently made we found that eighty-one Members of the Long family had sat as Knights of the Shire. Mr. Dasent records that a Lowther sat as M.P. for Westminster exactly 600 years before a Member of the same ancient Northern family was raised to the Chair in 1905. In 1362 the King's Speech was first delivered in English, though for long afterwards the records continued to be kept in Norman French. The first portrait of a Speaker given is that of Sir Thomas Hungerford (1376-7), who made what was then a daring speech to the Throne at the close of the Session, calling the King's attention to various grievances and alleged infringements of the liberties of his subjects, both male and female. Henry IV. set a precedent which has never since been observed, when in 1492 he invited the Commons to dine with him at the close of the Session.

* The Speakers of the House of Commons from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, with a Topographical Description of Westminster at Various Epochs and a Brief Record of the Principal Constitutional Changes during Seven Centuries. By Arthur Irwin Dasent. With Notes on the Illustrations by John Lane, and a Portrait of every Speaker where one is known to exist. (John Lane. 21s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In his sixth chapter the author deals with the new and aggressive spirit which showed itself early in the reign of James II., and increased until the Stuarts were driven from power. In the reign of Charles I. it was decided that "from this time forth the history of England should be written at the Table of the House of Commons," and from time to time Mr. Dasent refers to the various clerks and clerks-assistant of note. An interesting account is given of a deadlock between the two Houses in June, 1628, over a Bill of Subsidies. The Lords finally passed the Bill as it stood, whereupon the Commons sent them a message, which concluded by saying, "that they will always endeavour to continue a good correspondency with their lordships, knowing well that the good concurrence between the two Houses is the very heartstring of the Commonwealth, and they shall be ever as jealous of their lordships' privileges as of their own rights."

Several pages are devoted to Lenthall. John Foster called him weak and commonplace, whilst, in the opinion of the compiler, the late Charles Townsend overstates the case when he calls Lenthall a poor creature, the tame instrument of a worse and more vulgar tyranny, the buffeted tool of the Army and the Rump. No man who presided so long over so difficult an Assembly in such momentous times can have been aught but a man of uncommon form of character. As the author points out, in the case of an office like that of the Speaker, there can be no posthumous fame without contemporary appreciation. And this, notwithstanding the adverse opinions quoted above, was accorded to the presiding genius of the Long Parliament to an extent unparalleled in the previous history of the Chair.

The oft-told story of the impeachment of the five members is graphically described. Leave was given to the accused to withdraw; but they had barely quitted the House and reached the boats which lay in the river at Westminster stairs when a loud knock on the door announced the entrance of the only King of England who had ever penetrated into the House of Commons in session. Rushworth's (the clerk-assistant) notes are fully inserted, the author remarking that it is fortunate for posterity that he disregarded the condition of his appointment on April 25th, 1640—viz., that he should not take any notes, but only the orders and reports made in the House.

Two ex-Speakers died on the same day in the persons of Dudley and Empson, they having expiated their crimes on Tower-hill. The nearest parallels were when Chaloner Chute and Lisleburne Long died within a month of each other, and when Speaker Cornwall expired within twenty-four hours of his old antagonist, Fletcher Norton. Some amusing records of payments of members occur in the fifteenth century, as when John Strange entered into an agreement with the Bailiffs of Dunwich to give his attendance at Westminster in return "for a cade of full herring, whether the House holds long time or short." Weymouth secured a member for five hundred mackerel, whilst Ipswich allowed William Worsop, in 1462, 5s. per week, and a blackleg, in the person of John Walworth, the junior member, agreed to "do the job" for 3s. 6d. In Elizabeth's reign the House was called over at the opening of every session, and members in their places answered to their names; there seems always, however, to have been a difficulty in securing regular and constant attendance—even such expedients as forcibly locking the doors until the business of the day was done does not appear to have been effective or satisfactory. Parliament sometimes did not meet for long intervals. It was seven years after the previous one had come to an end that the great Sir Thomas Moore, the first layman with one exception to be Chancellor of England, was chosen as speaker.

A witty saying, recorded by Bacon of Sir John Popham, Speaker from 1580 to 1583, might be repeated to-day. The Commons had sat a long time without achieving much in the way of legislation, and when Queen Elizabeth asked him: "What hath passed in the House, Mr. Speaker?" he made answer, "May it please your Majesty, seven weeks." Spencer Croke was responsible for the introduction of several orders for the convenience of members. They were forbidden to come into the House with spurs; a similar restriction was sought to be imposed on rapiers, but it would seem that the red lines which still appear in the druggett were needed much later to prevent members in the heat of debate from lunging at each other.

AN OXFORD POEM BY HENRY VAUGHAN—I.

By Louise Imogen Guiney.

Some octosyllabic iambics, bearing the dedicatory title, "To My Ingenuous Friend, R. W.," stand first, by Henry Vaughan's own arrangement, in his first book, printed by Badger, "under St. Dunstan's Church in Fleet-street," 1646. As the poem is not eminent in point of quality in that promising but heterogeneous collection, it may have been set to stand in the forefront of the little octavo (now excessively rare), simply to mark it as first in point of time. There are many considerations which incline one to accept it as appertaining to the year 1640. Like most things of Vaughan's writing, these quick-moving lines take a deal of reading, but they do not fail to reward it.

To my Ingenuous Friend, R. W.

When we are dead, and now no more
Our harmless mirth, our wit, and score
Distracts the town; when all is spent
That the base niggard world hath lent
Thy purse, or mine; when the loath'd noise
Of drawers, 'prentices and boys
Hath left us, and the clamorous bar
Items no pints in the Moon or Star;
When no calm whisperers wait the doors
To fright us with forgotten scores,
And such aged long bills carry
As might start an antiquary;
When the sad tumults of the maze, (1)
Arrests, suits, and the dreadful face
Of sergeants are not seen, and we
No lawyers' ruffs (2), or gowns must fee:
When all these mulcts are paid, and I
From thee, dear wit, must part, and die,
We'll beg the world would be so kind
To give 's one grave as we'd one mind.

There (as the wiser few suspect
That spirits after death affect)
Our souls shall meet, and thence will they,
Freed from the tyranny of clay,

(1) So in all editions, ancient and modern. "Mace" is suggested as the correct reading.

(2) Lawyers retained the Elizabethan ruff long after others had laid them by. It was a professional appanage.

At which I 'gan to quarrell, till a neat Man in a ruff (whom therefore I did take For barrister) opened his mouth and spake.
—Cowley's Poeticall Revenge.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

With equal wings, and ancient love
Into the Elysian Fields remove,
Where in those blessed walks they'll find
More of thy genius, and my mind.

First, in the shade of his own bays,
Great Ben they'll see, whose sacred lays
The learned ghosts admire, and throng
To catch the subject of his song.
Then Randolph in those holy meads
His "Lovers" and "Amyntas" reads,
Whilst his Nightingale, close by,
Sings his and her own elegy.
From thence dismiss'd, by subtle roads,
Through airy paths and sad abodes, (3)
They'll come into the drowsy fields
Of Lethe, which such virtue yields,
That if what poets sing be true,
The streams all sorrow can subdue.
Here, on a silent shady green,
The souls of lovers oft are seen,
Who, in their life's unhappy space,
Were murder'd by some perjur'd face.
All these th' enchanted streams frequent
To drown their cares and discontent,
That th' inconstant, cruel sex
Might not in death their spirits vex.

And here our souls, big with delight
Of their new state, will cease their flight:
And now the last thoughts will appear,
They'll have of us, or any here (4);
But on those flowery banks will (5) stay,
And drink all sense and cares away.
So that they did of these (6) discuss,
Shall find their fables true in us.

May not the first part of this poem be something more than an exercise of mere imagination? Is it rash to suspect that it contains a reflection of Oxford manners and customs before the Laudian reform had had time to pacify it wholly from its mediæval turbulence, before the Civil Wars had blocked the progress of ideas already operative in Vaughan's time and operative since? Assume that much, and the curtain rises, as it were, on Henry Vaughan in what he calls "his fierce wild blood," the "confusions of a wasted youth." He is not curled up on the Elizabethan sill of his College room, reading Aristotle. He is in a local tavern, having a beautiful time with "royal witty sack, the poet's soul," and with a young gentleman whose enjoyments and difficulties are akin to his own.

There is ample contemporary evidence to show us the free, tippling, roystering life of the place and period. One or two extracts may suffice. Wood, in his "History," speaking of the years 1638-39, has this to say: "The Schollers were hunted out of alehouses and taverns by the Vice-Chancellors and Proctors constant walking." One Proctor, in particular, who in this matter "had been very strict in his office, having been much press'd by admonitions from the Chancellor," had the piper to pay. "He received great affronts and abuses, both by hissing and hooting at him in St. Maries chancell when hee made his farewell speech (7), and in flinging stones at him on his returne thence to his Colledge." Cleveland, an Oxford man, has some couplets on Sandbourne, the city "shrief," and on the "mad youngsters" who committed depredations on his cellars.

He never had complained had it bin
A petty Firkin, or a Kilderkin (8).
But when a Barrell dayly is drawne out,
My Masters, then 'tis time to looke about!
Is this a lye, trow ye? I tell you No:
My Lord High Chancellour was inform'd so.

Not a few of the old inns so much frequented by the roving gentry of the Colleges still survive, though some, like the "Clarendon," have changed their names. Mr. Chambers, in his edition of Vaughan, has an excellent note on this R.W. poem to the effect that "the Moon or Star" points to the name of a room in an inn rather than to the inn itself; and he quotes from "Henry IV." the familiar "Anon, anon, Sir! Score a pint of bastard in the Half-moon." But he might have gone farther, for to this day the large rooms on the first floor of the Clarendon Hotel at Oxford are known and are marked as "The Moon" and "The Star," even as they were three centuries ago. Vaughan's "calm whisperers," that is, creditors, with their servile importunities pressed at the best possible moment, the moment of relaxation and of induced good-nature, look singularly life-like, and much of a piece with the duns at Cambridge, who worried Randolph to good poetic purpose. "Tumults of the maze" is a sad misprint, quite meaningless, and never corrected: it may have done much to obscure the psychology of Vaughan's little epistle to his friend. But "tumults of the mace" are highly comprehensible in either the Chancellor's Court or the Mayor's, as are "arrests, suits, and the dreadful face of sergeants," the latter standing for the servants of the Court; or Sergeants of the Mace, familiarly called catchpoles, whose especial business it was to arrest for debt. By a statute of the University, far older than those of the Laudian reform, and still in force, misbehaving undergraduates outside College precincts were subject to the jurisdiction of the City authorities; but any suit in which a member of the University was a party (unless a case of mayhem, or a major crime, such as treason), could be taken out of the City Court, and tried before that of the University. In either case the defendant was bound to pay the expense of counsel and costs. How categorically the young Vaughan goes into these horrid potential menaces and mishaps, all due to hearing the chimes at midnight in a pleasant place with Master Shallow!

But there is something else in this little poem more striking than the transient reflection of Oxford in its Carolian wildness. It conjures up an exquisite picture in flat diaphanous colours like those of Puvis de Chavannes, of the farther side of the Great Ferry, where the claws of paternalism are sheathed, and a supernatural go-as-you-please reigns supreme. There the two friends will be so happy together that all men shall see in them the blessedness of a blessed state foretold by "the ancients."

Here we come directly upon the conceptions of Homer, Hesiod, Plato, Euripides, Pindar, and pretty much everybody, in regard to Elysium; very notably upon the latter part of the great Sixth Book of the Æneid, which Vaughan has specially in mind. He fastens eagerly upon one feature of the triune other-world upon which the primitive religions

(3) "Airy paths" is in Denham's "Cooper's Hill," 1641. Vaughan's line is much in the manner of Milton's "Penseroso."

(4) "They" seems to refer to "souls," though the statement is somewhat obscure. If "they" be "our souls," then "us . . . here" must mean bodies, described as left behind in the grave.

(5) The original "will" is so awkward that it tempts one to think "we'll" or "they'll" must have been Vaughan's word; yet "will" in the third line preceding gives the second "will" some grammatical if not artistic relation to the context.

(6) "These," the legendary "lovers" aforesaid, predecessors, not prototypes of "us."

(7) At Commemoration, St. Mary-the-Virgin's having been used for the Acts until the Sheldonian was built, temp. Charles II.

(8) The half-barrel cask. Often in old times written "kinderkin."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

and classic paganism have laid more emphasis than Christianity has so far done: the renewal, that is, under immortal conditions, of the earth itself, "this too-much-loved earth," as Sidney winningly calls it. It is plain to any thoughtful reader how the theory took hold on English men of letters, in that day so especially open to all manner of idealism. It is in Randolph, in the very poem, "On the Death of a Nightingale," which Vaughan mentions. "Goe, solitary wood!" he cries; and he adjures it to go, in order that it may rise and spread again where the dead bird may resume her singing:—

> That soule is fled, and to Elisium gone,
> Thou, a poore desart, left: goe then, and run!
> Beg there to want a grove; and if she please
> To sing agen beneath thy shadowy trees,
> The soules of happy lovers crown'd with blisses
> Shall flocke about thee, and keep tyme with kisses.

Habington has a touch of it, in a poem to Castara (the first part, 1640), which describes the charms in "early Spring" of Hindlip's "private cell;" in this he calls forth, to adorn its green recesses, nymphs and satyrs, Daphne and Narcissus, the same rout of poetic beings who figure in Vaughan's imaginings. And Habington ends, comparing himself and his love with the happy myths of a bygone literature:—

> Soe they whose wisdome did discusse
> Of these as fictions, shall in us
> Finde they were more than fabulous.

These lines Vaughan, already a "learned Plagiary," reproduces almost verbatim in his closing couplet. The clear and "chilly" star (the second adjective is Professor Saintsbury's) of William Habington had only just arisen upon the horizon, when the nineteen-year-old Silurist paid it the homage of imitation. He thus took in at once an influence destined to go far with him and to last long, the influence of the purest love-poet of that generation.

NATURE'S PRIEST

A WELL-REMEMBERED figure of the days of our childhood was an old postman. He was a countryman of the pre-Education Act period. His ideas were not moulded by school standards, but evolved from the man's inner consciousness. When he passed by the house on the other side we reviled him; on the rare occasions when he left a letter inscribed with our own name, and bearing the good Saxon designation "Master," we hailed him as a hero. The man had a rough-hewn philosophy of his own. "We can't look back into futurity," he used to say, and the phrase grew into a sort of household word.

There is a latent force about the paradox which makes it worth saving from oblivion. The dreams of boyhood are prophetic of the man; modern evolutionary theories are but a new statement of the ancient dogma of reincarnation. We are all Pythagoreans nowadays. Day by day we unconsciously reiterate the cunning of beings whose antiquity is so stupendous that the mind fails to grasp its significance. The savage is perennial in each generation of the "human boy." When the "six-years' darling of a pigmy size" lisps in appreciation of a nursery legend that it is "as bluggy as anything," the primitive instinct of the head-hunter is stirring within him. He has thrown back to the man-wolf, who skulked in reed and woodland, and sprang upon his prey exultant. To-day we bury a box of coins beneath a foundation-stone, but our ancestors buried a live man or child. He was doubtlsse looked upon as a namby-pamby sentimentalist who first suggested putting an image in place of the living victim; nevertheless his argument prevailed. We are told that at Heliopolis until the reign of Amasis three men were daily sacrificed at the temple of the gods. Amasis substituted the burning of three candles on the altar. In St. Osyth's Priory, Essex, a candle was discovered built into the walls. To-day when we launch a ship we break a bottle of wine at the prow, and we are but following in the footsteps of our forefathers, who, instead of the neck of a bottle, broke the neck of a slave. Life and light were the sacred symbols, the unknown elements, the unfathomable mysteries of all pristine races; they are the same to us. We experiment, we build theories; of actual basic knowledge we have none.

Wordsworth wandered in that remote yet familiar land of conjecture when the inspiration of his wondrous ode fell upon him. It has been often asked if Wordsworth was veritably a Pythagorean. He was, even as we all are. Every child, the memory of our own childhood, what are they but guides in a twilit land? We see "as through a glass, darkly." The race of men resembles a sea, the waves of which tower high as mighty oceanic rollers, or sweep on as coast-nearing ground-swell, with crests unbroken. They are vehicles of force; they do not exhaust their initial energy in surf and foam, but travel, fulfilling their appointed function. They carry forward and pass on from crest to crest the impulsion of the wind that bloweth where it listeth, of the mysterious, incommunicable attraction of the sun and moon which we call tidal force. So it is in the storm-beaten sea of the human economy; each generation is a wave-crest, the symbol of a power that sweeps over sunken wrecks of human endeavour, over drowned lands of savage creed, over slow, upheaving coral reefs of thought and action. Human energy is plastic, not creative. Whatever its source and destiny, these are from without. "Man can half control his doom," sings Tennyson. The individual may mould his environment, and by so doing help to reshape the destiny of his race, but he will be for ever haunted with the ghost of those—himself or others—who have gone before. Who has not experienced the weird sensation of revisiting the glimpses of the moon, of seeing in manhood or womanhood some landscape which we last gazed on as a child? The flavour of an apple may recall the dim memory of a period of time years ago; the sound of a melody or of a peal of bells across the water often brings back to us a day not dead but sleeping. We were eight years old then; we had not learnt to see things as they are not. It is in such moods that the veracious message of the Ode is most real to us.

We no longer build up the quaint dogmas of the East and imagine the vagrant demon flitting uneasily from one animal habitat to another, in search of at-one-ment with the perennial calm, the ultima Thule of all being. The modern man talks of a destiny to be achieved by labour, exerted over protracted periods of effort. "Learn to labour and to wait" is his creed. Nature, effortless, moulds perfection, that toils not, neither does it spin. As materialism spreads its tentacles and seizes on human activities, so do the primal simplicities, in which all true strength is matured, wane, atrophy, and become a pale reflex of reality.

Conferences are held nowadays on Education. The principal aim of the expert appears to be to contrive somehow to get a quart of school lore into the pint-pot of the average scholar's capacity for learning. The result may be called "specialism" or a dozen other specious names; at any rate it is not education. The boy is taught to regard "sport" as a matter of primary importance. Yes, but what sport? The mere forcing of certain defined games on every boy and girl as part of the training and curriculum is to produce a crop of folk of whom it may be said, "I have thought some of Nature's journeymen had made men, and not made them well, they imitated humanity so abominably." If by "sport" be meant the keen instinct of knowledge of a countryside, in other words the savage intuition of the trapper and tracker, revived and trained to modern ends, no exception can be taken to it. It is for this reason that the Boy Scout movement is so entirely admirable. The English public school boy is mostly a blasé adept at cricket or football. As compulsory, the games have lost their meaning and real value. In his next stage he too often lounges, a cigarette-whiffing spectator of football and cricket matches. He shoots, fishes, or plays golf, rather because they are spectacular amusements than because they appeal to him with any vital interest. They are the thing to do; he follows in the ruck. Nothing matters, nothing goes beyond convention and the outward form of things.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The day is not far distant when young Englishmen of the moneyed class will, as a regular part of their upbringing, spend a year of training-time, under proper control and discipline, in some colony, amid wide spaces and primitive conditions. Then we shall once more have a revival of the arts and of literature. Materialism and conventionality are the deadly foes, simplicity and vision the nurses and guardian angels, of all that lifts a nation to the plane in which noble thoughts become clothed in their appropriate garb. Great ideals breed grand diction. As Sir Francis Palgrave has truly said: "Without attempting discussion on the motive causes of Scott, Wordsworth, Shelley, and others, we may observe that these poets carried to further perfection the later tendencies of the century preceding, in simplicity of narrative, reverence of human passion and character in every sphere, and love of Nature for herself."

For them these were rungs of the ladder of undying fame. Can it be truly said that the desire so to climb is the ideal held up to scholars in any considerable proportion of our public schools?

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

VI.—SPRING JOURNALISM

One of the reasons why our popular newspapers are so monotonous is that they take no real account of the seasons. They do not reflect the glad unrest of Spring, the lavish fulfilment of Summer. They always appear to have been written by disillusioned business-men, whose style smells of faded poppies, forgotten among the autumnal stubble. The writers of leading articles show no disposition to frolic in the Spring, and in this—if leading articles are indeed written by human beings—they do wrong to their natures. For the man who can arrange his words in sounding periods during these first delightful blue days is capable of worse crimes than split infinitives. This is the season of the year when the yew peacocks in our gardens thrust out green branches and look for a moment like trees; and in the same way the wise man will now permit his cultured phrases to burst their straight-waistcoats and look for a moment like words. It is true that we have laboured over them all the winter-time, and set them down one by one with pride in our pocket-books. But now, when Nature is out of breath with running and the marble-topped tables are sprouting like mushrooms on the pavements, they seem inadequate. Our wintry ingenuities will not suffice to express a tenth part of our spring-tide flood of emotions. Like a schoolboy leader in a paper-chase whose bag is stuffed with fragments of torn dictionaries, we wish to scatter our words by handfuls, imitating in our humble human way the careless profusion of Nature and Mr. Garvin.

Very few people realise how much easier it is for a writer to be wise than it is for him to be cheerful. To be wise in a journalistic sense all that is necessary is to stand a platitude on its head and appropriate the small change that drops out of its pockets. To be cheerful on paper is a harder matter, for it demands either an extraordinary ignorance or an extraordinary knowledge of life. It is especially difficult to express this insane cheerfulness of Spring, for this is a lofty joy if you will, but it owes its position to the fact that it has clambered on the shoulders of sorrow. Like a child with toothache at its first pantomime, it laughs the louder because it is ever on the verge of tears. If you remember the Autumn, these young green buds are the saddest things on earth, for they, too, mark only another degree of decay. And yet, in spite of the fact that our new youth is the briefest of illusions, these are days when everything in the world that is not utterly broken and defeated claims happiness as a right; and as for all but the very greatest happiness is a confession of ignorance, it is inhuman to expect journalists to be wise on this earth new painted with tender blues and greens. In a month or two, when the children have picked all the primroses and the motor-cars have covered the hedgerows with dust, it will be possible, perhaps, if the roses are merciful and the strawberry-crop fails, to write about the weighty problems that do not really matter with a becoming gravity. But what manner of man can think of Tariff Reform in a wood paved with anemones?

This is by way of being an apology, for I would certainly have written an erudite and unreadable article on the proposed Flamandisation of the University of Ghent, if only the Spring had lingered a few more days on the way. I have discussed this important problem with a hundred persons; I have read a score of newspaper articles on the subject; I have the arguments and facts of both sides at my fingertips; but now that Spring is here I have an unreasonable desire to write about something else, if only the expression of pleased astonishment on the faces of babies under six months old who feel the warm sunshine for the first time. My notebook emphasises the change. A few days ago I was cynical enough to reflect that "to regret that the days of our thwarted and uncomfortable youth are over is the only consolation that old age affords." Yesterday, moved to sentiment by the generosity of the season, I noted that "if it be true that in our dying hour we live again all the pregnant moments of our life, that hour for me will be a lifetime long." Not only the mood, but, quite unconsciously, the style has altered. With the omission of one word the second reflection becomes three lines of intolerable blank verse. That is what the Spring does for journalists.

Nevertheless I might have succeeded in writing about the higher Flemish education if I had shut myself in a cellar instead of foolishly seeking out one of the most beautiful places near Brussels. At Boitsfort the forest begins, and there is a little lake there in whose waters you can see a drowned village with white walls and red roofs. I sat in the paved courtyard of a café at the water's-edge, and looked at the glorious duck-pond, and at the blues and purples of the forest beyond, and straightway forgot all about my stodgy article. My drowsy kingdom was shared by a thoughtful waiter, who was obviously under the influence of the sweet oppression of the afternoon, and fed the ducks with French bread to keep himself awake. Also there was a dog who brought an enormous piece of wood to my feet and asked me to throw it for him. The beam looked as if it weighed at least three pounds, and to have thrown it on to the cobbles would have been an act of sacrilege against the tranquillity of that peaceful place. But the dog had appealing eyes, so I tried to bribe him vainly with sugar. At last, after he had picked up the piece of wood and dropped it again three or four times to convey what he wanted to my obtuse intelligence, he carried it away in disgust. I hope he only thought that I was stupid, and not that I was unfriendly; but, unlike cats, dogs are not reliable in their reading of human motives. I would have liked at the moment to have apostrophised him after the unsophisticated manner of the Flemish school of fiction. "Oh! dog," I would have said, "I should very much like to serve you by throwing that great piece of wood that you carry so cleverly across the courtyard, but I will not try to conceal my fears from your moist and eloquent eyes. I am afraid of the reproaches of the waiter, roused abruptly from his hour-long dreams. I am afraid of the echoes which would fill my ears with the mortal anguish of the murdered silence, but most I am afraid of a small baby who has just been hushed to sleep with some difficulty behind that open window. Being a café dog, it is perhaps natural that you should not care for sugar. I have heard that the employés at the great whisky distilleries always get drunk on beer. But if you care to stay here with me I will tell you all I know about the proposed Flamandisation of the University of Ghent." Long before I had finished composing this address the dog was out of sight.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Before me on the table there lay some blank sheets of paper and an empty coffee-cup. I dipped my pen in the ink three times with enthusiasm, and then balanced it on the saucer. It occurred to me to speculate as to the sensations of a tree in the Spring. First, it seemed to me, it is woken from its winter sleep by a spirit of restlessness that by degrees takes the form of an intense irritation throughout the bark of the tree. I realised this stage so vividly that I know that old trees tell the young ones not to scratch. Afterwards the tree feels little threads of pain running through its channels, and these become more and more frequent, till the tree aches in every branch, and the image of each remotest twig is etched on the consciousness of the tree by suffering. Then, slowly at first, but afterwards quicker and quicker, each breaking bud brings relief, till long before the last bud has popped the whole tree is singing with pride of its great achievement. Some trees look upon their leaves as umbrellas, some as hats, and some as wearing apparel. It seemed to me that it would be a breach of manners to mention the Winter in the hearing of this last kind of tree.

But still the paper was blank and white; still my great article on the proposed Flamandisation of the University of Ghent remained unwritten.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

TRAVELLING PICTURES

BY W. H. KOEBEL

MEDITATION, perhaps, has never found a more unsuitable home than the bustle of a railway terminus. Yet there was fruit for the mood awaiting me even at Waterloo, within a compartment, moreover, that a few minutes would see speeding on its way to the red soil of Devon.

The first conceiver of the picture galleries beneath the racks "for light luggage only" has missed fame. To the general public, I fear, his very name is unknown. Yet his image should stand upon a pedestal. I would not place him on one that rivalled Stevenson's in height, yet his shaft of honour should be sufficiently lofty. It is possible that this inventor of a new art had in his mind nothing beyond the towns and neighbourhoods the photographs of which now confront the traveller. If so he had not foreseen the revolution in the atmosphere of the railway carriage. Granted even this, there is no reason why the mere fact of restricted intention should create a bar to celebrity; the discovery of steam itself was a side issue emanating from the desire for hot water.

The pictures are pretty things. They stand boldly out from the partition, illustrating the possibilities of a brighter world. It is true that the tenets of their conception are rigid, for the adamantine regularity of their school permits no elasticity. It is apparently essential here that a coloured landscape should be topped by a blue sky. Not that the azure of these seaside heavens is necessarily unbroken. Upon the face of some float small white clouds. But the pleasant fleeces obscure nothing; their white flakiness adds lustre to the blue, that is all.

It is the introduction of this texture of the orthodox consistency of an angel's wing that yields the keynote to the policy of these travelling rows of pictures. They would seem to have made a compact amongst themselves that each should show a brave face to the world. No greyness, save in rock or stone; not an inch of gloom in a dozen towns, hills, rivers, and seas—the pleasant scenes depict the cream of landscape and weather, skimmed from many a county to hang side by side within a single railway compartment.

There is little use in mincing matters. These pictures are optimists. Far be it from me to cast an undeserved slur upon their veracity, since how could I then continue to face the undisturbed serenity of their gaze! They represent the land of the tourist as the tourist likes to see it, and as it does, indeed, from time to time present itself to the city dweller on his wanderings. Parades and beaches thronged with people, Italian-hued house fronts, rich yellow sands, white-edged waves, and gleaming sails will stare out from their frame rather to the detriment of a neighbouring scene of romance and comparative solitude in which predominate soft greens and broad bands of shade—a spot in which it is admitted that man alone is vile, since no more than a single human figure is permitted in the foreground.

There is perhaps a want of subtlety in the ubiquitous smile of land and sea. It is even to be feared that its determined cheeriness exists at the expense of the finer shades and beauties. But the effect need not lie heavily upon the artist's conscience, supposing him to be possessed of so uncomfortable an asset. His case is only parallel with that of his brother photographer who deals in human faces. The rare photographic countenance that is depicted without an upward curling of the lips is the property of a strong-minded and obstinate person!

These landscapes strive in similar fashion after a truly popular expression. But they are more than mere triumphs in tinted photography. They are powerful agents, workers of great results. Enter a train from the most squalid of platforms, and you will have stepped into another world as soon as the threshold is passed! You may traverse the heart of a sordid town; you may glide past squalor, mean streets, and, in fact, through a whole series of gloomy panorama. All this does not matter. There hangs the picture, directly opposite, the bright promise of what lies at the end of the journey. What pegs upon which to hang parables, and homilies on the vicissitudes of human life! Nevertheless, such parallels must be toyed with gently; if carried too far, they are certain to end in the discomfiture of their maker. For the promise may, or may not, be kept. It depends on the weather. It may be necessary, too, for the traveller to descend long before these fair havens are reached, in which case it may occur that the promise rolls onwards to waste its sweetness on an empty compartment—a situation from which it is difficult to extract a moral.

So much from the passengers' point of view. But there is another, quite as important—that of the train itself. The pictures have warmed many an old carriage to fresh life. They are, in fact, the romance of the compartment, representing to it that which does many a flower to a man—and the metaphor gains with their fading. They are the reminiscences of the train, memories that have lent it a tongue. It is possible that the tales it tells are a trifle coloured, like those concerning all good things. In crowded cities its eloquence reaches a climax. Once amidst the pictured areas themselves it becomes mute, and forgotten. Then, neither the memories nor the pictures matter.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

FRANCE FROM TWO POINTS OF VIEW*

In spite of his second Christian name, Mr. Jean Charlemagne Bracq is a perfervid Republican, whereas the Marquis (Antoine) de Castellane can only be described as a Royalist bereft of his illusions. It follows that we here have two books of very different character. M. de Castellane's volume, moreover, is chiefly one of personal reminiscences, often set down, apparently, soon after the incidents or contests in which he was concerned. Mr. Bracq, for his part, has indited his book (which, as it is a Republican work, we are surprised to see bound in Royal blue, decorated with the fleurs-de-lys of the old Monarchy) in the serene atmosphere of Vassar College, U.S.A., where he officiates as Professor of Romance Languages. One hundred and twelve years have now elapsed since Thomas Campbell wrote, in "The Pleasures of Hope," "'Tis distance lends enchantment to the view;" but the saying is as true to-day as it was then, and to Mr. Bracq, gazing across the wide Atlantic, the Third French Republic appears to be robed in the most azure and most roseate of hues. He does not detect a single shadow, a single dark patch, a speck even; he holds, as Dr. Pangloss would have held, that everything is for the very best in the very best of Republics, and that there never was so beautiful and so wonderful a régime as that with which France has been blessed since September, 1870.

In proof thereof Mr. Bracq bombards us with long lists of its achievements, statistics galore, and strings of famous names, the names of men whose work, we are given to understand, is inseparable from the Republic. Unfortunately Mr. Bracq greatly overstates his case, as may be shown by just a few examples out of the many which might be quoted. For instance, we take a list of painters and find in it such names as Meissonier, Baudry, Rosa Bonheur, Jules Breton and Protais, whom Mr. Bracq numbers among the great artists of the Republic, whereas they were merely survivals of the Second Empire. "What," exclaims Mr. Bracq enthusiastically, "can the Napoleonic régime oppose to the engravings of Léopold Flameng?" Well, as a matter of fact, Flameng, born in 1831 at Brussels, acquired his art and executed a good deal of his best work under the régime in question. Again, Carpeaux, who died in 1875, should not be included in a list of the representative sculptors of the Third Republic. Even his famous group of "La Danse" for the Paris Opera-house was actually modelled before the collapse of the Second Empire.

If we next turn to musicians, we find Mr. Bracq including Gounod in one of his lists—Gounod whose "Faust" was originally produced as far back as 1859, whilst his "Roméo et Juliette" dates from 1867! Again, Pasteur—the frequent guest of Napoleon III. at the Tuileries and Compiègne—did most of his scientific work under the Empire, though the "hydrophobia cure" belongs, of course, to the present Republic. Mr. Bracq also makes mistakes in dealing with literary men, many of those whom he mentions being purely and simply survivals of Imperial times, whilst others had at least started on their careers and made considerable progress in them before the war of 1870. The fact is, and historians will ultimately recognise it, that the much-abused Second Empire bequeathed to the Third Republic a great crop of young but already ripening talent, by which the latter régime has since profited.

At the same time we are well aware that France has progressed in many ways since the Republic was established, and the information which Mr. Bracq supplies on such matters as education and social reform is important and interesting. Everything must not be judged by statistics, however; and on glancing at those which apply to the colonial expansion of France we are reminded of all the literature which appeared in Paris last autumn on the subject of the unsatisfactory situation prevailing in many French colonies and protectorates, notably those of Indo-China.

The latter part of Mr. Bracq's book is devoted to an examination of religious questions, the separation of Church and State, the teaching of religion and morality in French schools, and the present position of French Protestantism, to which, by the way, Mr. Bracq belongs. It seems to us that he writes very fairly and sanely on all these matters; and we are sorry that, in other parts of his book, he has occasionally compromised a very good case by foolish exaggeration.

The translation of M. de Castellane's reminiscences is by Mr. Alexander Teixeira de Mattos, who has done his work so well that this English version is as racy and as pleasant to read as the original. We remember M. de Castellane (whom we often met when he was Secretary to the National Assembly of 1871-76) as a gentleman of strong prejudices and a somewhat sarcastic bent, both of which characteristics are apparent in this book of his. It is written also with extreme frankness, and among the information it contains—information invariably conveyed in the lightest and airiest of manners—one often finds some statement of first-class importance in respect to contemporary French history. The many celebrities appearing in M. de Castellane's pages include Napoleon III., the Empress Eugénie, the Empress Augusta, the Count de Chambord, the Duc d'Aumale, Talleyrand, Montalembert, Falloux, Abbé Liszt, Bishop Dupanloup, General Changarnier, Marshal MacMahon, General Trochu, General Chanzy, Gambetta, Jules Favre, and Thiers; and respecting these and others (notably quite a number of great ladies and several notorieties of the demi-monde) our author supplies many out-of-the-way and, now and again, highly amusing particulars. He is sometimes unjust (occasionally very unjust indeed), sometimes indiscreet, and sometimes also mistaken, but the Talleyrand strain in his nature prevents him from ever being dull.

The extracts from the Marquis's note-books during the latter part of the Franco-German War give a good idea of a soldier's feelings at that grim period. Although he was a Royalist and a Catholic, he rightly admired the patriotic energy of Gambetta. Later, however, he was one of those who hoped to overthrow the Republic so dear to Mr. Jean Charlemagne Bracq, and to restore the Count de Chambord to his ancestral throne by the style and title of Henry V., King of France and Navarre. The story of that famous intrigue is told by M. de Castellane with mingled vivacity and regretfulness. We doubt if it could have succeeded at any time without provoking civil war. The Republic prevailed because, as Thiers rightly said, it was the form of government which divided Frenchmen the least. But whatever chances the Count de Chambord may at one moment have possessed, were destroyed by the obstinacy with which he refused to give any "constitutional guarantees

* France under the Republic. By Jean Charlemagne Bracq, Litt.D. (T. Werner Laurie. 7s. 6d. net.)

Men and Things of My Time. By the Marquis de Castellane. Illustrated. (Chatto and Windus. 6s. net.)

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

prior to restoration," and his determination to impose the white flag of his house on the French army and people. "If there is any attempt to impose that flag on our soldiers, the chassepots," said Marshal MacMahon, "will go off of their own accord." No such attempt took place, as, on finding their Prince so intractable, the bulk of the French Royalists made no further efforts in his favour. M. de Castellane's book ends in a very pessimistic strain, which, in its way, is as exaggerated as the extreme optimism of Mr. Bracq. Both volumes have serviceable indexes, and the Marquis de Castellane's work is illustrated with a number of capital portraits.

THE MAGAZINES

One would scarcely expect a display of humour, conscious or unconscious, in so sober a quarterly as the Hibbert Journal. It is only further evidence of the fact that the world so brims with humour that it will out, unconsciously if not consciously. The opening article is a most interesting fragment of the late Count Tolstoy's writings, and is entitled "Philosophy and Religion." It is but short, yet in its space it touches with a firm hand on the prime fault of most modern thinking—the refusal to give the proper place and importance to certain unproveable instincts of the soul, in the light of which instincts all subsequent facts have their value. The things which these instincts attest can never be induced, and all mere phenomena have a detached and unrelated existence, being therefore worthless for thinking, without the lustre shed by them. Or, to put it in Tolstoy's own words: "Each man within himself is conscious of a knowledge quite distinct from reasoned knowledge, and independent of the endless chain of cause and effect. This knowledge is his knowledge of his spiritual Ego;" implying, as he puts it elsewhere in his article, a conviction of "something indefinable, and that is our soul and God." The article is, in fact, a characteristic and important appeal against the prostration of the intellect of man before the limitations of a posteriori thinking. It is a vital appeal for faith, faith being interpreted not as an intellectual acceptation of theological dogma, but a trustful acceptation of certain primary instincts. Its closing passage is: "So that the learned philosopher confined within the endless chain of cause and effect, who does not acknowledge a religious basis, is inevitably forced to seek for an imaginary and impossible cause of all causes, and has faith in it; and consequently, in contrast to the scientific philosopher, possesses a firm understanding of life and a sound guidance for his actions."

Having concluded thus, we turn the page and greet the following title: "Can Theology become Scientific?" by M. M. Pattison Muir, M.A. The vigour of opposition can only be healthy, and it is the fault of most journals that they do not seek its vitalising atmosphere. Yet, with every faith in opposition, this juxtaposition is certainly unhappy. Mr. Muir's article is, in direct contradistinction to Tolstoy's, an appeal to carry the a posteriori process of thought into the religious field. A qualification of this remark is owing to Mr. Muir, and that is, that the induction would proceed from certain religious phenomena—in other words, that it would accept as data certain facts that can only have a spiritual significance, and which the scientist, strictly so-called, would not accept. Nevertheless, he does not make this quite clear. Professor Gardner has an important article on "The Subconscious and the Superconscious"—more important than at first it appears to be, because he does bring out into the necessary relief just those passages he would desire to emphasise. Its purport is to divide the realm of consciousness into the subconscious, the conscious, and the superconscious, to which he would adapt Matthew Arnold's division of the Barbaric, the Hellenic, and the Hebraic. The value of the article is rather in the stubborn canvassing of one's thought it causes than in its permanent contribution to the body of thought. And there is always the suspicion that the analysis is, after all, only academic, for it fails to account for the irrefragable fact that a "sunset-touch, a fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death, a chorus-ending from Euripides," to say nothing of a bird's song, a child's face, or Gothic architecture, inevitably raise thoughts of divinity and eternity. Professor Smith gives an instance into what a ponderous and extraordinary labyrinth so simple a subject as Judas Iscariot can be twisted. There is a very excellent article on "Water-finding and Faith-healing," by Dr. Hovenden.

In the Nineteenth Century Professor Morgan deals, with a rarely estimable judicial poise on so polemical a subject, with "The Constitutional Revolution." While his sympathies are quite against an Upper Chamber composed on its present hereditary basis, he nevertheless makes it clear that the claim of privilege as put up by officialdom in (and out of) the House of Commons has, in his opinion, as little to commend it as any other form of privilege. The argument that privilege, entrenched in its strong position, may thereupon turn and defy public opinion and public desire is one that certainly does not exclude a Front Bench in the House of Commons. Mr. Harold F. Wyatt has an injudicious article entitled "God's Test by War." It is true that in the present glorification of peace many mental and moral attributes are apt to be forgotten that are bred, if not by war, at least by a warlike spirit, and that much of present solicitation for peace at the knees of foreign Powers is most unmoral and pusillanimous whinneying; but that is not all. And a man who makes use of the Deity's Name at the head of his article awakens suspicion by that very fact. To talk of "that which God has given for the trial of peoples—the test of war," is not only to beg the question, it is to deny the inception of Christianity.

Mr. W. S. Lilly, in "Some Notes on Chateaubriand," and Professor Tyrrell, in the first of a series of articles on "Our Debt to Latin Poetry as distinguished from Greek," deal competently and completely with subjects of literary interest, while Bishop Welldon writes about "The Making of the Authorised Version." Quite the most admirable article in Blackwood's is "Damascus," by Gertrude Lowthian Bell: it recalls the Biblical cadence in its style with charming lack of affectation, and is graphic and beautiful in its total effect. In the same Magazine Mr. Noyes continues his "Tales of the Mermaid Tavern," which grow more diffuse in matter and manner with each instalment, despite their vigour. In the Cornhill Mr. A. C. Benson writes on Frederic Myers. It is not critical, but biographical and personal. Other articles worthy of note are "Telling the Bees," by Sir Laurence Gomme, and "The Meaning of Death," by Julian S. Huxley. This latter, despite its too technical treatment and arid style, does indeed come near to the mystery of death at times.

The Fortnightly Review is headed by a series of poems by Thomas Hardy, entitled "Satires of Circumstance." They are characteristic enough, and their title is indicative of their contents. He picks out a dozen episodes and turns them into verses of a couple of stanzas apiece. They are bitter and shrewdly cynical. Mr. Hardy is not to be envied the world he lives in; it bears little resemblance to the world we know, despite its sorrows and tears. In the same Review we miss this month the usual contribution by Mr. Garvin, and find one on "National Conservatism" instead, signed "Emanon." Mr Laurence Irving deals with "The Plight of the Serious Drama," not very deeply nor determinedly; and Dr. Rappoport with "The Russian Duma and the Emancipation of the Jews." It is a pity to see such a Review so weak in articles of literary criticism and of permanent interest.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The English Review perhaps hardly touches its highest level, as far as the articles are concerned, this month. As to poetry, Stephen Phillips appears with a sonnet on Shakespeare, and Richard Middleton has a poem, entitled "Queen Melanie and the Wood-boy," which treats a very pretty theme in a dainty and very pleasing manner. Probably the article of most interest is that by Mr. Scott-James, entitled "Chance and the Change"—though precisely what purpose, other than alliterative, the word "chance" serves it is difficult to say. It deals with the change that is passing over the history of the English novel, and its indication to life, but it misses some of the strangest elements in it. He also makes a bad faux pas in speaking of the Rev. Mr. Philip Gosse. An article of quite excellent interest is that by W. H. George on "Some Dramatic Criteria." But that which lives most strangely in the memory is one we should scarcely have expected to find here. It is entitled "The Stomach Pump," and signed, appropriately enough, E. U. Pepsia. It had better be read to be profited by.

Unpretentious though The Open Window may be in point of size, through it we can behold many a pleasant prospect. We are beginning to look for the appearance of this little monthly with great pleasure, for nothing poor in literary value ever disgraces its columns, and occasionally we find a memorable poem, article, or story. We note that Volume I. is just ready, and its list of contributors ensures it a welcome.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE NEW TREATY WITH JAPAN

By Lancelot Lawton

In the comments of the daily press the real significance to be attached to the new commercial Treaty just concluded between Great Britain and Japan appears to have been entirely overlooked. It has been generally represented that the relief in the statutory tariff conceded in our favour is the outcome solely of friendly sentiment arising from the Alliance. Doubtless there is some truth in this assertion; but we must seek elsewhere to find the true motive that has induced the Tokyo Government to pursue so obliging a policy. As a matter of fact, ever since the Manchurian campaign Japan's finances have bordered on the precarious, and, in view of the possibility that further foreign loans may shortly become necessary in order to replenish the national exchequer, it has been deemed advisable to retain British goodwill even at the expense of concessions in the Customs Tariff. For the time being our merchants gain as a consequence of the favourable terms of the new treaty; in the end, however, it will be found that indirectly they are paying dearly for any reduction in duties. To all intents and purposes Japan has purchased an option on the continuation of British goodwill. Therefore it is to be assumed that the British money market will once more be available for Japanese loans. The retort may perhaps be made, "And what of that? British capital will be employed under safe guarantees and at a fair rate of interest." But the all-important point would appear to be overlooked to the effect that every penny lent to Japan at the present moment is utilised in setting up industries which compete with British enterprise. The stake at issue is enormous. It consists in nothing less than commercial predominance in China, a market containing four hundred millions of people whose needs are daily expanding as a result of the wonderful transition which is taking place from end to end of the vast Empire. Already our trade in the Far East is sufficiently handicapped by conditions over which we cannot possibly exercise any control—as, for example, Japan's geographical proximity to China and the cheapness of her labour. The potential danger arising from our complaisant attitude is not limited to matters of commerce. In extricating Japan out of her financial difficulties we are enabling her to increase her Army and Navy and to advance a policy of Imperial expansion aimed at making her mistress of the Pacific.

Leaving political problems altogether out of the question, it should not be forgotten that it is due in a large measure to British financial support that Japan has become a serious rival in the markets of the Far East. The war with Russia cost her nearly two hundred millions sterling. Of the loan proceeds the major proportion was supplied by Great Britain. But the burden of expenditure in connection with the campaign did not fall upon Japan so heavily as might be supposed. To begin with, nearly all the money raised was spent in the country itself, and its circulation naturally gave a stimulus to the manufacturing industry, and led to the formation of many new enterprises. Then twenty millions sterling was appropriated from the war funds for the purpose of making additions to the Navy, and as these additions were inevitable, it follows that the taxpayers were relieved considerably. Furthermore, Japan's ambitious post-bellum expansion has been largely financed with British money. For example, loans contracted by the Industrial Bank have been re-lent to Korea. Again, the South Manchurian Railway Company has succeeded in floating, on very favourable terms, several large debenture issues in London. This semi-official corporation practically monopolises enterprise throughout the region in which it operates, and its scope is so comprehensive that even the establishment of schools and the management of hotels are included. Finally, British money has been secured by Japanese municipalities and railways. In all these circumstances, therefore, it is plain, as I have already suggested, that the fact of Japan having become a strong commercial Power is wholly and solely due to the ease with which she can negotiate loans in the British market.

Unfortunately a Government cannot effectually regulate avenues of investment. Were it possible to do so a valuable lever would be placed in the hands of the wealthier nations, not only for political purposes pure and simple, but also for retarding the progress of commercial competitors. In the absence of any such control from official quarters popular sentiment rules. This circumstance Japan has taken fully into account. She realises that the goodwill of the British people is essential to the maintenance of her foreign credit, and consequently she does not hesitate to pay the price required in the form of tariff concessions in a commercial treaty. Thereupon the daily press endeavours to persuade its readers that the Anglo-Japanese Alliance has produced very beneficial results, and the merchants who export goods to Japan are overjoyed. But the first chapter only is written; the plot has not yet developed. Soon Japan will contrive to borrow more money at low rates in the English market. Promptly utilising this money to develop productive enterprises, she will end in becoming independent of foreign financial assistance. The merchants who are now so delighted with the tariff concessions will find that the volume of exports to which the tariff applies has decreased almost to the point of vanishing. In any case, with British capital at her back, Japan will attain to a position of sufficient strength to enable her, should she so desire, to raise her duties again.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is, perhaps, too much to expect that we wring tariff concessions out of Japan and at the same time induce our financiers to give her the cold shoulder. Yet no opportunity ought to be lost in emphasising the fact that whatever measures we may take to preserve our trade with Japan, it is inevitably destined to dwindle as Japanese manufactures develop; and so, in the main, surely our efforts should be directed towards extending commerce with China where the opportunities are illimitable. Obviously it cannot be to our ultimate advantage to continue financing Japan, who, although our ally, is none the less a keen rival. Now is the moment to cry halt. Her exchequer is empty. It can only be replenished with British money.

It is open to question whether on any conditions Japan could raise a loan in America, Germany, or France; without British support it is absolutely certain that the financial doors of these countries would be bolted and barred against her. The Tokyo Government anticipates that the raising of the tariff will result in a substantial growth of the revenue; but it is hardly likely that enough will be derived from this source to render the exchequer independent of foreign assistance. Already the drain of specie in the form of interest and redemption in connection with the National Debt is enormous, and it has been found necessary to continue the special taxes imposed during the period of the war.

As soon as the Peace Treaty was signed at Portsmouth the world began to realise that Japan was encountering grave financial difficulties. Post-bellum programmes were twice readjusted because of the lack of funds, and the crisis that ensued caused the Saionji Ministry to resign. When Marquis Katsura assumed office he boldly announced as his settled policy that in no circumstances would new State obligations be contracted, and the national credit was immediately strengthened. Recently, however, it has been found necessary to elaborate a programme for widening the gauge of the railways and for developing the system generally. According to Baron Goto, President of the Railway Board, an expenditure amounting altogether to £130,000,000 will be incurred, and it is not denied that eventually recourse to loans must become necessary. Initial outlays will be defrayed out of what is known as the Deposit Bureau—a department that controls certain public funds largely consisting of postal savings invested in Government bonds. In other words, the State having already "annexed" the postal savings of the masses, and invested them in loans to itself, is now about to appropriate the resultant revenue, and in turn lend this to its own railways. Foreign sources will doubtless be asked to supply the rest. When the time comes that a loan for the Japanese railways is in process of negotiation in London, it would be well to reflect that it is our rivals whom we are supplying with funds, and that these funds are destined to be employed in increasing their capacity for competing with ourselves.

THE ROYAL WATER-COLOUR SOCIETY

THE exhibitions of the Royal Society of Painters in Water-colours at 5A, Pall Mall East are always interesting, and that which has just opened has the very great advantage of being somewhat less crowded than has latterly been the case, though there are still a far greater number of pictures than can be seen properly in one gallery. In view of the new rule to impose a fine on members who fail to contribute, it would seem that a restriction of the number of pictures acceptable from each of the more prolific ones will become necessary if this desirable limitation of quantity is to be continued in the future. Some of the more interesting members of the Society have sent nothing to the present exhibition. Mr. Clausen's work can hardly be spared, and Mr. Lionel Smythe and Mr. Bayes are also unrepresented, while Mr. D. Y. Cameron contributes only one picture—"The Shining Spey." This, however, is a finely characteristic example of his art.

If there is little of surpassing excellence, there are few pictures in this exhibition which have not some sterling quality. It is all good, sincere work, and from the technical point of view it is as excellent as it is varied, ranging from Mr. Sargent's strong, clever studies of sunlight and shadow—"Sketching" and "The Garden Wall"—to Mrs. Allingham's Surrey Cottages. In water-colour exhibitions the largest and most ambitious pictures are comparatively seldom among the most successful. Here, however, is a notable exception in Mrs. Laura Knight's fine—if somewhat over-green—study of "Wind and Sun." Mr. Cadogan Cowper's "Eve," too, is a fine piece of colour, though not altogether successful in other respects. Among some of the most interesting work is that of Mr. Arthur Rackham, though we have had finer things from him; and there are also some examples of Walter Crane's art, several of which—the "Wind-swept Trees" and "Side von Said" particularly—are full of charm.

Here, once more, the question is raised as to how far water-colour is a suitable medium for the painting of such religious subjects as Mr. Robert Anning Bell's "Mary Magdalene and the other Mary" and Mr. J. C. Dollman's "Thirty Pieces of Silver," both full of dignity, and the latter especially an example of fine technique. One cannot but feel that perfect water-colour is too light, too swift, and too dependent on the inspiration and work of the moment to be the best interpreter of such subjects, or indeed of any which emphasise the literary quality, even though Miss Eleanor Fortescue Brickdale's charming picture, "The First Sermon of Saint Catherine of Siena," would seem to disprove the statement.

The President, Sir Ernest A. Waterlow, Mr. H. Hughes-Stanton, Mr. Henry Tuke, and Mr. R. Thorne-Waite—to mention a few among many well-known names—are adequately represented.

ART NEEDLEWORK

The Lent Exhibition of Church and other Embroideries at the Royal School of Art Needlework, South Kensington, has been rendered specially notable this year by the inclusion of a historic gift, consisting of chasuble, dalmatics, maniples, and stoles presented to Pope Clement XIII., the Venetian Cardinal Rezzonico—whose palace, it may be recalled, was for a time the home of Robert Browning—by the Venetian Republic in 1750. The vestments, which are almost entirely covered with richly-wrought shaded silk embroidery, edged with gold thread, are thus of great interest historically and technically, though they do not, of course, represent the best period of ecclesiastical needlework. There are also examples of Stuart embroidery, including some of the curious embossed pictures and box-lids, in which the stuffed figures stand out in relief against their backgrounds. The exhibition also includes some Queen Anne tapestries and beautiful old laces, in addition to work of the present students of the school, consisting largely of copies of old pieces, among which we regret to see that the needlework-pictures beloved of our great-grandmothers are receiving a good deal of attention.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE past account was remarkable. It was a nineteen-day account, which no one likes as a rule, and it came in front of a four days' holiday. Cautious people do not like to go away and leave large accounts open for four days. Therefore we ought to have seen some liquidation. But the selling was hardly noticeable. We are all floating upon clouds of romance; we have renounced realism; we forget that the more we buy the more certain are prices to fall; we do not believe that prices ever can fall again. We are, however, much more cautious with regard to new issues: these we scan with considerable acuteness. One black ball excludes in our City circle. Singapore United and Tali Ayer both went as well as they deserved. They were sound investments for those lucky enough to get an allotment. But the Lowlands Company was not to my taste. It can never hope to be successful. The Port of London issue was a partial failure. Speyer's Brazil Railway Loan was cheap and good. Mackenzie and Mann's income charge convertible bond issue was not attractive; indeed, it was distinctly speculative. The Coates Western of Canada issue should have given us a certificate of profits. The Fortuna and the Troesan were rubber companies to be carefully avoided. There are plenty of companies being prepared for the public after Easter: the Zongo Bolivian Rubber, an oil company promoted by the General Oil and Finance to exploit oil-lands in the Crimea, a Java company, and Canadian lumber companies by the dozen.

When will promoters learn how to promote? Nine out of every ten do their work in a most haphazard style. They spend half their money in papers that cannot influence the investor and they utterly ignore the high-class weeklies. I saw the applications obtained by a promotion syndicate that went upon the old-fashioned lines. They were interesting. Ten per cent. of the newspaper application forms came from the Sketch, another 10 per cent. from the Pall Mall and Westminster, about 15 per cent. from the Daily Telegraph, practically none from the other dailies. The issue was subscribed twice over. I can only say that the money spent upon high-class weeklies gave a splendid return. What the promoter wants is to get his underwriters out. Publicity is but a secondary matter. All City people read the financial dailies, which, of course, in the case I am discussing, showed up splendidly. Most City people also read high-class financial weeklies. The company whose application forms I saw was advertised and promoted on the old lines and was a success. The companies that come out with a rush and open and close the same day are nine out of ten failures. They are badly promoted, badly advertised, and badly engineered. The most successful promoters I have ever known were Henry O'Hagan and W. Mendel. They seldom made a failure. They chose their companies with care, and they advertised with courage and discretion. Hooley was successful in getting in money through his advertisements. He failed in his financial judgment. The modern promoter is too indolent. He doesn't take the trouble to think for himself. He fails, and he deserves to fail, for he doesn't know his business. I am compelled to make these remarks because during the past fortnight we have seen dozens of companies brought out, none of which has "gone," and not one of which has spent less than £1,000 to £1,500 upon its publicity. The promoter does not know why he failed. But to those behind the scenes the reason is self-evident. He went for quantity of copies not quality of readers.

MONEY does not look as though it would come down without a struggle. The banks as money-lenders naturally want as much as they can get, and as they have many means of manipulating the Money Market they are very powerful. But their power is not eternal, for competition is severe, and no bank likes to see its coffers full of gold that is eating its head off. We should see a $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. early in May.

FOREIGNERS are very dull indeed. The only gamble is Peru, which have been bought and sold in large quantities. The Peruvian Corporation is doing well, but the gamblers do not trouble about facts. They have been told to buy Peru prefs. and they buy them. The bull account is now a dangerous size.

HOME RAILS have done remarkable things during the present account. The whole of England has, at last, been roused to the fact that our English railways must benefit by the huge increase in trade. Buyers have come in upon each rise, and it looks as though we should see the leading Heavies back at the old prices. London and North-Western once stood at 209, Great Westerns 187, North-Eastern 185. Perhaps these prices were too high. They did not show 3 per cent. return. It will, however, take some time before we find Home Rails on a 3 per cent. basis. They are now upon the 4 per cent. level. I still think Great Easterns and the Junior Great Centrals the best gambles, and Great Western the best investment. The rise has been enormous, and those who got in when I first proposed a purchase must have done very well. The bull account at the settlement was big, and the dealers made people pay 10 per cent. when they could get it. Cautious people would naturally take their profits when they found so many bulls about. Yet, in spite of the carry-over and its warning, I saw no large profit-taking. It is apparently a very strong market. Nevertheless, were I a bull I should get out on the off-chance of being able to get in again lower down. We may be sure that the dealers and money-lenders will organise a shake-out sooner or later.

YANKEES are flat and silly. Once again the Supreme Court has postponed its decision, and once again the prominent bankers have declared that all will be well. Yet I am doubtful, for I hear tales of big people desiring to put down prices. I do not pretend to understand why. The tactics of the New York banker are beyond me. I only repeat what I hear. Explanations are always wrong in a manipulated market like Yankees. There is much talk of a combine between the First National, City National, and Bank of Commerce. The latter has a valuable charter, and the three combined almost control the whole financial district. But if the Supreme Court holds that the Standard Oil Trust is illegal, what will it say to the Bankers' Trust?

RUBBER needs little comment. It is very dull, and no jobbers are doing any business. Brazil has agreed upon her scheme for upholding the price, and many of the plantation companies now refuse to sell under 6s. But will Brazil be able to hold up enough rubber? The position is peculiar. In the meantime no one buys Plantation shares, which are somewhat too high to tempt the gambler. If they fall a little lower, they may be worth touching.

OIL.—The rise in Spies and Shells seems to have died out. The French bought Spies and the Dutch bought Shells. London leaves oil shares alone. In this we are wise, for I see no chance of much rise yet. But I like Lobitos, and I should not sell Spies yet. There will be a boom in Maikop Companies after Easter, and Black Sea Oilfields are the best.

KAFFIRS.—I am sick of this Kaffir market, with its magnates all squabbling and jobbers all short. Paris also seems "fed up" with gold shares. This slang just expresses the situation. Indeed we are all "fed up" with Kaffirs, and it will take something startling to rid us of our dyspepsia.

RHODESIANS.—The two Markets move together and are like the Siamese Twins. There is no reason for this, but I state a fact. The little spurt has died away. The magnates seem too lethargic to take quotations in hand, and the public is afraid that if it buys the shops will unload, wherein the public shows great good sense.

MISCELLANEOUS.—The Baker Mason people have once again hoisted Cements, and we stand on one side and watch the game played. We admire the manipulation, but don't know enough to take a hand. Thereby we probably save our money. Cements, Lenas, and Perus have all been good gambles the past week, but merely gambles.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

RAYMOND RADCLIFFE.

THE GREAT ORIENTAL GOLD MINES

The sensational gold discoveries in the early days of Australian mining are likely to be repeated. The official reports of the Great Oriental Gold Mines (which has already produced a million and a quarter sterling) state that the manager has made a rich discovery in the lower level which is likely to produce an even larger value than previously. At about par the 5s. shares are attracting the attention of a usually well-informed section of mining investors, by whom considerable market activity is expected, and a substantial rise in the price of the shares anticipated.

THE PREMIER OIL AND PILE LINE COMPANY

The Premier Oil and Pile Line Company, who have paid 10 per cent. on their capital since the inauguration in three quarterly instalments, will after the Easter holidays declare their final distribution. This will be on a larger scale than 10 per cent., as from a recent report issued they are earning over 25 per cent. The shares are at present round about 22s. buyers, and as they pay by far the largest dividend of any oil company on the market the fact that they are a splendid purchase will be patent. The various wells on the property are all producing, whilst some of them promise to be "gushers." Should this be so, Premier Oils will become the Vallombrosas of the oil section. The shares certainly should see over 30s. within a very short period.

CORRESPONDENCE

NEW METHODS IN TEACHING

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Mr. Runciman, M.P., President of the Board of Education, stated at Lancaster on Saturday, April 8th, that "a child was not merely a thing equipped with brains, but a complete being, every part of which should be educated." What then? Is it to be understood that Mr. Runciman wishes to teach us that we are all mind, and that every nerve, muscle, cell, and atom of our physical frame is mind in process of development? Some educationists, I am aware, are propagating the idea that in another few generations a human being will become so fully developed and educated that he will be able to think as intelligently in every part of his body as he does now in the main centre, the head. It is likewise known that the blind grow brain cells in the tips of the fingers, and through these new centres of sensation are able to distinguish colours. Those individuals, then, who lose the sight of their eyes will suffer little inconvenience thereby, for when they have learnt to see through whatever part of their body they please the loss of this organ will not affect them overmuch. And if we can educate and develop one part of our body to such an extent as this, why not another? The work of the teacher in the future will then be to work on every atom of the human body as an individualised form of the Universal Mind in one degree or another of development or evolution, and to assist those thoughtful and intelligent brain cells to reach the growth and development of the higher centres of the human brain. And what a wonderful man the man of the future will be when he is so developed in every part of his body as to be able to think as consciously and as easily in every atom of his physical organisation as he does now in the head-brain!—Yours faithfully,

J. R. MORETON.

Lynton, Brockley Rise, S.E.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

Vittoria Victrix. By W. E. Norris. Constable and Co. 6s.
Haunted. By Gertrude Warden. Frontispiece. Ward, Lock, and Co. 6s.
The Valley of Regret. By Adelaide Holt. John Lane. 6s.
The Magic of the Hill: a Romance of Montmartre. By Duncan Schwann. Frontispiece. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.
The Great Betrayal. By Harold Wintle. John Ouseley. 6s.

MISCELLANEOUS

Nights with an Old Lag. Recorded by W. J. Wintle. John Ouseley. 5s. net.
Through the Wildernesses of Brazil, by Horse, Canoe, and Float. By William Azel Cook. Illustrated. T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.
The Coronation Durbar, and After. By "Scotus Indigena." Arthur H. Stockwell. 1s. net.
Shepherds of Britain: Scenes from Shepherd Life, Past and Present, from the Best Authorities. By Adelaide L. J. Gosset. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Lay Morals and Other Papers. By Robert Louis Stevenson. Chatto and Windus. 6s.
Sinai in Spring; or, The Best Desert in the World. By M. J. Rendall. Illustrated. J. M. Dent and Sons. 4s. 6d. net.
Comparative Studies in Nursery Rhymes. By Lina Eckenstein. Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.
My Balkan Tour: an Account of Some Journeyings in the Near East, together with a Descriptive and Historical Account of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dalmatia, Croatia, and the Kingdom of Montenegro. By Roy Trevor. Illustrated. John Lane. 21s. net.
The Fountain, a Comedy in Three Acts. By George Calderon. Gowans and Gray. 6d. net.

THEOLOGY

Religion and Immortality. By G. Lowes Dickinson. J. M. Dent and Sons. 1s. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Secret Societies and the French Revolution, together with some Kindred Studies. By Una Birch. John Lane. 5s. net.
The Tragedy of St. Helena. By Sir Walter Runciman, Bart. Portrait Frontispiece. T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.
The Letters and Journal (1848-49) of Count Charles Leiningen-Westerburg, General in the Hungarian Army. Edited, with an Introduction, by Henry Marczali, Ph.D. Illustrated. Duckworth and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
Scottish Poetry: Drummond of Hawthornden to Fergusson. Lectures delivered in the University of Glasgow by Sir George Douglas, Bart. James Maclehose and Sons. 5s. net.
History of the Rise of the Mahomedan Power in India till the Year A.D. 1612. Translated from the Original Persian of Mahomed Kasim Ferishta by John Briggs, M.R.A.S. Four vols. Kegan Paul and Co. £1 10s. net per set.
History of Rome and the Popes in the Middle Ages. By Hartmann Grisar, S.J. Authorised English Translation. Edited by Luigi Cappadelta. Vol. I. Illustrated. Kegan Paul and Co. 15s. net.

PERIODICALS

Harper's Magazine; Scottish Historical Review; The Author; The Papyrus; The Conservator; The Open Window; The Bodleian; Top-Notch; Literary Digest; Publishers' Circular.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,
The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR
Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.
Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear
SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.
2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-
Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.
THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

The Cowper & Newton Museum

Olney, Bucks.

AN APPEAL FOR ENDOWMENT.

Eleven years ago, on the occasion of the Centenary of the death of the poet Cowper, the house in which he lived at Olney was presented to the town to form a Memorial and Museum. The Trustees have, with a number of gentlemen resident in the district, formed an Endowment Committee, of which the Bishop of Durham is the Chairman.

The Secretary is Mr. Thomas Wright, the Cowper and Newton Museum, Olney, Bucks, to whom Contributions should be addressed.

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria S reet, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Via the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Now Ready. Price 6d. The April

BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Swing of the Pendulum in the World of Letters.

DICKENS'S LOVE STORY. Full News of the Letters to his Friend, Henry Kolle.—By B. W. Matz.

A LONDON LETTER. On Topics Concerning Current English Books and Authorship.

APRIL ALL SORTS. The Plots and People of Six Recent Stories.

A TWO-FOLD BIOGRAPHY. Charming Mrs. Craigie and Gifted John Oliver Hobbes.

THE BIBLE TERCENTENARY. The Moving Story of the Book of English Books.

THE BOOK NEWSMAN. Current Events and Comments Possessing a Literary Interest.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of March, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some April Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Note the Dickens Article, and do not fail to get the APRIL BOOK MONTHLY, which is published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

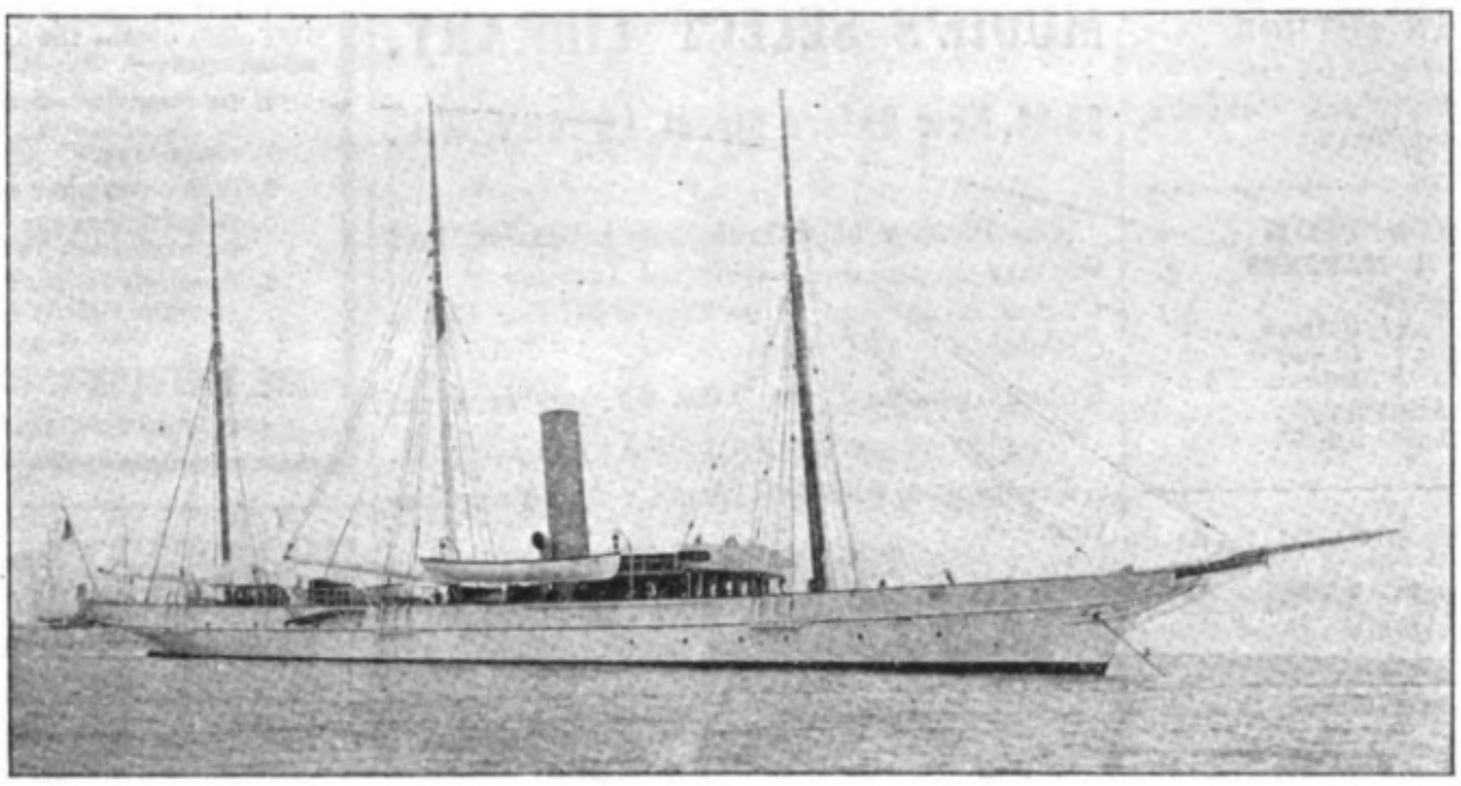
For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PENN STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

No. 2033 [Registered as a Newspaper.] APRIL 22, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL."

Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.

SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements.

Yachts economically managed for Owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Highest References.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

SHEPHERD'S EXHIBITION OF EARLY BRITISH MASTERS
includes works by

Gainsborough	Wilson	Cotman
Raeburn	Crome	Chandler
Lawrence	Constable	Downman, &c.

SHEPHERD'S GALLERY,
27, King Street., St. James's, S.W.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references. — Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

CONSULT

The Gresham
On all Matters of
LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

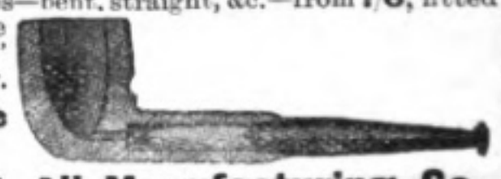
MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.



Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING. — Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words. — The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

Edward Whistler,
II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

George Odell,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	475
Spells	476
Cowper: his Correspondence—III.	476
The Value and Usage of Words	477
Reviews:—
The Reformation Settlement—II.	478
New England Fisheries	478
Entanglements	479
French Kings and Children	480
Some Coronation Issues	480
Shorter Reviews	481
Fiction	482
The Theatre	484
General Boulanger	487
The Speakers of the House of Commons—II.	489
An Oxford Poem by Henry Vaughan—II.	490
An Excellent Touchstone	492
The Portuguese in India	493
The Poet's Holiday—VII.	494
Unknown Mantzeland	495
Spring in Japan	496
Field Artillery	497
A Song of the Motor	498
Foreign Affairs	499
Early British Masters at Messrs. Shepperds' Gallery	501
In the Temple of Mammon	502
Correspondence	503
Books Received	503

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 67, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

By a majority of 73 the Government have succeeded in maintaining their ill-starred provision in the Parliament Bill that the Speaker of the House of Commons shall be the tribunal to decide what is and what is not a money Bill. In December last we wrote, with reference to this proposal:—

> The Speaker of the House of Commons is a party man. Within the limits of the duties which have at present been assigned to him, his conduct has been above reproach, but the position of autocracy which it is now proposed to confer on him might easily lead to the selection of a very different type of man for the position. In any case a claim to infallibility cannot in these days be admitted.

Of course a Government whose favourite occupation is to bring the law, the Judges, and the magistracy into disrepute, and cause all three to be despised of the people, would, in the language of Mr. Asquith, offer "a most uncompromising opposition" to any proposal to refer the decision of a question which is one of constitutional law to a judicial tribunal. Mr. George Cave knew the hopelessness of putting forward such a proposition, and he therefore relied on a measure of compromise. He proposed that a Joint Committee, consisting of seven members of each House, presided over by the Speaker, who should have a casting vote, would be a better tribunal than the Speaker sitting alone. The Government, with suspicious firmness, would not look at the proposal. In vain did Mr. Balfour point out that the Government in a rather light-hearted spirit proposed that the Speaker should take the place occupied in the United States by nine impartial Judges. Mr. Asquith, pliable as wax in the hands of the Socialists, presented—as always—a brazen front, and snapped out a decisive negative, when a proposal, which any reasonable Minister would welcome as relieving him of an odious responsibility and rescuing him from an intolerable position, was put forward by the responsible Opposition. Sir Robert Finlay was anxious to know why the decision as to what is and what is not a money Bill should not be determined by an independent and impartial tribunal. The Prime Minister

> Started like a guilty thing
> Upon a fearful summons.

The ghost of the Budget of 1909 raised a warning finger, and a denial of common sense, prudence, and justice to the Second Chamber was obediently blurted out in uncompromising tones.

In the recurrent discussions regarding the personnel of the Navy the claims of the Merchant Service are apt to be overlooked. Without any such perpetual "booming" as the battleship and cruiser necessarily receive, the stately liner, the capacious special cargo-boat, and the nondescript ocean-tramp quietly encircle the world with their network of routes, and keep the flag of commerce flying; they fire no guns, they create no sensations, but without their aid there would soon be no Empire for the Navy to defend. The question of the employment of the foreigner in the British mercantile fleets is thus an important one. It is gratifying to know that the proportion of English sailors to foreigners is on the increase—in 1901 the percentage was 69·7, and in 1909 it had reached 72·4; but, even so, the figures are not satisfactory. A Committee of the Board of Trade recommended that substantial assistance should be given in the matter of training boys for the Mercantile Marine, to the extent of a capitation grant of £20, and facilities for the instruction of 5,000 lads per annum. We shall be glad if the desires of the National Committee for the Training of British Seamen meet with approval in the right quarter, for, as Lord Brassey remarked, "it is an anomaly that liberal provision should be made for technical instruction in various trades, and that no assistance should be given for training lads as sailors."

The German enthusiasm for discipline and order may not in every case meet with our approval, but a recent decision taken by the Governor of the Potsdam district might well be imitated in this country. By May 15th all advertising-boards which afflict the eyes of passengers by railway are to be set back to a distance of 400yds. from the line—an edict which is equivalent, we presume, to dismissing these unsightly erections to limbo. Travellers from London northward know well how distressing is the continual invitation to buy various medicines and household commodities; fortunately the Western routes are not disfigured to so great an extent. We do not all read continuously in the train; there occur in the course of a journey half-hours when the daisied meadows and the flashing streams compete successfully with the columns of the paper or the pages of our novel, and when it is more important for our well-being to gaze into a green, sunlit, flower-lit countryside than to con the arid lines of black and white. At such times we do not want the rival merits of pickles, or the powerful properties of soap, intruded upon our thoughts. Possibly we are not a particularly artistic or poetic nation, but for one person who is pleased by these ugly constructions of the strenuous advertiser we imagine that a dozen are annoyed. In the city, at night, the flaming, fluctuating signs can occasionally become things of beauty in their mysterious atmosphere of vapour, their whirling clouds of steam, their vague reflections; but in the country, on crude, painted boards, the spell is broken, and there is not one redeeming feature.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SPELLS

I was as one who scorns the affluent deep's
  White gift of pearls for light-blown ocean foam,
  And, laughing fondly, bears his treasure home
Within his hollowed palms—then looks and weeps
To know that casket not a vestige keeps
  Of all his gleaning. Almost had I paid
  The debt to Folly, and my birthright laid
With the strewn refuse on her ashen heaps.

Then, while the ultimate residue of hope
  Its perilous tenure held, you swept away
    The rife illusions and broke through the bars
Of my enchantment. Impotent to cope,
  The old spell yielded to your subtler sway
    That holds me captive with a chain of stars.

P. J. F.

COWPER: HIS CORRESPONDENCE*—III.

THERE is no need to recapitulate in these columns the main features in the life of the poet of Olney, since the principal facts are fairly well known and records are easily accessible; it will be interesting, however, to glance at the less public side of his career, as exemplified in his letters. A man gives to the world the broad stream of his existence; he reserves for his friends the significant eddies, the musical shallows, the silent pools, wherein the main current expends itself and weaves beauties unsuspected by those who only view it from a distance.

By his noble ancestry, Cowper was connected with the Law as a profession. His great-uncle William was a successful barrister who became Lord Chancellor of England in the reign of Queen Anne, and Cowper himself was intended to shine as a legal luminary; his inclinations, however, led him into less serious paths, even while he was surrounded by the presumably serious influences of the Temple. "In April, 1754," writes Judge Willis, in his interesting little monograph entitled "Cowper and his Connection with the Law," "he was called to the Bar by the Honourable Society of the Middle Temple; subsequently, in the year 1757, he took chambers in the Inner Temple. . . . Whilst Cowper was at the Inner Temple he scarcely examined a law-book, and delighted to be in the society of the wits of his day, many of whom have obtained a sad reputation. He joined a club styled 'The Nonsense Club,' and wrote for it three or four papers which foretell the elegance and purity of the writer of the Letters."

The ebb and flow of sorrow and joy in the poet's life is clearly displayed in the intimate outpourings to his friends which have been so carefully preserved. Very rarely can we so closely examine the passing moods of man, and their reaction upon his general progress, as we can in the case of Cowper. To most men depression brings silence and seclusion; to him it often brought the necessity for speech or the written word; and who shall say how many times that relief of the flying pen to the teeming brain saved him from worse calamities of melancholy, profounder deeps of despondency, than those—sad enough, indeed—which he suffered? "I am of a very singular temper," he wrote to Lady Hesketh, his cousin, "and very unlike all the men that I have ever conversed with." He was no exception, however, to the rule that exhilaration means loquacity. In joyous hours we sing, talk eagerly, write letters which we deem humorous, find excellent intellectual fare in the least promising materials. So with the poet. If at one time he belaboured the world as "a shabby fellow" who "uses us ill," at another time the world's most trivial things pleased him and set him recording, commenting, moralising by the page, occasionally in verse.

Sarcasm and cynicism were far enough removed, generally speaking, from Cowper's disposition, but here and there we find a resentful touch, as in the opening of the famous letter concerning Dr. Johnson's biographies: "My dear Friend: I wrote my last letter merely to inform you that I had nothing to say; in answer to which you have said nothing. I admire the propriety of your conduct, though I am a loser by it. I will endeavour to say something now, and shall hope for something in return." This letter, written to the Rev. William Unwin on October 31st, 1779, shows Cowper for once in a pugnacious mood; he is strongly incensed at the Doctor's treatment of Milton, and characterises it as "unmerciful to the last degree:"—

> Churlishness in his private life, and a rancorous hatred of everything royal in his public, are the two colours with which he has smeared all the canvas. If he had any virtues, they are not to be found in the Doctor's picture of him; and it is well for Milton that some sourness in his temper is the only vice with which his memory has been charged: it is evident enough that if his biographer could have discovered more, he would not have spared him. As a poet, he has treated him with severity enough, and has plucked one or two of the most beautiful feathers out of his Muse's wing and trampled them under his great foot. . . . Was there ever anything so delightful as the music of the "Paradise Lost"? It is like that of a fine organ; has the fullest and the deepest tones of majesty, with all the softness and elegance of the Dorian flute. . . . Yet the Doctor has little or nothing to say upon this copious theme, but talks something about the unfitness of the English language for blank verse, and how apt it is, in the mouth of some readers, to degenerate into declamation. Oh! I could thresh his old jacket, till I made his pension jingle in his pocket.

Cowper found immense relief from his periods of depression in his poetic work; indeed, his translation of the Iliad was begun as a mere filling-in of the idleness which followed the completion of "The Task." What deadly pass of despair would have been his, were it not for this, we can only guess from his revelation of himself:—

> Pardon me, my dearest cousin (he wrote in 1788), the mournful ditty that I sent you last. There are times when I see everything through a medium that distresses me to an insupportable degree. . . . Oh trouble! the portion of all mortals—but mine in particular—would I had never known thee, or could bid thee farewell for ever; for I meet thee at every turn; my pillows are stuffed with thee, my very roses smell of thee.

And what black despair, again, would have engulfed his soul, had not his tender and sensitive nature drawn to itself by unbreakable cords of friendship other natures which responded, comprehended, inspired, and comforted the solitary soul of the poet! His friends, among themselves, spoke of him often as "our beloved Cowper," or "the dear translator."

His letters to these sympathetic friends are neat, as a rule fastidiously correct in their composition, and full of lively imagery and description—often dealing with things insignificant in themselves but illuminating in the manner of their treatment. He could be naïvely conceited on occasion, as when, referring to "The Task," he wrote to the Rev. W. Unwin:—

> Mr. Teedon has just left us. He has read my book, and, as if fearful that I had overlooked some of them myself, has

---

* Olney Hymns. By William Cowper. Edited by William Willis. (Published for the Cowper Society by Farncombe and Son.)

Cowper and his Connection with the Law. By William Willis, K.C., LL.D. (Printed for Private Circulation.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

pointed out to me all its beauties. I do assure you the man has a very acute discernment, and a taste that I have no fault to find with.

He who could complain at such ingenuous pride in one whose pleasures were so simple and so few would be churlish indeed.

To go into details and to analyse the character of William Cowper from these letters, which fill several volumes, is obviously impossible in a necessarily brief article; we shall be content if by these glances at the hymns of Olney, the simple, unstrained poetry, and the unaffected nature as shown in the correspondence, we persuade a few readers to consider for themselves the work of a poet who to-day is somewhat neglected. Cowper was not one of those who sang of the world in Wordsworth's sense, the world which is "ever with us," so that "day by day, getting or spending, we lay waste our powers;" he wrote in one of his earlier letters that as long as he had "a hundred a year" he should be happy. In this he was unduly optimistic, for happiness was not to be the average quality of his days; but, as far as friends could shield him from the blows of an unkind fate, he was shielded; and in their devotion, and in his expression of himself to them (and unwittingly to us), came the happiest hours of a sombre, overclouded life.

W. L. R.

THE VALUE AND USAGE OF WORDS

In the very morning of time, when men lived basely, fighting and feeding, there were probably no words. We can believe that all the emotions of which man was then capable were expressed by vague sounds almost unconsciously uttered. It would only be now and then that some primeval poet would, to the wonder of his tribe, achieve complete expression by using a sound at once so appropriate and compelling that it became for ever sacred to one meaning. The sound would be uttered in some moment of overmastering passion, rapt contemplation, or ecstatic reverie. Terror, or worship, or the tenderness of lovers would be suggested by it. There would be something of the lion's nobility in its name, and a wondering awe in the titles of the sun and stars.

The growth of language was thus gradual, word by word, and every new word was literally a poem or a prayer. In those early times words could be only of the simplest and vaguest. Not only would man's intellect be insufficiently developed to appreciate subtle differences and minute distinctions, but both his voice and his ear must have developed gradually. With the growth of knowledge and experience, however, the need for a more subtle and sensitive language would be keenly felt, and as men came by exercise to a greater command of voice and ear their attempts at expression would become more ambitious. Their world was a place of wonderful noises for imitation, and the more quick-witted of the tribe would invent new words, to be laboriously learned and adopted by their slower-minded fellows.

With the invention of the first word all things became suddenly possible. Until then knowledge was held in a perishable vessel—the mind of a single man—but with the possibility of transmission and the later possibility of record came the certainty of progress. Men die, but Man is immortal; and the knowledge won by individuals through bitter experience was held and inherited by the race. All succeeding generations began the astonishing struggle upon more favourable terms.

Without language, written or spoken, anything like a race-memory is impossible. The whole accumulation of fact and theory, the result since the world began of all man's experience and speculation, is available to us through this one instrument only. In the course of its development a language is naturally moulded into an instrument peculiarly capable of recording and transmitting the ideas which most appeal to the people using it; it becomes possible in time to give exact and brief expression to their subtlest variations. The native language only can fully and easily express the native mind. The alien speech has been evolved by a people dominated by other ideals, responsive to different emotions. This is why the gradual decay and death of a noble language is a pathetic and awful thing; its deliberate suppression a crime against the human race.

Apart from the written sign or the spoken sound, the word exists as the expression of a mind; and having come down to us through so many minds, no dictionary can fully define its meaning. Every new arrangement brings out some new beauty. The sound and rhythm, the very look of the word, subtly affect its significance. Nor are these the only influences that modify the meaning and enlarge the content of words. They come after long use to be influenced by a dozen niceties of position and association. Individual experience gives, too, a local or private application to them, so that the meanest and most familiar of words may strangely affect the hearer. It is part of our responsibility, therefore, to consider the effect of our words apart from their absolute meaning. It is easy to propagate falsehood by the cunning statement of truth. Nor need we postulate dishonest intention. The reasoner will often unconsciously enlarge or narrow the content of his most important terms in the course of a single argument. And that which would have been untrue, had the term held its original meaning and no more throughout, is triumphantly demonstrated of a something which has varied with every repetition of its name. It becomes imperative to keep always in mind the reality for which the word stands. We may exhaust dictionaries in our search for the magic syllables, but our mental image of the thing must not waver for an instant.

The important thing is not so much to state a fact with scientific precision as to convey to the mind of the hearer a fact, an emotion, or an idea, completely, and in the desired intensity. This is the ultimate justification of the poet, the rhetorician, or the stylist. We falter and are baffled in spite of the precise fluency of our scientific mentor; but the poet finds the immortal phrase which illumines the landscape like a flash of lightning. The thing has been transmitted in an instant from his mind to ours; and in its white-hot intensity. It is thus that in the day of battle ten words may stiffen the knees of an army and be worth ten thousand bayonets.

Nor should we insist on the power and importance of words, to the neglect of their wonderful beauty. We may even consider language as an instrument of absolute music. In the greater minds beauty of sound and rhythm are combined with and help to the perfect expression of noble ideas. But it may be permitted to the smaller man to fill his writings with strong-syllabled, clamorous words merely as part of the orchestration—to trumpet the cunning of the craft-proud workman. Indeed, a mere list of words may interest one intensely. We can imagine the word-lover gloating over a dictionary as some wealthy jeweller might revel in a basket of beautiful unset stones. Here is the material for all craftsmen: sweet liquid labials; words that shimmer and sparkle; splendid and terrible adjectives, servants of Fury, the trumpets of the wordy orchestra. This was Shelley's treasure-house, the arsenal where Marlowe fashioned his thunder-bolt lines. Out of this workshop what wonders of inspired art have come! Yet there remains after the riot of pillage, the original treasure, inexhaustible as the impossible hoards of the fabled misers.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE REFORMATION SETTLEMENT

Visitation Articles and Injunctions of the Period of the Reformation. Alcuin Club Collections. Vols. XIV., XV., XVI. Edited by Walter Howard Frere, D.D. (Longmans, Green, and Co. 1910. £4.)

[Second Notice]

In Archbishop Cranmer's Visitation of All Souls' College, Oxford, is an Injunction which might be addressed to college dons in every age. Item 5: "Insuper injungimus et stricte precipiendo mandamus, quod socii dicti Collegii omnes et singuli, ab omni scandalo, offensione, jurgiis, odiis, provocationibus, rixis et contumelis, necnon et verbis opprobriosis in futurum se refrenent atque abstineant."

In the matter of candles, the Royal Injunctions of Edward VI. go a step further. Item 3: "No torches nor candles, tapers or images of wax to be set before any image or picture, but only two lights upon the high altar before the Sacrament, which, for the signification that Christ is the very true Light of the World, they shall suffer to remain still." These two lights, as the Lincoln Judgment in the nineteenth century showed, were never abrogated in the Church of England.

In the Royal Injunctions for Cathedrals it is ordered that "the deans, subdeans, chanters, chancellors, treasurers, archdeacons, prebendaries, peticanons, vicars, and all other ministers shall not haunt or resort to taverns or alehouses, or give themselves to drinking, dicing, carding, hunting, hawking, or any other unlawful games, but shall give themselves to reading and studying of Holy Scripture." Other orders are against gaming in porter's lodge; that no one be out after 9.30 p.m.; that there be no talking or jangling in choir, nor walking about during service; and that "choristers' crowns are not to be shaven, nevertheless their heads be kept short."

The influence of the extreme section of the Continental reformers is constantly seen in the episcopal Injunctions, Archbishop Holgate of York orders (1552) that "there be no more playings of the organs . . . but that the said playing do utterly cease." Dr. Frere in a note, observes that before thirty years had expired the organ was again in use at York. Bishop Hooper of Gloucester (1551) urged the parishioners completely to sack their parish churches of "all places, tabernacles, tombs, sepulchres, tables, footstools, rood-lofts . . . also to take away all the greis, ascenses, and up-goings that heretofore went to any altar," so that nothing was to be left except the bare walls. All stained glass having pictures of saints was to be removed, though this order was in many cases disobeyed because of the expense of re-glazing. The great destruction of stained glass took place during the Commonwealth. Bishop Hooper was violently opposed to any partition or screen between the chancel and the church, but later a Royal order of Queen Elizabeth (1561) commanded the putting up of a comely partition if there were none standing.

The Injunctions of Elizabeth's reign show plainly enough that though the Queen was determined to uphold the Reformation Settlement, she was equally determined to maintain decency and order in public worship, and to restrain the wanton desecration of churches. Royal Injunctions (1559), Item 30: "The clergy shall wear such seemly habits, garments, and such square caps as were most commonly and orderly received in the latter year of the reign of King Edward VI." Item 49: Singing and music were especially enjoined—"a modest and distinct song," most probably the ancient plainsong. Item 52: Reverence and kneeling at prayers; due reverence at every mention of the name of Jesus. This was embodied in the eighteenth Canon of 1604. Item 53 is worth quoting in this present age of bad and slovenly reading: "All ministers and readers of public prayers, chapters, and homilies shall be charged to read leisurely, plainly, and distinctly; and also such as are but mean readers shall peruse over before once or twice the chapters and homilies to the intent they may read to the better understanding of the people."

The Queen was indignant against the common trestle-tables (vulgarly called oyster-tables), covered with "foul cloths," that Puritan slovenliness used in the nave of the church for the Sacrament, and, in order that the "Sacrament be duly and reverently ministered," commanded that "the holy table in every church be decently made, and set in the place where the altar stood." This Injunction was in direct opposition to the wishes of the Continental reformers who had invaded England. But in the dearth of clergy so many posts had to be given to these men that twelve years later the greatest disorder prevailed in public worship, and in 1571 it was found necessary to issue Injunctions that "every parson, vicar, curate, &c., shall wear a surplice." A curious light is thrown on the gay but irreverent spirit of the time in Grindal's Articles for the Province of York. Item 61:—

> Whether the minister and churchwardens have suffered any Lords of Misrule, or summer lords or ladies, or any disguised persons, in Christmas, or at May-games, or any Morris-dancers or others at rush-bearings [i.e., when rushes were spread in the church at the dedication festival] to come unreverently into the church or churchyard, and there to dance, or play any unseemly parts with scoffs, jests, wanton gestures, or ribald talk—namely, in the time of Common Prayer.

As Brand notes in his "Antiquities," these unseemly wakes took the place of the old commemoration of the saint or martyr, or of the builder or endower of the church.

These examples will show what a mine of interesting research is contained in the second and third volumes, of over eight hundred pages. The first volume is entirely taken up with Dr. Frere's Introduction and an exhaustive Index. There are excellent notes scattered throughout the volumes, and the whole work is very ably edited, except in one particular, and that is the extraordinary number of mistakes and misprints, which necessitate no less than nine pages of corrigenda. This seems inexcusable in a book published by a learned society. No explanation is given why these and other errors not noted were not corrected in the proof-sheets,although the editor expresses his regret for the "very melancholy list of errata." Apart from this defect, Dr. Frere's work is a solid and invaluable contribution to the study of ecclesiastical history.

(Concluded.)

NEW ENGLAND FISHERIES

A History of the New England Fisheries. By Raymond McFarland, A.M. With Maps. (D. Appleton and Co., New York. $2.)

"There is no industry in America that antedates the fisheries," says the author in his preface, "yet the industry, with the exception of the whale-fishing, has no literature that adequately sets forth its history and value." So the object of this book is to trace the development and to show the importance of the New England fisheries from pre-colonial days to the present time. It contains chapters dealing with the different species of fish that are principally caught, and the various methods of catching them; there are also maps of the chief fishing-grounds. The varying phases of "The Fishing Question" are dealt with at some length. "In the earlier stages of its history the contentions had to do with the enjoyment of fishing privileges in waters adjacent to British coasts in America; at the present time the question has to deal mostly with the securing of Newfoundland herring for bait in the American fisheries." Included in the book is the text of the Award of the Tribunal of Arbitration upon this question, which was signed at the Hague on September 7th, 1910.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Such a study in industrial history, based on information derived from a wide range of sources, must necessarily be much condensed in a volume like this. The Bibliography extends to twenty pages, and might easily be still further enlarged. The accounts of early colonisation are reviewed in brief, stress being laid upon early reports of the value of the fishing along the coast. "By 1620 it was an established fact that the best cod-fishing grounds in the world were on the New England coast." Whale, cod, mackerel, halibut, herrings, shad, lobsters, oysters, and clams, all contribute to the wealth of the New England fisheries, and a number of statistics are given which show their relative importance. In the compilation of his History the author has made liberal use of Sabine's "Report on the Principal Fisheries of the American Seas," 1853, a most interesting and valuable report. The work before us contains a good deal more information, and is much improved by the addition of an index; but the style in which it is written is not very attractive, and, in spite of being well arranged, it makes rather dull reading.

We are inclined to think that Professor McFarland overestimates the part played by the fisheries of Newfoundland and New England in the colonial movement of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The motives which drew the early settlers across the Atlantic were religious and political, as well as economic. He admits that the Pilgrims were poor fishermen, in spite of the following story that he tells about them. When the agent of the Pilgrims went from Leyden in 1618 to secure the consent of King James to the proposed settlement of America, the King asked, "What profit might arise?" The answer was the single word, "Fishing." In those days fish constituted one of the principal elements in England's diet; but our chief fishing-ground was round Iceland, and we bought a large proportion of the fish that we consumed from foreigners, especially from the Dutch. By the Statute-book in the time of Queen Elizabeth there were 153 days in the year on which all British subjects were required to abstain from flesh and to eat fish. An Act of Parliament passed in 1563 provided "that as well for the maintenance of shipping, the increase of fishermen and marines, and the repairing of port-towns, as for the sparing of the fresh victual of the realm, it shall not be lawful for any one to eat flesh on Wednesdays and Saturdays, unless under the forfeiture of £3 for each offence, excepting in cases of sickness and those of special licences to be obtained."

The schooner and its name come to us from New England. The first ship so rigged was launched by Captain Andrew Robinson at Gloucester in 1713. At the launching of the craft a bystander exclaimed as she left the stocks, "Oh! how she scoons!" To which Captain Robinson replied, "A schooner let her be." The word was written "scooner" originally in New England records, and "to scoon" was a word taken from Clydesdale, in Scotland, meaning "to skip or skim on the surface of the water." The crew of the vessels that fished on the Grand Bank of Newfoundland were accustomed to "go on their own hook," an account being kept daily of the number of cod caught by each member of the crew; so it is to the New England fishermen that we owe this peculiar expression, as also the proverb, "Happy as a clam at high tide."

Space would fail us to trace the growth of these fisheries, or to describe the lives of this hardy race of fishermen. The dangers of the Banks, their sudden fogs and threatening icebergs, are familiar to readers of Kipling's "Captains Courageous." Special stress is laid upon "the stupid policy of the English Government towards her fishermen in American waters;" and nothing perhaps is more remarkable in the history of the British Colonies than the long-continued indifference of the home Government to the value of these fisheries. It would be fair to say that the rapid expansion of the New England fisheries was due to the indomitable energy of the fisherfolk themselves and to the natural richness of the fishing-grounds where they plied their dangerous trade.

ENTANGLEMENTS

Some Neighbours. By CHARLES GRANVILLE. (Daniel. 6s.)

BY ARTHUR MACHEN.

"How Professor Lacroix Found his Soul," one of the stories in this pleasing volume, states, in the form of fiction, the arguments for regarding man as a very curious and elaborate complex.

Lacroix was the exponent of Haeckel at a Belgian "Université Libre," and one day, to his horror, he finds that the ratiocinative faculty on which he had built all the structure of his teaching has failed him. He dare not tread a step on the path he has chosen, for he feels the precipice of madness yawning before him. A brother Professor, a medical man, sends him off to the country to "learn to be idle." Lacroix takes the advice, and goes to a quiet village, and there he "finds his soul."

Such is the author's description of the process that takes place; but we would regard it as going rather beyond the real circumstances of the cure. We leave the Professor, it is true, with his face pointed in the right direction; but it would hardly appear that he has arrived at that state of spiritual sanity that would justify Mr. Granville's phraseology. A man who has shaken off the terrors and deliriums of a confused opium dream, who perceives that the trees are not men walking, has made a certain advance on the road of sanity; but it would be too much to say that he is fixed on the way of salvation. Lacroix in the little Belgian village learns that music is something, that dancing is something, that mirth is something, that art is something, that religion is something, and finally that love is something. But all this is really negative work; circumstances dig out of the well of his soul the enormous and dismal heap of pseudo-scientific rubbish and futility that has occupied the holy place. There is still much more to be done; the well is to be filled with the fair and clear waters of true wisdom. And the author, if he had been disposed to philosophise, might have pointed out that the existence of the rubbish-heap and the necessity of mere navvy's work before anything important can be accomplished constitute the most formidable difficulties to any true progress in modern times. The Gordian knot of nonsense has been tied so securely, with such a complication of entanglements, that one despairs of unloosening it. And yet the knots of folly must be untied if the rope is to serve the purpose of a cable, holding the ship of the soul in the secure anchorage of the eternal haven.

The untying of those knots is a task which might make the bravest shrink back affrighted. To take one tangle only; ever since the Reformation we have been told in various accents that we should be guided by reason. But, very oddly, the people who have insisted with the utmost strenuousness on the infallibility of the human reason are the very persons who have consistently poured contempt on the schoolmen of the Middle Ages, who really did endeavour to solve the problems of the universe by the light of the human intellect. One saw this position in an intensified form in the beginning of the nineteenth century, when "liberal" thinkers were vigorously engaged at one and the same moment in exalting the reason and in decrying "scholastic" logic. Before the age of Macaulay, Rousseau and his fellow lunatics and criminals had made "Nature" the guide of the soul; and, taking the words in their ordinary senses, it is certain that Reason and Nature are often at daggers drawn. It is often natural to give a man a sound thrashing; but it would in most cases be highly unreasonable to proceed to such an extremity. But the odd thing has been that the Reason prophets and the Nature prophets have often been the same persons; blindly unconscious, it would seem, of the fact that you cannot advise a man to behave like a calculating machine and a healthy hog in the same breath without laying yourself open to the charge of inconsistency. Each gospel, taken separately, is incomparably absurd and vicious; but the two together as compatible articles of one creed would be quite incredible—if we were not daily deafened with their joint proclamation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Professor in the story has just begun to untie the knots; we may hope that he put the free cord to good uses.

FRENCH KINGS AND CHILDREN

A History of some French Kings. By Blanche Behm. (Macmillan and Co. 5s. net.)

"My children-friends asked me for a history of some French Kings. Here it is! It is not meant to instruct but to amuse. It is meant to make an impression, to awaken interest. and, finally, to stimulate to more earnest study of the subject.

"Children, it is for you to approve or condemn. A vous la parole!"

Thus Miss Blanche Behm gives the introductory pronunciamento to her book; and gives us to realise its scope and intention. In point of fact, however, while the book is framed and conceived as a children's book, and is quite adequate to that end, there is much in it that might very well serve a far older purpose. Unfortunately, French history is not a subject with which the ordinary Englishman is very familiar. The very need of such a book as this for children bespeaks its need for their parents. For if children of the present day are not made sufficiently aware of European history, then, assuredly, children of a decade or two back were left hopelessly in ignorance. We are slowly growing out of that frame of mind; but history has hitherto been held not as a branch of culture but as a branch of patriotism. The informative and educative value of so thrilling a study has been lost sight of in the desire to make swelling and earnest Britishers; so much so that the present writer lately heard a Londoner who had just returned from Spain express his profound astonishment at having seen British flags as trophies in a Spanish church. He seemed to think that they must have been stolen, since he could not recall having learnt of any battle in Spain (or, for that matter, anywhere else) that we had ever lost.

Therefore the need for such a book as this becomes at once apparent. For throughout it there is evident a very genuine, and in no way stimulated, interest in the tales of which she treats. It has an awkward fault in it, however; a fault that may seem indigenous to this manner of book, but which is quite an extraneous and unnecessary weed. It is not sufficiently historical. It may be, and undoubtedly is, a very happy conception to tell the doings of the Count of Charolais as though he were another Jack the Giant-killer, but it is a pity of pities to miss the opportunity of conveying the necessary historical atmosphere. It might have been done easily and simply by so deft a chronological touch as telling the contemporaneous English events in the course of the story. There are few things more mentally illuminative in history than parallel chronology, and the child need not be a stranger to the method. How admirably the method succeeds is manifest in the first chapter of this book, when the story of Louis XI., the "Universal Spider," as he is called, is told. The touches regarding Edward IV. of England throw a flood of light on the narrative. When the child is put to the sterner curriculum task of "dates" he or she is little likely to forget Louis and the Count of Charolais. The method is not uniformly adopted, however.

Yet it is somewhat ungracious to cavil at so admirable a book as this. One of the advantages of the author's method is that it enables her to portray character. She is, in fact, very properly more concerned with human beings than with dry-as-dust details. With some of her characterisation it is sometimes hard to agree; but then she is as much entitled to her reading of character as another. And at least she does not challenge disagreement as vigorously as do some of the great names in historical study. Her sketch of Louis is quite admirable. Her second story, too, is as good, and it complies no less with the chronology method that we have spoken of above. But each story is told with infinite spirit, and on their own merit as tales of deep interest they cannot fail to win the attention, whether it be of juveniles or of elder people. In short, it is a book to make a note of in view of subsequent birthdays.

SOME CORONATION ISSUES

The Coronation Service. (Henry Frowde. 2s. 6d., 3d., 2d., 1d.)

Hymns for the Coronation of King Georye V. (Skeffington and Son. 1s. net.)

Sermons on the Coronation. By Bishop Welldon, Revs. J. H. Pemberton, E. Grose Hodge, Douglas Macleane. (S.P.C.K.)

Forms of Prayer for General Use on 22nd June, 1911. (S.P.C.K. 1d., and 3s. 6d per 100.)

Forms of Prayer for General Use on 22nd June, 1911. (Henry Frowde. 5s., 4s., 3s. per 100.)

The Book of Common Prayer. Coronation Editions. (Henry Frowde. 4s. 6d., 3s. 6d., 2s. 6d.)

The Coronation Regalia. By W. H. Stacpoole. ("Whitaker's Almanack" Office. 1s. net.)

How and Why King George will be Crowned. By Joseph Hammond. (Skeffington and Son. 1s. net.)

A Coronation Souvenir. By Rev. S. Baring-Gould. (Skeffington and Son. 6d. net.)

As the time lessens which brings us nearer and nearer to the Coronation of King George and Queen Mary the interest of their subjects must necessarily increase. Whether it be in the manufacture and display of costly decorations, the erection of stands, the booking of seats to view the procession, the cult of the dainty sweet-pea, the turning up of roads, the latest fad in hats, or the small child with its piece of coloured ribbon—all point towards the great event of the year. And not least among the evidences of the coming ceremony are the books and pamphlets which continue to pour forth from many sections of the press.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE CORONATION SERVICE, HYMNS, SERMONS, FORMS OF PRAYER, PRAYER-BOOKS.

A beautiful book containing the Form and Order of the Service and Ceremonies which are to be observed in the Coronation is issued by Mr. Henry Frowde at 2s. 6d. It is bound in white and gold and well printed on hand-made paper. The letterpress is large and clear, the rubrics being in red. There are also 3d., 2d., and 1d. editions of the same service. Between royal blue covers Messrs. Skeffington and Son have collected eleven hymns, which are dedicated by special permission to their Majesties. Some of the tunes are by such well-known composers as Sir Frederick Bridge, Sir Walter Parratt, and Sir John Stainer, while the words are in many cases stirring and full of patriotic feeling. Mr. Martin S. Skeffington has written an additional or alternative verse to the National Anthem, which is well in accord with the spirit of the time.

Bishop Welldon is again well to the fore, being the compiler of the first of four sermons on the Coronation which are bound together and published under the direction of the Tract Committee. It is not stated if the discourses are intended for the use of any one in Holy Orders who cares to adopt them as his own, or whether they have been or will be preached by the authors themselves, or perhaps even have been written with the idea that there might be people who would care to read them during their leisure hours. In any case none of them is of very great length, but we think that if any idea of arrangement according to merit had been intended, the sermon of the Rev. Douglas Macleane should have occupied the first place.

The S.P.C.K. and the Oxford University Press have brought out copies of the Forms of Prayer commended by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York for use on Thursday, June 22nd. The prices vary from 1d. each to 3s. per 100. Some very beautiful Prayer-books are also issued by Mr. Henry Frowde, amongst which we would especially notice an ivory one of very handsome appearance. Two less expensive editions are nicely bound in blue and red cloth. Each of them has photos of the King and Queen as frontispieces, and contains the Coronation Service.

THE CORONATION REGALIA.

Mr. W. H. Stacpoole, in his book, "The Coronation Regalia," has brought together in a concise form an interesting amount of miscellaneous information, the result of painstaking research extending over forty works on the subject. The authorities cited are reliable and the illustrations good.

"How and Why King George will be Crowned" contains an ample and clear description of the object of the Coronation It forms with "A Coronation Souvenir" a cheap and adequate remembrance of the momentous occasion.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Pleasure Guide to Paris. (Nilsson and Co. 2s. 6d. net.)

IT is evident that the author of this guide-book is animated by the best of intentions, his desire being to protect adventurous and guileless foreigners who bravely wish to "peep behind the scenes" of Parisian diurnal and nocturnal life, from the wiles of the "sirens" (!) who parade their beauty on the "seductive rocks of the Parisian ocean." Amongst the objections we could make is that in most of the cafés and places of amusement indicated the unsophisticated foreigner will meet comparatively a great many more of his own countrymen, whatever be the clime he hails from, than pure Parisians. It is also a pity that the photographs illustrating this book should represent the fashions of eight or ten years ago, unless, of course, one considers them from a retrospective point of view. We should advise the reader not to place too much faith in these illustrations, which are somewhat fanciful, and often inaccurate.

In the part dealing with the theatres we note that the author alludes to one which is doomed to disappear shortly. Les Nouveautés will soon be torn down in the course of the prolongation of the Boulevard Haussman. Also the Restaurant Cubat, spoken of on page 27, has not existed for many years. The Travellers' Club now occupies the hôtel which belonged to the notorious Mme. de Païva.

In the chapters dealing with "Paris by Day" we note several inaccuracies. The Figaro offices and the Hôtel des Ventes are not "at the corner of the Rue de Richelieu, opposite the Rue Drouot," but in the last-named street itself; whilst the Café Cardinal is on the other side of the boulevard. And we beg to differ in opinion with the author when he says that "the visitor standing on the boulevard may see figuratively all Paris defile before him, and the animation and gaiety displayed perfectly astonishes and bewilders him, especially between the hours of 2 a.m. and 2 p.m."

We venture to say that the stranger who would let himself be lured from his home in the hopes of finding this supernatural gaiety on the "Grands Boulevards of Paris" would be sadly disappointed! Instead of seeing "all Paris defile before him," he would find a drab-looking crowd of anxious and careworn people—as a rule curiously inelegant. He might, indeed, be bewildered by the traffic! But if, contracting the habit of noctambulism, he should venture on the "lively" boulevards between one and three o'clock in the morning, he would doubtless meet very few people at all, or some about whom the less said the better.

"The Pleasure Guide to Paris" is on the whole conscientiously compiled; but it gives one the impression of having been written many years ago. The parts treating of the restaurants, with the price-lists, &c., may certainly be of great use to foreigners, but undoubtedly the whole book would have been improved if expressed in a simpler, more guide-like style, not aiming at "literary effects."

Learn of Me What Woman Is. (Herrick's "Hesperides.") (The Lotus Press, Dundee. 6d.)

WOMAN from the very beginning has been a mystery to the self-styled lord of creation; but because a mere man does not understand the "eternal feminine" it is no reason that she should be abused. The inane misogynist who has wasted his ingenuity in compiling this little work might better have employed such mental capacity as he possesses to a more useful purpose. His compilation is altogether a delusion and a snare, for his prejudiced mind only presents one side of a question, which, more or less, has agitated the world through all time. And in doing this he has the impudence to shelter himself under the wing of the late Rev. Mr. Herrick.

Alas! poor Herrick! You who were so fascinated by many women, by the "coral lips," the "lily hands," the "spotless necks," and the variously-coloured eyes of your Julia, your Perilla, Corinna, Myrrha, Silvia, Irene, and the rest—it is rather hard that you should, in a sense, have foisted upon you after all these years during which you have, we hope, been dwelling peacefully "with those that praise our God for that they served His world," the aberrations of "Sam Slick," and those of the various male characters in Miss Marie Corelli's early effort, "Vendetta," to mention no others.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Quoting from the elder Disraeli, the compiler, in an address to the reader, has the audacity to say—"The wisdom of the wise and the experience of the ages may be preserved by quotation;" and then proceeds to cull, in a one-sided way, every written line he can discover to the detriment of his subject. In some eighty pages our parson-poet, who is supposed to "boss the show," is only quoted twice; and his attack on each occasion is directed against the ridiculous feminine fashions of his time, and not against woman herself; and censorious wits of all periods have preceded or succeeded him on the same lines, as most works on costume will show. Thackeray is laid under contribution four times—only twice is he at all vitriolic, and then only in a very diluted way—but the compiler carefully avoids telling the reader that Thackeray wrote—

> . . . A high-bred English lady is the most complete of all Heaven's subjects in this world. In whom else do you see so much grace and so much virtue, so much faith and so much tenderness, with such a perfect refinement and chastity?

Such a woman was possibly the compiler's mother; but if she was, he must have forgotten it. And so we leave him to the dyspepsia, or whatever else it was, which prompted him to compile this uncalled-for attack on our womankind against all the rules of fair play.

Egypt and Israel: an Inquiry into the Influence of the More Ancient People upon Hebrew History and the Jewish Religion. And some Investigations into the Facts and Statements made as to Jesus of Nazareth. By WILLIS BREWER. Illustrated. (The Torch Press, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, U.S.A. $2 net.)

IT is very difficult to understand exactly what Mr. Brewer means in the book which bears the foregoing title. In fact, the only enlightenment on his object is to be found in the title, for the moment the reader plunges into the volume itself he is entangled in a mass of incoherences out of which he extricates himself with difficulty. When occasionally Mr. Brewer does happen to become comprehensible he does so in the form of platitudes which it was waste of ink and paper to put into permanent form.

Apparently his object is to show that Egyptian influence was paramount in Israel throughout the period of Old Testament history, although, somewhat curiously, he translates Mitzraim, Egypt as universally accepted, as "from enemies." Mr. Brewer's principal argument is apparently that the Biblical names have not been properly transliterated into English. There is, of course, something in his contention, but it is difficult to see how it affects the case which he has adopted. Moreover, if objection can be raised against transliterations which are universally accepted, still greater objection can be raised against the barbarous forms which Mr. Brewer wishes to substitute for them. To show that there is no exaggeration in describing the work as incoherent the following quotation is given haphazard:—

> But this is not to say that Jehoah was not the name at Neb-ah, which town seems the Nebo of the Jeremiah (48: 1, 22) and the Isaiah (15: 2) and the Numbers (32: 3, 38), but if so then Jehoah and the Chaldean god Nebo (Isaiah 46: 1) would seem the same, yet (47: 4-6) we find them not the same. The Neb-ah of the tablet, however, may be Neba^{c}h (Num. 32: 42), otherwise Ken-ath; but this town's names imply the worship of A-Nup or "A-Nub-is," Neba^{c}h means "to bark" and Kenaz means a "hunter," the Greek Kuon or Kuonas, meaning "dog," seeming involved as in the name of Chaleb or "dog" and Kenaz at ^{c} Heberon.

And so on for 548 pages.

On Acute Intestinal Toxaemia in Infants. By RALPH VINCENT, M.D. (Baillière, Tindall, and Cox. 3s. 6d.)

THE question of the milk supplied for the feeding of infants is one that is brought into prominence by this account of the work Dr. Vincent has carried out. The disease is one that causes such a large mortality that scientific investigation into its causation and prevention is of the highest interest. The present name is used by the author, as he points out that the usual title of Epidemic Diarrhœa should be abandoned, since constipation is often a prominent symptom. In the usual treatment of milk for infants some means of heating or Pasteurisation is carried out, and the result is that the acid-forming bacteria—streptococcus lacticus in particular—are destroyed, and as the acid reaction they give to milk inhibits the growth of fermentative bacteria, this is of course undesirable, as one of the best natural preservatives is thus destroyed. The spores of the fermentative bacteria are left behind and develop, in many cases soon becoming sufficiently numerous first to injure the resisting power of the infant's intestine in which they are growing, and then to produce a toxaemia, going on in severe cases to death.

The refrigeration of the milk in place of heating is the remedy Dr. Vincent advocates, since he thinks that, deplorable as it is that milk should be allowed to be widely contaminated with fermentative bacteria, the next worst thing is to destroy their natural enemy, the acid-forming bacteria. He has carried out experiments on kittens under conditions simulating those occurring in the feeding of babies, and the results have completely agreed with his chemical observations.

FICTION

Rosanne. By ALGERNON GISSING. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

Knight Checks Queen. By MRS. L. LOCKHART LANG. (Alston Rivers. 6s.)

ROSANNE.

A STUDY of a woman of wayward moods is the hard task which Mr. Gissing has attempted. Rosanne is a lady whose wildly extravagant tastes have forced her husband to leave England, but after the separation, made rather in anger than in sorrow, she devotes herself to a religious life as a member of an Anglican sisterhood. Whilst the man is seeking to repair his fortunes in America, the wife is wandering among the highways and hedges in the guise of a missionary to the gipsies and other travelling folk of the road. Several years are spent among the caravans of these people, but the time comes when she meets a certain artist, who teaches her that there is a whole side of her life which she is leaving unsatisfied. At first she is a docile pupil; religion has been her refuge rather than her home, and as far as the sisterhood is concerned she is bound by no vows. The great complication arises with the return of her lawful husband; he is ready to forgive and forget all that caused their old disputes, and is once more in prosperous circumstances. Friends try to bring them together, but Rosanne (the woman of moods) cannot decide whether to return to the old allegiance or to follow her artist-lover. Her evasion of a choice does not make a conclusion which will satisfy many readers, but it is certainly the only ending consistent with probability. The book has its merits as a study of character, but, though we were interested in the fate of Rosanne, we found her story dull in places. Brighter dialogue and more interesting minor characters would have enlivened the tale without obscuring the main issue.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

KNIGHT CHECKS QUEEN.

Artistic temperaments and their disturbing effect on married life provide the theme for rather too many of the novels of to-day. Elementary text-books on science tell us how the mixing of certain chemicals will produce an explosion, and when the novelist's primer comes to be written we shall probably meet with some such paragraph as this:—"Take a commonplace man and a woman with a genius (real or imagined), marry them in the fifth or sixth chapter, and an explosion will almost immediately result. The experiment may slightly damage the materials used and will certainly cause them to separate one from the other. A short interval should be allowed for cooling, during which a profitable discussion may be held on the incompatible nature of the two elements. It is usually desirable to unite them once again, but this should be done in the last chapter as imagination can then supply all subsequent events." It is on these simple lines that Mrs. Lockhart Lang has proceeded, and we can at least admire the boldness which enables the author to use the receipt and give the result to the public as something new. In the beginning of the book Paul, a man stated to be of sound mind, marries Anne in order to pay for the training of her voice, although he himself does not think that it is quite the thing for his lady wife to perform in public, even in grand opera. Anne, aged sixteen, weds Paul out of gratitude for the benefits which she is about to receive, and for some years afterwards they live amicably in separate continents. When the pair are thrown together again, the wife is a singer of rising fame, and the usual clash of temperaments results. Novels of this kind have but two varieties—the one in which the lady behaves with propriety, and the one in which she does not. Anne is of the former class, and her conduct is so good that one wonders why she and her husband play at cross purposes for so long. There is no excuse save that without their stupidity there would have been no book. Whether this is an extenuating circumstance is quite another question.

The Mountain of God. By E. S. STEVENS. (Mills and Boon. 4s. 6d. net.)

MR. STEVENS takes for his ostensible theme the midsummer madness of a passion between a white woman and a Moslem named Schmidt Pasha, whose Austrian blood counts for nothing in his character. The inevitable parting is not quite the end of the book, which is sufficiently indeterminate to leave hope that the heroine will eventually unite herself to the right man.

The story depends for its interest not so much upon the plot as upon the excellence of the author's style and the sympathy and insight which he evinces in the portrayal of Syria and the Syrians. He is an enthusiastic admirer of the Bahai cult, so much so that one suspects him of being himself an adherent of that mysterious but excellently ethical religion, which has converts "even in America." This should not be "even," but "of course."

Religion among these people, he tells us, is "an internal rhapsody, a singing of the heart, as natural as the unfolding of the pimpernel in the sun or the glad impulse of the lark into the spring sky."

To his hero, however, religion is "philosophy upon its knees"—quite a good epigram. The book abounds with small felicitous touches, and with single luminous phrases which picture the curious atmosphere of Syria, a land which has a foam of European culture, but the deep sea of Eastern tradition perpetually rolling beneath. The reader will gain a clearer knowledge of the hopes, ideals, and performance of young Turkey from this book than from a dozen carefully reasoned articles by special correspondents. To conclude, we cannot resist quoting the delightful story of Nasreddin Hodja and the Figs. It tells how Nasreddin Hodja rode into Konia with a present for the Padishah. His wife had told him to take some very large turnips; but the turnips were heavy, so the Hodja substituted figs:—

> So he walked into Konia with the figs instead, which were at that time so common that the oka could be bought for half a piastre. When he arrived, Tamur Lenk had just finished his midday meal, and was in a good humour. When they told him that Nasreddin Hodja was there, he commanded him to be brought in, for he had heard of his simplicity. Then Nasreddin Hodja presented the figs he had brought. Tamur Lenk thanked him, and bade him sit at a distance, and take off his turban. With some surprise, the Hodja obeyed. Then Tamur Lenk took a fig, and aimed it so well that it hit the Hodja's bald head. And each time that the fig hit his head Nasreddin Hodja exclaimed piously: "Alhamdu'lillah!" (Thank God). Presently the Padishah stopped, and asked: "Why, O Hodja, do you thank God every time a fig falls on your head?" "O Padishah," replied the Hodja, "I thank the Almighty that I did not take the advice of my wife, and bring turnips."

Jane Oglander. By MRS. BELLOC LOWNDES. (Heinemann. 6s.)

AT first sight it would appear that the woman whose name forms the title of Mrs. Belloc Lowndes' latest novel is not the one who exerts the greatest influence throughout the pages of the story. Mrs. Maule, half English and half Hellenic, is one of those women who, partly on account of beauty and fascination, and partly owing to a lack of any spiritual restraint, are able to wreak much havoc with the lives of men with whom they are intimately associated. Jane, on the other hand, is the type of woman so often depicted in fiction as representing the average Englishwoman—gentle, true, self-reliant, capable of deep affection but intensely proud and reserved where her feelings are concerned. In spite, however, of the great dissimilarity of the two women, they are friends of many years' standing until General Lingard, Jane's fiancé, falls under the spell thrown over so many of Mrs. Maule's admirers. And even then Jane has no word of reproach for either her friend or her lover. She accepts what she considers the inevitable, and is even cajoled by this half woman and half siren into trying to persuade Mr. Maule, the long-suffering and invalid husband, to offer no opposition to his wife's application for their marriage to be annulled in order that she may marry Jane's sweetheart. Mr. Maule, however, in spite of his delicate state of health, sees far more than his friends imagine of what goes on under his roof, and chooses his own way of arranging matters, which brings the book to an unexpected and somewhat startling conclusion.

From start to finish Mrs. Belloc Lowndes is able to sustain the reader's interest in each of her characters. They are all well and powerfully drawn—that of General Lingard during his passion for Mrs. Maule while still retaining his love and reverence and continual feeling of want of Jane, being perhaps the most delicately and subtly indicated of them all. We do not think that any one who has the good fortune to start "Jane Oglander" will be able to put the book down until the last word is read.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A Reconstructed Marriage. By AMELIA E. BARR. (Fisher Unwin. 6s.)

THE cold, uncharitable, sanctimonious atmosphere of a Scotch home consisting of a mother, her two daughters and her son, the master of an iron-foundry, is the scene of Miss Barr's novel. But the family has none of the light-hearted, unconscious humour of the Wee McGregor's home circle. It is a silent, dour family, full of bitterness and naggings. The mother rules with a rod of iron her two faded thirty-year-old daughters, who realise to the full with rage and hatred that they have been given no chance. The old lady seeks to wield the same control over her son, but he, with set jaw and steely eyes, casts aside the maternal authority, and, in face of execration and crocodile tears, marries an Englishwoman over the border. The ugly sisters, delighted at the prospect of some excitement, however tragic, in their monotonous lives, await developments anxiously—the developments consisting of the home-coming of their brother and his "foreign" bride. The family is a rich one, and is so constituted that they are all to live under the same roof, the mother, the sisters, and the strange daughter-in-law, whose temperament is so entirely antagonistic. From the moment of her arrival she realises the persistent enmity of the old lady, whose jealousy and fury at being thwarted and set aside by her son convert her into a hard, mean virago, full of petty spite and perpetual quarrels. The two sisters, overawed from childhood by their awful mother, back her up in her attitude towards her son's wife, and the son, torn between his love for his wife and the sense of filial respect, which prevents him from expelling his mother from the house or of retiring from it himself, lives in a condition of continual worry, grief, and anger. The action of the novel is provided by the results of the clash of these five temperaments, and just as a house which is divided against itself cannot stand, so does this house fall inevitably, irrevocably. The final scene between mother and son, in which she calls upon God to curse him, is one of great strength. The whole book is, indeed, a masterpiece of gloom and loathing, and fills one with a devout feeling of thankfulness that one has been spared the acquaintance of such horrible people.

THE THEATRE

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM"

A TRIUMPH. Scenes of surpassing beauty, gossamer links which delight whilst they baffle exact comprehension. We must needs be of "such stuff as dreams are made on" to appreciate to the full the feast of splendour which Sir Herbert Tree has presented to us. We, however, are enrolled amongst the "mortals" and can only treat the "Fairies" with all the limitations which bodily substance involve.

We think that "A Midsummer Night's Dream" is one of the most difficult of Shakespeare's plays to pourtray adequately. It is very near to extravaganza, and its rhyming verse, unless delivered by educated and talented actors and actresses, might easily be distressing. Beautiful thoughts abound clothed in less majestic attire than we are accustomed to in other of Shakespeare's plays.

The Dream should be conceived of as endowed with the delicacy, refinement, and inconsequence of the ordinary dream of healthful slumber. A certain eeriness there may be—as in the conception of the infatuation of the Queen of the Fairies for the embodiment of an ass; but the whole suggestion of the play is the delightful incongruity of its scheme—the sort of illusion which presents itself to the sleeping imagination uncontrolled by the wakeful consciousness.

Without any desire to appear to be didactic, we have offered these few preliminary ideas because from our point of view criticism of the presentment of the play must be based on them. Proceeding on those lines, we consider Sir Herbert Tree's production to be almost perfect. Carping criticism could only be the outcome of spleen, which would be unpardonable amidst such delightful surroundings.

In the first Act we were particularly won by the excellence of delivery by Lysander and Hermia of the difficult lines—

> LYS.: Ah me! for aught that ever I could read,
> Could ever hear by tale or history,
> The course of true love never did run smooth:
> But either it was different in blood—
> HER.: O Cross! too high to be enthralled to low!
> LYS.: Or else misgraffed, in respect of years.
> HER.: O Spite! too old to be engaged to young!
> LYS.: Or else it stood upon the choice of friends—
> HER.: O Hell! to choose love by another's eyes.

In the passage quoted, and in those which follow, Miss Laura Cowie and Mr. Basil Gill deserve the high commendation that they were centred in themselves and appeared to be wholly unconscious of an audience. Herein, we think, lies the perfection of the delivery of set speeches. Theseus and Hippolyta, Demetrius and Helena, were less successful in grasping this element. Miss Frances Dillon (Hippolyta) should especially be warned against delivering to empty space in the direction of the auditorium such a passage as:—

> Four days will quickly steep themselves in nights;
> Four nights will quickly dream away the time;
> And then the moon, like to a silver bow
> New bent in heaven, shall behold the night
> Of our solemnities.

The lines are intended to be addressed to Theseus to sooth him when he had addressed her:—

> Now, fair Hippolyta, our nuptial hour
> Draws on apace; four happy days bring in > Another moon: but, O, methinks, how slow
> This old moon wanes! she lingers my desires,
> Like a step-dame, or a dowager,
> Long withering out a young man's revenue.

The above-named actors and actresses may be reminded that the glories of Sadler's Wells have—alas! in some respects—departed, and the worst features of the mime of the 'fifties need not and should not be perpetuated. The falling into ranks of the minor characters, the set expression of studied fascination assumed by those of more importance, whilst the actor with the message to deliver—the set speech—inflates his lungs, squares his shoulders, and addresses himself to the audience—who should be non-existent to him—all these are now seen to be false art. The criticism is not intended to allege serious infraction of a salutary rule, but as a friendly warning to avoid it.

The Fairies were entirely delightful. Miss Margery Maude as Titania was so delicate, refined, and ethereal that the generous mind was revolted at the scurvy trick played on her by Oberon and Puck—"Methought I was enamoured of an ass." Oberon, as rendered by Miss Evelyn D'Alroy, was a particularly personable and attractive King of the Fairies. Puck, played by Master Burford Hampden, was indeed the spirit of mischief—and precocity. We have made a pause advisedly between mischief and precocity, because Master Hampden may develop the former attribute as much as he likes; but he must not be allowed by over-praise to develop the latter in undue proportion, and so gradually evolve that most unpleasant phenomenon—the infant variety. The boy is quite clever; let it be impressed on him that he has much to learn, and perhaps something to forget.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In approaching Mr. Bourchier's performance, we greatly regret that we had not the opportunity of seeing Sir Herbert Tree's presentation of Bottom, the Weaver. That Mr. Bourchier's conception is very clever and is immensely appreciated by the gods and others was abundantly clear at the initial performance. We laughed consumedly; but rang there the ring of conviction in our laughter? In the second scene of Act I., at Quince's House, Mr. Bourchier was entirely diverting, and Bottom to the life. He was good as the ass beloved of Titania—broad farce much of it, but not out of touch with the author's intention. In the interior of Theseus's Palace (the final Act) Mr. Bourchier let himself go, and the question is—Did he not go too far?

What was Shakespeare's intention? We think it was that a company of his poor subjects wished to do honour to their Duke on the occasion of his approaching nuptials. The idea—entirely whimsical—verged, of course, on burlesque when these illiterate folk determined upon giving a performance of Ovid's tragic idyl, "Pyramus and Thisbe." Shakespeare's sense of the incongruous was certainly running wild—he was immersed in burlesque, if not in low comedy. Did he, however, contemplate that a haughty and illustrious Duke, in company with his betrothed, and surrounded by his Court, would have brooked a harlequinade, or performance by modern music-hall knockabouts? If such was Shakespeare's sense of fitness, Mr. Bourchier's performance of Pyramus is justified. If, on the other hand, as we think there is evidence to prove, it was the author's intention that these players, who stood in awe of their ruler, would have played before him—with such poor means as were at their disposal—in a seemly manner, we think it must be held that Mr. Bourchier's reading cannot be approved.

If the Duke, who had just ruled out one performance because it savoured of—

> . , . some satire keen and critical
> Not consorting with a nuptial ceremony, permitted an exhibition of not very refined buffoonery to be prolonged before him, we should hold that it was time that an inquest were held into the state of his mind. However, no doubt we are hyper-critical.

We close our notice of an evening reminiscent of unexampled beauty, graceful acting, and extraordinary merriment with sincere thankfulness to Sir Herbert Tree for having provided an entertainment so exquisite, which all London and the provinces, Imperial, Colonial, and foreign visitors, will witness with unalloyed delight.

C. C.

"PASSERS BY" AT WYNDHAM'S THEATRE

Peter Waverton left the house of the girl to whom he was engaged to be married unaccountably sick of himself and every one else. In all probability he taxied to his apartments in Piccadilly, for the night was cold, muddy, and full of a suggestion of impending fog. His temper was not improved when he found that his man Pine was entertaining a peculiarly Dickensian four-wheel cabdriver, who answered to the name of "Nighty." He not only sent the intruder away sharply, but he gave Pine a month's notice to quit. The manservant made no defence, but presently, when Waverton had soothed his ruffled nerves with a cigarette, he became respectfully confidential. He said that he spent all the time he could spare from his work at Waverton's window overlooking Piccadilly, and the passers by fascinated him. He found considerable interest in the study of types, and so expert had he become that he was now able to divide humanity into several classes. He begged pardon for the liberty, and reminded Waverton that the window of his own room faced a blank wall. "Nighty" was one of the few remaining four-wheel cabdrivers who stood on the rank opposite the apartments. Finding him very human he had cultivated his acquaintance. He confessed without contrition that he frequently entertained "Nighty" in his master's delightfully furnished sitting-room, and gave him an occasional cigar and a frequent whisky-and-soda.

The dryness and unexpectedness of this statement amused Waverton very much. Pine was an old servant, but a man in whom Waverton had never considered it necessary to take any personal interest. Bored to extinction with himself, and a little ashamed of having shown his boredom to the girl to whom he was engaged, Waverton first apologised to the girl in question over the telephone, and then took Pine to the window. He pointed to a man who was picking up refuse outside the cab-shelter. "What type," he asked, "does that creature belong to?" "Not to any human type," said Pine. "He's a waster." "Have him up," said Waverton. "We'll see. Bring 'Nighty' up too. I want to apologise to him for my bad temper." The man, greatly against his inclination, obeyed orders, and presently a little, hirsute, dirty, perfectly-satisfied, ingeniously sewn-up creature slipped into the room. His boots were miracles. His pockets bulged with broken things, cigarette-ends, crusts, and bones. He sat down and blinked at Waverton, rather resenting the interference with his movements and hoping that he might not be unduly delayed on his way to the Embankment, where, having been fed by Mr. Miles, he could make himself perfectly comfortable for the night. "Nighty" arrived also, and proved to be both a philosopher and an optimist—a rare combination. Upon these two common types of the street Pine waited, and Waverton derived a certain amount of amusement and consolation from their complete satisfaction with their lot. Eventually, having given them supper, whisky, and cigars, and a cordial invitation to return whenever they needed him, Waverton packed them off.

Before sitting down to read and smoke he had another look at the street. This time he could see nothing. A heavy fog had put out the lights and enveloped the town in a thick, nauseous blanket. Pine cleared away the remnants of supper, and commented characteristically on the weather. "The poor young woman standing in the doorway," said he, "with a nasty cough, is in a bad way. She got on the wrong 'bus and now can't find her way to the right one." Having tasted the pleasure of dispensing hospitality to those who seldom got it, Waverton told Pine to bring the girl up so that she might wait in his warm rooms until the fog lifted. As soon as she entered—refined-looking, dressed with a certain amount of taste—it was immediately obvious from her barely hidden agitation that she regretted having left the doorstep. It was obvious also that Waverton recognised her voice. He sent Pine away, and then out of the half-whimsical, half-cynical self-indulgence which he had allowed himself in order to get rid of depression and boredom there sprang an altogether unexpected and indescribably painful meeting. The girl was Margaret Summers. She had been the companion of Waverton's stepsister, Lady Hurley. Waverton met her at his stepsister's house when he was not much more than a boy. They had fallen in love, had met surreptitiously in the quiet hours—unseen, unheard. When finally he had taken his place among men, not so much callous as inexperienced as to the results of such meetings, he had written to Margaret and had received no replies. He found that she had left his stepsister, and his search for her was abortive. He was now engaged to be married, and here was Margaret. There was no coincidence in the meeting. The house in which he lived stood in Piccadilly along which the great main stream of life came and went.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Surprise and fright gradually gave way to quiet questions and answers. Waverton came to know that his stepsister must have suspected something; she had intercepted the letters and packed the girl about her business—just the sort of thing that Lady Hurley would do. However, there it was. They had loved madly, had been swept apart, and had made other interests and anchorages. At any rate Margaret had the same claim upon Waverton which any other human being had that night. His rooms were hers until the fog lifted. Margaret, however, had a strong reason for going home, however bad the fog was. Someone was there who would miss her. "Husband?" "No." "Who then?" "My boy." "Then you're a widow?" "No. Perhaps I ought to have said our boy. . . ."

To Waverton, blasé, cynical, dissatisfied, this sentence was electrical. He put down the photograph of the girl to whom he was engaged and stood very still. A chaos of thoughts entirely new, exciting, frightful, full of joy, full of hopelessness, rioted through his brain. He had a boy of six! The thing was unbelievable, stupendous. Where was he? What was he like? What had she told him about his father? "Let's go," he said. "I can't stand still." It was no good. The fog was too black. A curious situation evolved itself. The mother, who was not a wife, took the room of the father, the man who was no husband, and had never seen his son; and when the mother left the room the father, with a new world opened before him, sat down to think. At his elbow stood the portrait of the girl to whom he was engaged to be married. Nemesis has a wonderful imagination.

The following morning the awkwardness of all that seemed quite natural in electric light was all too plain. Waverton was found by Pine asleep on the sofa. It was not early, and already the waster Burns had returned to the man who said that he would be a friend. He had been run over by a milk van, and Waverton rose from his dreams. Burns, brought up, told his story. He must be seen by a doctor, and while a doctor was on his way Waverton dressed. He returned to find Margaret bathing the waster's head. As soon as they were alone all the fatherhood of the man broke into flame. But Margaret had been thinking too. She and her boy must go on alone. Waverton, however, was no fool. He knew that argument was a waste of time. "Very well," said he, "keep the boy to yourself. One thing is certain. He must be an ugly little beggar." "Ugly!" The mother was at the door. "Ugly! I'll show you." And when eventually she returned with the boy he proved to be not much less a beautiful little man than she had painted him. "Hullo, boy," said the father, trembling so violently that he could hardly speak. "Hullo, man," said the boy, who showed a friendly line of small white teeth.

It was an appalling moment for Waverton. What was he to say to this child to whom he was a stranger? He asked to be left alone with him. He had not the remotest idea what to do when alone. He gave him his watch. He asked him if he liked bears. He sang him a song and, finally seizing an excuse, he caught him in his arms, kissed him, and held him very tight. According to Pine there was much human nature in the streets. What would he have said if he had blundered into the room at that moment?

Waverton had forgotten an arrangement to motor down to some place or other with Lady Hurley and Beatrice, the girl to whom he was engaged. They come to fetch him. Lady Hurley recognised in Margaret the girl she had more or less flung into the streets. The boy—whose is he? "Mine," said Waverton.

Three weeks passed. Margaret, still in love with Waverton, had brought her boy daily to his rooms. This man and this woman were playing with fire again. The boy had brought them more closely together than they had ever been before. What was to happen to them and to Beatrice? Who knows? Meantime there was Burns, as much a child as the child—Burns without his beard, clean, civilised, a worker in the house, a resentful worker who regretted his beard as much as he pined for the Embankment, longing to be on the road again. A gorgeous idea came into his head. To spite Pine he would take the boy to see rabbits at play and to smell the scent of haystacks. The mother returned, found Pine and "Nighty" in a state of fright and agitation. Burns had apparently kidnapped her child.

At three o'clock in the morning there was no news. In his motor Waverton had gone out desperately. The police had been informed. Margaret, unable to sleep or stand still, had a companion in Beatrice. These two had talked disjointedly and intimately. Beatrice had discovered that Margaret still loved the man she was to marry. The girl, whose life had up to that moment been undisturbed by any of the truth of things as they are, had already come to the conclusion that Waverton loved only one woman, not herself, and, finally, when the recovered boy, exquisitely asleep, was placed again into his mother's arms and carried off to bed, she relinquished the man to whom she was engaged. The story ended, as all good stories should end—happily. Margaret and Waverton had found one another and would separate no more.

Roughly this is Mr. Haddon Chambers' play, a play of which he may well be proud. To give any idea of its humour, philosophy, kindliness, charm, and optimism is impossible. It must be seen to be believed. It is so good, so beautiful, so moving, so well acted, and so well produced that it deserves to run for a year; and those people who do not see it once, twice, and even three times will be all the poorer.

"THE TERRORIST" AT THE DUKE OF YORK'S

THE new one-Act play which precedes "The Lily" at the Duke of York's Theatre depicts a side of life which is not often so forcibly shown on the English stage. The scene is laid in a châlet in a remote province of the Russian Empire, and opens to disclose a villainous-looking servant placing a dirty piece of paper, upon which is written the death-sentence of the Governor, in one of the drawers of his desk. The Governor's sister, by whose authority the household has removed to this distant region, and who has the place surrounded by soldiers for fear of the Terrorists, finds the paper, and is very much alarmed for her brother's safety. The Governor is greatly annoyed to find that his household has been removed, and on going to the châlet which his sister has chosen and surrounded by soldiers expresses his displeasure at the action. His sister tells him that she has adopted this course in order to ensure his personal safety. Nevertheless he gives orders for the soldiers to be dismissed, but is agitated to read the notice written on the paper. Meanwhile a young lady has arrived, ostensibly in answer to an advertisement for a governess. After a short interview with her, the sister comes back to her brother in great consternation and says that the girl is concealing something in her muff, and that she believes she is the one deputed to kill him. Even as she speaks the handle of the door moves in a most mysterious manner, and the young Terrorist is admitted. She immediately makes a dash for the Governor, who, disguising his fear, asks her to be seated, and wishes to relieve her of her muff. The young woman, however, is not to be enticed by any gallantry, and demands to know whether the man before her is the Governor. The sister escapes to give warning to the soldiers, the servant having basely deserted his post, and then ensue the most interesting and exciting moments of the play.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Terrorist and her victim are in the house alone, she in a most agitated state, partly on account of her mission from the Society and partly on account of the Governor having been in his youthful days responsible for the death of her father, while he does his best to temporise until assistance can arrive. He does not disguise the fact from her that he is afraid, and tells her that as a rule "courage is the concealment of funk," but also endeavours to point out that he held just the same sort of revolutionary ideas when he was twenty. During the interview some very pertinent little gems in the way of philosophy are dropped, and the tension is at last relieved by the arrival of the Colonel and two soldiers, who endeavour to arrest the Terrorist. The Governor, however, will not allow this, and points out to the Colonel, who is intoxicated, that he should not have allowed the girl to pass if he knew her to be seeking his life, thus proving to the Colonel that he was aware of his wish to step into his shoes after his murder. To this the Colonel has nothing to say, and he departs, leaving the two alone again. This time, however, the girl is unarmed; she thanks the Governor for saving her life, and leaves to go to her friends after giving him the Russian salute for the Resurrection. Miss Mary Forbes as the Terrorist scores a great success. Throughout the interview the rise and fall of her emotion is most powerfully felt until, at the thought of her father's death, it culminates in her final decision to shoot the Governor just as she is seized upon by the soldiers. Mr. Lawrence Irving as the Governor was all that could be desired. He acted his part in a most realistic manner, the suggestion of the deeper feelings underlying his stern exterior being most finely depicted. Miss Beatrice Smith as the sister was also very good, and the trifle forms a very pleasant curtain-raiser.

"The Lily" has lost nothing of its interest by the transference to another theatre, while Miss Henrietta Watson as Odette, a part previously played by Miss Geraldine Olliffe, received a well merited round of applause.

GENERAL BOULANGER

By Frank Harris

Another Antony like Guy de Maupassant, one might say, held in strong toils of grace by a woman and brought to suicide by his devotion. I would not retell this old story, but that there are immense differences between the man of action and the artist-writer, and certain episodes in Boulanger's life, and these the most important, are passing unrecorded and unnoticed. The historians are at their old game of telling what suits them and leaving untold all that they do not appreciate—which is usually the better half of the story. For example, here is M. Arthur Meyer, the owner-editor of the Gaulois, who was intimately connected with General Boulanger, and who had devoted a couple of chapters to Boulangisme in his book "Ce que mes yeux ont vu," missing the most dramatic moments of the drama. Boulanger failed, and, accordingly, M. Meyer treats him as a negligible quantity; but if he had succeeded, M. Meyer would have discovered virtues in him which would throw ordinary men and their achievements into obscurity. And yet Boulanger came very near success—within a moment of it, indeed—when one effort would have given him a crown. It is worth while to remember this, and to understand the reasons of his failure. M. Meyer says that Boulangisme failed: "Boulanger fell from his famous horse because he had taken his love behind him on the crupper. Madame de Bonnemains herself was content, it appears, to agree with this view; but it is not the truth, or rather it is not the whole truth, not even the most important part of the truth. . . ."

Let me first say just a word or two about some incidents in Boulanger's history before he made himself known in the political field as a Radical under the ægis of M. Clémenceau. He had entered the Army in 1856, and in the Franco-German War had won the reputation of a smart soldier. He was made Brigadier-General by the Duc d'Aumale: He first began to be known as War Minister under M. de Freycinet in 1886, when he introduced some genuine reforms benefiting the common soldier; portraits of him began to figure in the casernes. In April, 1887, he took up a bold attitude against the Germans in connection with the Schnaebele frontier incident, and from that moment he was regarded by the mob as the man destined to give France her revenge. When Freycinet fell in December, 1886, Boulanger was retained by M. Goblet at the War Office, but by May, 1887, his popularity had grown so great that Goblet was glad to get rid of him by resigning. A legend had begun to form itself about him; the Paris mob clamoured for their "brav' Général" with the golden beard and black horse, and a song was written of him with the refrain: "C'est Boulanger qu'il nous faut," which was soon in all mouths.

His popularity had many effects. M. Clémenceau got frightened of his protégé and dropped him. M. Rouvier, who formed the next Cabinet, declined to take him as a colleague, and sent him instead to Clermont-Ferrand to command an Army Corps. The blow helped the General instead of hurting him. As soon as the news was published, the mob rushed to greet Boulanger at his hotel in Paris, accompanied him to the Lyons Station, and even tried to take the locomotive from the train in order to prevent their favourite from leaving Paris.

Boulanger had already been taken up by the Comte Dillon, a man of affairs, of infinite energy, and some ability. Dillon brought Arthur Meyer to him. Arthur Meyer at once put himself in connection with the Marquis de Beauvoir, chef du cabinet of the Comte de Paris.

Early in 1888 one heard that Boulanger had shown insubordination by coming to Paris. Every one thought he had come to intrigue; he had come in disguise, we were told. The truth was Boulanger came to Paris to see Madame de Bonnemains, who happened to be ill. He came again, and this time the Republican leaders took notice of the insubordination, and deprived him of his command. The counsel of inquiry of five generals went even further, and removed his name from the Army List.

His enemies had done their very best to help him to the front. So long as he was in the Army he could do nothing; he was tied by discipline to subordination. If his enemies had been wise, instead of turning him out of the Army they would have given him a still higher command and sent him to Algiers or Cochin China, and thus kept him out of the way. But, like fools, they freed him from control and made the way plain before him.

"Money," cried Dillon to Arthur Meyer; "money is wanted; twenty-five thousand francs at once for electioneering purposes!" Arthur Meyer went to the Marquis de Beauvoir, and they both went to the Duchesse d'Uzès. Before they had finished speaking the Duchesse handed them the cheque.

General Boulanger stood for the department of the Nord, demanding a revision of the Constitution. He was elected trumphantly. Money began to flow in from all sides. A party was formed in the Chamber to support him. In a month he was a personage. His mistakes even seemed to help him. He had a duel with M. Floquet, a civilian ten years his senior, and was wounded by him; nothing checked his popularity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In 1888 he resigned his seat as a protest against the reception given by the Chamber to his revisionist proposals. A score of constituencies at once vied with each other to select him as their representative. Wisely advised, he stood for Paris and was returned by an overwhelming and utterly undreamed of majority.

His moment had come. I am able to tell the rest of the story as an eye-witness told it. But first it is necessary to get the facts in one's mind. Boulanger was supported by the whole of the Legitimist party, who believed that he would use the revision of the Constitution to put a Bourbon on the throne. He was supported by a wing of the Radical Republicans, headed by M. Laguerre, one of the best speakers in the Chamber, and by Henri Rochefort, one of the ablest of French journalists. He was backed besides by all the malcontents and by all those hot-heads who were eager for war with Germany—in fact by all those who have since grouped themselves behind M. Déroulède. Here were cards enough with which to play the great game if only Boulanger was elected for Paris.

On the evening of the declaration of the poll a dinner was given to General Boulanger at Durand's, in the Rue Royale, just in front of the Madeleine. The news got about, and the whole of the great place was filled with young students and agitators. Suddenly it was announced that Boulanger had been elected for Paris by a majority of hundreds of thousands. In an hour the crowd became a multitude; the dinner turned into a sort of triumph. The dining-room was a private room on the first floor. A constant stream of people went up the stairs, and passed by the room in order to salute General Boulanger, who could be seen through the open door seated at the head of the table, with Rochefort, Dillon, and Laguerre about him. All the while from the crowd outside came the cry like the refrain of a great hymn—fifty thousand voices chanting the two words.

Vive Boulanger, vive Boulanger—

The scene inside the room was extraordinary. Some twenty people had been invited to the dinner, and sat about talking.

Every now and then one of them would go to the window; one could almost have walked on the heads of the crowd as far as the eye could see. About ten o'clock the excitement reached its height. Boulanger seemed the most unconcerned person in the room. He was over fifty years of age, but looked about forty. He had brown hair and a golden moustache and beard, good blue eyes, and frank features; he was broad-shouldered, stoutly made, rather below middle height. He looked better on horseback than walking, for he was very short-legged.

Again and again rose the cry, "Vive Boulanger!"

Boulanger got up and went to one of the windows. A friend touched him on the arm, and pointing in the direction of the Elysée Palace, said: "It's not four hundred steps to the Elysée, General; are you going?"

"No, no," he said quickly, "that would be madness, 'restons dans l'ordre.'"

"But one does not find a crown there," said the friend.

"No, no," he repeated, "everything will come to pass quietly, with a little patience. Speak to ——: he will convince you."

Dillon, Rochefort, Laguerre were all of the same opinion. Their blindness was extraordinary. Any one with eyes in his head could have seen that the moment of action had come. The crowd would have followed him anywhere; it was enthusiastic; three or four thousand students down there ready and willing to tear open every door in the Elysée with their bare hands, and no one knew better than General Boulanger, who had been Minister of War, how to give orders to other Generals and to the troops in Paris and near it. But Boulanger and all the Boulangists had been taken by surprise by the speedy success; nothing had been foreseen, nothing had been prepared. The fateful moment drifted past.

Every one to-day talks of Napoleon III. with contempt; but no one should forget that, poor thing as Napoleon III. was, he was quite willing to risk his life, and did risk it again and again. He came into France twice as a Pretender, and twice came to grief and was sent to prison. If he could not foresee the moment or prepare it, at any rate he took the risk, and tried even when he had no chance of success. But when Boulanger had every chance he did not try. Neither Madame de Bonnemains nor Rochefort nor Dillon could have stopped him if he had wanted to risk the stroke. The moment came; but the man was wanting.

M. Constans was Minister of the Interior; he, too, had been alarmed by Boulanger's rise, by the election, by the coming together of so vast a crowd. He too waited to get law and order on his side; but as Minister of the Interior he got it; within a month the Ministry resolved to prosecute Boulanger for treason, and a warrant was issued for his arrest, to the wonder of everyone (for there was not a particle of justice in arresting him). Boulanger fled from Paris on the first of April, before the warrant could be executed, and went to Brussels and then to London.

The first night in London he dined with a friend in Park-lane, and the friend, after dinner, asked him why he had not struck the blow that January evening in Paris. He answered: "Je n'avais pas un seul atout dans mon jeu" (I had not a single trump in my hand). One smiled: a pretender must find his trumps in his heart and make them if he lacks them. After he had thrown up the game and left Paris, his friends all thought that his chance had come, though the court had tried and condemned him for treason in his absence. Both Arthur Meyer and the Comte de Paris thought it was time for him to make an effort, but he had lost the game when he left France on the first of April. If he had returned he would have been arrested within fifty miles of the frontier. and would probably have been shot without anger and without pity by M. Constans and M. Clemenceau. He had missed his chance that January night when he won the election in Paris.

But why did he not return to Paris and risk everything during the summer or during the next winter in Jersey? Madame de Bonnemains supplies the reason. Déroulède said to her in Jersey: "If you have any ambition in you, nothing is lost yet; get the General to risk all and return to France; he can still win." According to Arthur Meyer, Madame de Bonnemains replied: "I had hoped Boulanger would get a divorce and marry me, but Madame Boulanger opposed the divorce and Rome refused to annul the marriage. If the General then had triumphed I could only have been his favourite, and favourites always get deserted sooner or later. . . . I preferred our happiness to power. It isn't heroic, but it's human. It was I who got him to leave Paris, got him to come to me at Brussels. It was not M. Constans who saved the Republic; it was I and Boulanger's love for me. I got him to deny M. Arthur Meyer, I got him to deny the Comte de Paris when the Prince himself asked him to re-enter France. . . .

"I have not long to live, and Boulanger knows it. Do you imagine he would abandon me at such a moment? Don't insist; you will fail. I bless him because he loves me more than his ambition—more than his renown. I ask myself often what will happen to him after my death. I can only confide him to his friends. . . ."

Madame de Bonnemains took him back with her to

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Brussels, and there in a few months she died. For some little time Boulanger tried to live without her, and then startled the world by going to the Cemetery of Brussels on the 30th of September, 1891, and blowing his brains out on the grave of his mistress. He was buried with her. The stone above them bears the simple inscription, which Boulanger himself dictated: "Marguerite et Georges." The epitaph is characteristic. Boulanger put his love first—the man who would be king must put himself first, or, rather, he is first everywhere.

All Boulanger did was simply to prove that when a great man comes the way up in France will not be difficult for him. He will probably not be borne to the very door of the Elysée as Boulanger was borne, but if he is not borne there by the crowd he will go there through the crowd. The wonder is that a Minister of War has not already profited by Boulanger's example and bettered his teaching, for the horse asks for a rider.

THE SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS*

BY SIR WILLIAM BULL, M.P.

[Second Notice]

Our last survey of this fascinating volume ended at the chapters dealing with the Stuarts and the Commonwealth. During the week that has elapsed something has been done to carry out two of the suggestions contained in the book. The writer put a question to the Prime Minister as a preliminary to finding out what objection there was, if any, to the appointment of a Royal Commission on historical portraits. It is true the answer was not very encouraging—the Prime Minister did not seem to understand what was intended, and doubted the possibility of setting up a Commission on the same lines as that of the Commission on Historical Manuscripts. Well, we must be patient and try to convert him.

The second suggestion was that Speaker Onslow's handsome house in Soho-square should be decorated with a memorial-tablet to commemorate an interesting link between the Commonwealth and George III. A sympathetic reply has come from that enthusiastic Londoner Sir Lawrence Gomme, and we hope that in due course No. 20, Soho-square will be added to the list of famous London houses. No. 20 stands on the site of Old Falcomberg House, built at the end of the seventeenth century by the head of the Bellasis family. Little remains now but the façade of the newer building, the interior being devoted to the manufacture of jams and pickles by the eminent firm of Crosse and Blackwell.

It was not until after 1721 that the nation, taught by Sir Robert Walpole, came to look upon the House of Commons as the real seat of power in the Legislature; the result was that a corresponding increase occurred in the importance and dignity of the Speaker's office. The Speaker gradually refrained from voting more and more, finally only giving a casting vote, a practice that is now followed by the Deputy-Speaker and the Chairman of Committees, who refrain from voting in debates when they are not in the Chair. In theory the Chairman of Committees is still considered a Government appointment, and it was recognised that it was the occupant's duty "to push on the business;" but we fancy that the result of the Government taking all the time of the House is an increasing tendency on the part of the Chairman to protect the minority in a way that the Leader of the House would have resented only a very few years ago.

Speakers were re-elected for three, four, or even five times. The first of what we may call the non-party Speakers was Sir Spencer Compton. Although not a strong Speaker, he appears to have been capable of giving a sharp reproof. When a Member called upon him to make the House quiet, claiming he had a right to be heard, he answered—

"No, Sir, you have a right to speak, but the House has a right to judge whether it will hear you—a lesson which some Members will not learn even now."

Throughout the whole of the next reign (George II.) Arthur Onslow occupied the chair. Mr. Dasent states that he was unquestionably one of the most distinguished Speakers the House has ever known, and it would seem as if the traits necessary for this great and difficult position were hereditary, for he was the third of his family to be so honoured. He was only thirty-six when first elected, but he grasped the true position of a Speaker from the first. Hatsell wrote of him that he endeavoured to preserve order in debate with great strictness, yet always with civility and courtesy, saying that he had often heard as a young man from old and experienced Members that nothing tended more to throw power into the hands of the Administration than the neglect or departure from these rules. Onslow was of opinion that these rules had been instituted by our ancestors as a check on the action of Ministers, and as a protection to the minority against the arbitrary exercise of power.

It is curious to see how the most revolutionary Government of modern times has deliberately decided to increase the power of the Speaker to an enormous extent, and to throw upon him the extra and heavy responsibility of saying what are and what are not money Bills.

Arthur Onslow remained the First Commoner for forty-one momentous years. He saw the elder Pitt make his entrance on the Parliamentary stage, watched Clive lay the foundations of our Indian Empire, and saw Wolfe add Canada to the English Dominions beyond the seas. The Battle of the Reports took place during his rule. The question was an old one; Hooper wrote in the time of Elizabeth:—

> Every person of the Parliament ought to keep secret and not to disclose the secrets and things done and spoken in the Parliament House to any manner of person unless he be one of the same House upon pain to be sequestered out of the House or otherwise punished as by order of the House shall be appointed.

This Masonic secrecy is very different from the countless descriptions not only of the sayings but detailed doings of every member whilst in the Chamber which obtains to-day; but a long series of prosecutions and suits for libel were instituted before the freedom of the Press was won. It was not until 1771 that the whole question was thrashed out in the House, when the Press was so far successful that from that date forward the Commons tacitly acquiesced in the claim that the constituencies had a right to be informed of the proceedings of their Parliamentary representatives. Not, however, until 1836 did the House begin the publication of its own division lists.

Mr. Dasent gives a useful account of the keeping of the journals and records of the House. For centuries they were kept in a haphazard manner in manuscript by the Clerk of the House. Owing to the exertions of Onslow the House in

---

* The Speakers of the House of Commons from the Earliest Times to the Present Day, with a Topographical Description of Westminster at Various Epochs and a Brief Record of the Principal Constitutional Changes during Seven Centuries. By Arthur Irwin Dasent. With Notes on the Illustrations by John Lane, and a Portrait of every Speaker where one is known to exist. (John Lane. 21s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

1742 first ordered its journals to be printed. A Select Committee next recommended the printing of all the back volumes from the commencement in 1547, the printing being intrusted to Samuel Richardson, the author of "Pamela."

It is clear that there were journals prior to 1547, because a statute passed in the reign of Henry VIII. specifically refers to them.

Two instances of quaint entries are given:—

> 31 May 1604. Prohibition Bill. During the arguments on this Bill a young Jack Daw flew into the House called Malum Omen to the Bill.
>
> 14 May 1606. A strange Spanyell of mouse colour came into the House.

The Speakers who came immediately after Onslow were not very distinguished. It was during the tenure of the unpopular Sir Fletcher Norton that the first disturbance by women took place, and they were excluded from the Gallery of the House. After this date (1778) they were only permitted to view the proceedings from a ventilator in the roof of St. Stephen's Chapel. We have seen a wash-colour print of this, where the ladies look most uncomfortable, for the majority were lying down to peep through, whilst the heat coming upwards must have been stifling. The Duchess of Gordon and the beautiful Mrs. Sheridan evidently declined to put up with these inconveniences, and, boldly dressed as men, sat in the Strangers' Gallery.

That successful mediocrity Addington made a very fair speaker. During his tenure of the Chair the House decided to allow the Speaker an official residence in the Palace of Westminster, and the beautiful crypt-chapel, which had been used in Lord Halifax's time as a coal-cellar, was converted into a State dining-room. The formation of the collection of portraits of Speakers in the Speaker's house was due to his initiative.

In 1800, owing to some repairs having to be carried out, the House met once more, after the lapse of some centuries, in the Painted Chamber, which was burnt down in the Great Fire of 1834. This was the room in which, according to tradition, the Confessor is said to have breathed his last. We confess to a little disappointment at the description of the great fire. We wanted to hear about the Exchequer tallies—the notched pieces of stick by which the accounts of a great commercial Empire were kept down to the time of our grandfathers! It was in the cellars where these tallies were kept—dry and tinderlike—that the conflagration commenced. To illustrate the changes in the habits of the House Sir Erskine May told the author how he remembered the Speakers in the "30's" leaving the Chair followed by the members proceeding in haste to the riverside to watch the race for Doggett's Coat and Badge. Even the adjournment for the Derby has gone. Gladstone made his maiden speech in the old Chamber, but Disraeli made his more famous essay in the temporary building which was in use until 1852.

Shaw Lefevre was asked how he contrived to select the right man to carry on the debate when twenty sprang to their feet. "Well," he replied, "I have not been shooting all my life for nothing, and I have learned to mark the right one." This is a great art. The Speaker must be fair, and yet at the same time, as a kind of Master of the Ceremonies, keep the entertainment alive. It is clear among the rank and file that the men who sit in the Chamber most get called on most—the Speaker gets to know their minds and the kind of speech they will contribute to the subject in hand. Disraeli's advice to young politicians to stick to the Bench is as sound to-day as ever it was. The venerable Lord Wemyss as Lord Elcho is, we believe, the only survivor of those who spoke when the present Chamber was first used in 1850.

Lord John Russell considered Shaw Lefevre the best Speaker he ever knew. When there was not a precedent he invented one, adding "according to the well-known practice in the House"—a formula which prevented discussion and pleased every one. Dennion was the first to occupy the Speaker's House, and it is not generally known that the arms over the entrance doorway in Speaker's Yard are his.

The author mentions the "dust of ages" which had been shaken from the rafters in the explosion of January 24th, 1885, but fails to give the credit to Sir William Harcourt. He, passing along the passage at the west end of the Hall shortly after it occurred, and surveying the ocean of dirt that lay on the floor, coolly said, "This indeed is the dust of ages."

With reference to Mr. Speaker Gully, the author remarks that he was first recommended to the attention of the Government by the late Lord Herschell, but we always thought that it was Mr. Henry Labouchere who was chiefly responsible for putting him forward when Sir Henry Campbell Bannerman and Sir Matthew White Ridley were rival aspirants for the office.

With the advent of Mr. Lowther this interesting record ceases, to be taken up hereafter, it may be, as the author modestly remarks, by some more skilful hand. But we hope and believe, as we have said earlier in this article, that this deeply interesting and valuable work will evoke so much information that is at present lying dormant that another edition will issue from his pen, filling many of the gaps which he will be the first to admit at present appear. There is an excellent index, a catalogue of the Speakers, and two appendices, one dealing with the account of Sir Thomas Lovell's election to the Chair in 1485, and Moore's speech on presentation of the Royal Approval in 1523.

We congratulate Mr. Dasent on an admirable work which ought to be in the library of every politician who is anxious to understand the history of the complicated machinery under which the State is governed.

(Concluded.)

AN OXFORD POEM BY HENRY VAUGHAN—II.

By Louise Imogen Guiney

Twice again does Vaughan revert to this captivating idea of the eternising of natural objects, the transferring of beautiful earthly scenery en bloc to another and durable stage, and the transferring along with it of the mortals to whom it had been dear. So in one of his most charming lyrics, that on the Priory Grove in Brecon, "on whose soft bosom laid My love's fair steps I first betray'd" (where, in plainer words, he first met Catherine Wise, a kinswoman of the lady of the Manor, Goditha Price), we get this:—

> And when at last the winds and tears
> Of heaven, with the consuming years,
> Shall these green curls bring to decay,
> And clothe thee in an aged grey,—
> If ought a lover can foresee,
> Or if we poets prophets be,
> From hence transplanted, thou shalt stand
> A fresh grove in the Elysian land,
> Where (most blest pair), as here on earth
> Thou first didst eye our growth and birth, (1)

(1) He means "our birth" as lovers: a spiritual and simultaneous birth. Cartwright has a poem propounding this idea, and Vaughan adopts it directly from him.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

So there again thou'lt see us move
In our first innocence and love;
And in thy shades, as now, so then
We'll kiss and smile, and walk again.

Lastly, Vaughan plays with the same thought in his address to the river Usk, which opens his second volume of verse, 1651. "Poets," he has just been saying, "hallow a place," identify themselves for ever with what they have loved. He goes on in his old Virgilian vein:—

Hence th' ancients say that from this sickly air
They pass to regions more refin'd and fair,
To meadows strew'd with lilies and the rose,
And shades whose youthful green no old age knows,
Where all in white they walk, discourse, and sing
Like bees' soft murmurs, or a chiding spring.

Now, one may with some confidence read into a poet's stanzas a train of thought which he not only shares with his contemporaries, but expresses elsewhere in detail, in the course of his own work. Vaughan was always in love with the thought of life beyond the grave, even in his secular and "unbaptisèd rhymes." In these pretty couplets written to R. W., he presupposes, as must his reader, the conceptions of Plato and of Virgil: the renewing of natural beauty and the perpetuation of human love. Both are worthy of Elysium; what they are here they will be there, only established and made perfect. Thus, when he has done with the "harmless mirth" and "loath'd noise" of the tavern, with the "bills" wittily described, and the uncomfortable "mulcts" to be discharged, he prophesies to his friend how their kindred souls will one day escape, "with equal wings and ancient love," to that very human paradise which is the steadied and brightened counterpart of the best we know on earth. The second section of Vaughan's poem is stuffed full of definite epithets; taken together, they are extraordinarily reflective both of the Elysian fields (2) and of a locality more directly under his eye at the moment. "Blessed walks," "holy meads," "airy paths," "drowsy fields," a "silent shady green," "enchanted streams"—can anything possibly be more suggestive of Oxford? Does not every landscape touch become, by analogy, topographically, intimately Oxonian? Does not every Oxford man who has a sense of the spirit of "that ingeniose Place" (a place, as many poets have thought, scarcely in need of the heavenly transformation!) recognise something closely akin to it in these light and loving phrases of Vaughan's?

On those flowery banks [we'll] stay, he says, and seems further to imply, to his R. W., "just as we have lain many a May afternoon on the flowery banks of the Cherwell." It needs no sleight of hand to blend with such sayings many other allusions of other poets who have avowedly attempted some description of "the glamour of Oxford." One can but pick out descriptive bits from the mass. Warton, exuberant in adjectives, deals most with the architectural aspect of the University buildings, as would be expected; Vaughan brings to view no "fretted pinnacles" nor "cloisters pale." But Warton's contemporary Thomas Russell gives us a lovely list to cull: "dim aisles," "midnight walks," "silent shades," "sister streams." Tickell has an accuracy only less photographic: "pleasing shades," "poetic groves," "not a stream without its nymphs," "the holy seat," "the happy air," "the blessed abode." And John Davies (of "Microcosmus") who died just before Vaughan's birth, enumerates with fondness Oxford's "bough-deck'd dainty walks," "brooks . . . fretty like crystal," "pleasant plots," "those celestial places"! The general tone of the epithets is always much the same, spending distinctive colour on a perfectly distinctive thing.

Who was R. W.? The suspicion (3) may be dismissed at once that he was the self-same R. W. who is the subject of a touching elegy in "Olor Iscanus." This latter R. W., when slain at Rowton Heath in September, 1645, was "scarce twenty," therefore five years younger than Henry Vaughan, born in April, 1621. The elegy has throughout an elder-brotherly, almost fatherly tenderness of tone: far different is the underlying mood of the earlier poem, with its express mention of "equal wings" belonging to R. W. and to H. V. And a five years' difference in age is an almost absolute barrier in school or University companionships. Besides, the R. W. of the elegy seems not to have been, like the other, a "dear wit" at all; we are told as by contrast that that boy philosopher-saint, martyred for the King's cause, had "a solid skull." Also, that "conscience and honour ruled him." These gubernatorial powers do not seem to have tyrannously possessed the bosom of the youthful R. W. who ordered his princely pints in "The Moon" or "The Star," and made no sordid haste to settle the bill.

We know now what has not always been known for certain, that Henry Vaughan, despite the omissions and ellipses of the University registers, was at Jesus College from Michaelmas Term, 1638, to the close of Summer Term, 1640. Immediately after the ensuing Long Vacation, if not in the course of it, Vaughan's father packed him off to London, in order that the son might apply himself to what he evidently hated, and ultimately escaped from: the study of the law. Henry's twin, Thomas Vaughan, was left behind to complete duly the University course. If our general hypothesis is to hold true that the little poem under discussion was written before the autumn of 1640, some evidence must be produced to show that it could have been addressed to a fellow-Oxonian. It is to be noted, as telling against any relationship between Vaughan's literary firstling and the London life he knew from 1640 to 1642, that he could not possibly have been of sufficient importance, even when reinforced by the "genius" of any R. W., to "distract" that metropolitan "town." "Our harmless mirth, our wit, and score," the junketings and spendings of any two naughty lads, could hardly have availed to make much stir in a capital where the laughter of giants in "The Mermaid" had only just died away. But the case was far other in little Oxford, especially in the heyday of Laud's influence and control, when undergraduates were supposed to be trying to purge and live cleanly. The chances for local disedification were ample and alluring, and they appear to have been seized upon with alacrity.

"R." is now a fairly distinctive initial; it was not so in the seventeenth century, when the names Robert, Ralph, Richard, and Roger were very much more in use than they are in our day. Since one's search for the right, or likely, R. W. is fortunately narrowed down to the years 1638-40, an examination of the Oxford Registers brings into view two R. W.'s resident at that date, who were gentlemen, and in addition well-known "wits." One was Robert Waring, afterwards the author of "Effigies Amoris," of whom one gets an account in Wood's "Athenae Oxonienses," and in Walker's "Sufferings of the Clergy." He was of Christ Church, and bore arms for the King. Later he became Professor of History, but was deprived, and passed the rest of his not long life tutoring in the houses of patrons or kinsfolk; one of these latter, Sir Job Charlton, Chief Justice and Speaker of the House of Commons, bequeathed a portrait of Robert Waring which is still extant. Waring seems to have been a most decorous person; dying in 1658, he left a sweet and

(2) Æn. vi., 638-9, 658, 674-6, 703-5, 714-15, 743-4.

(3) The Poems of Henry Vaughan, Silurist. Muses Lib. ed., 1896. Vol. II., p. 331 (Note).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

serene memory behind him. There is nothing to connect him in any way with Vaughan, except the unimportant fact that Waring's family, long seated in the Forest of Arden, was allied to that other and lesser Warwickshire family of Wise, into which (about four years after the date of this poem) Henry Vaughan married.

AN EXCELLENT TOUCHSTONE

He is the Touchstone of sanity, and moves in a world apart. There have been fools since the beginning of days: creatures set forward for laughter to flow about: not creatures of folly, for in them is no laughter, only eternal tears; but beings whose function it is to provide merriment, and ease the business of living. Such fools have been innumerable; many willingly so, and many most unwillingly so; but there has been no one of them like Touchstone. He moves in an equable radiance of his own. Others may tumble for the general sport; and their jests may crack shrewdly, or sound hoarsely, or even wing subtly through the mind. He, even when he most seems to tumble, is yet more truly a dancer whose gestures are graceful and full of significance. His jests hover with philosophic meaning, bearing thought a further space through the realms of irrelevance and futility. If it be the business of fools to be self-denying, as most surely it is, then he adds nobleness to generosity and blends delicacy with his giving. He touches with dignity the office and function of indignity.

A blandness flows over him, hinting one knows not what richness of experience; and it is graced with distinction. Set in cap and bells though he be, and arrayed in motley, he is almost paternal in his manner to all. Indeed, it seemed as though the cap and bells were almost a necessary part of him; for only thereby could he assume that privileged relation to all the world that gave a sufficient play to his abundant humanity. In this he was like his radiant speech. For his words were so pregnant with meaning, they came so near the great heart and purpose of life, that they had to quiver lightly through the mind for fear of wounding the soul. They hung in the air like feathers because they were weighty with meaning. It was only when sharp occasion called him away from whimsical contemplation of the deeper things that his words flew more directly to a definite goal; and even so his words winged gracefully, claiming relation rather with the arrow than the bullet. It is thus when we first see him. For the fitly named Le Beau comes to inform Rosalind and Celia that they have "lost much good sport," that in fact "Charles, the Duke's wrestler," had just thrown three brothers, breaking the ribs of each, and that "the poor old man, their father," has been "making such pitiful dole over them." So Touchstone asks forthwith, "But what is the sport, monsieur, that the ladies have lost?" "Why, this that I speak of," answers Le Beau, astonished. Then says the Fool to the worldly-wise courtier, "Thus men grow wiser every day! It is the first time that ever I heard breaking of ribs was sport for ladies." And we see the arrow quivering in its mark, for all its flight was graceful.

It is, however, the Forest of Arden that reveals him most fully. Then his soul swells, though his body learns discomfort. It is the property of natural scenes to strip artificial distinctions of meaning; and thus the Forest of Arden lit up the true significance of his relation to the world. At Court Celia was in authority, and it needed his motley garb for Touchstone to display the privilege of wisdom. But in the forest glades his motley becomes almost a supererogation. In those green places he would have been her guide in any garb, and have displayed his wisdom to any, in silk or homespun. Yet he still must jest, he still must needs be the Fool, or his deeper meanings would scorch the understanding. The truth is, the sun that lit through the green leaves showed his motley to be something of a priestly garb: a raiment of privilege in emblem of a hidden dispensation.

Thus he meets equally with the melancholy Jaques, and proves himself the loftier. That shrewd philosopher, in love with his bitter melancholy, the waters of his humour turned brackish through mantling contemplation, had to doff his cap to so serene a sage as Touchstone. Having met him, he returns to his exiled Duke in rapture at the man. "He hath strange places crammed with observation," says he. He repeats his conversation as being rare and wise, and quotes an example of it:—

> Good morrow, Fool, quoth I. No sir, quoth he,
> Call me not Fool till Heaven hath sent me fortune.
> And then he drew a dial from his poke,
> And looking on it with lack-lustre eye,
> Says very wisely, It is ten o'clock:
> Thus may we see, quoth he, how the world wags:
> 'Tis but an hour ago since it was nine;
> And after one hour more 'twill be eleven:
> And so, from hour to hour, we ripe and ripe.
> And then from hour to hour we rot and rot;
> And thereby hangs a tale. When I did hear
> The motley Fool thus moral on the time,
> My lungs began to crow like chanticleer,
> That Fools should be so deep-contemplative.

For all that Jaques may love his speech because there seems a bitter flavour in it, yet it is, in truth, deep—contemplative with rich philosophy. Time may wag, and thereby hang a tale, yet there is something of serene height in him that can look on it unmoved. This very quality it is in him that raises him above those that are buffeted by the passage of Time. Yet he is as truly set above space as he is set above Time. For when Corin asks him: "And how like you this shepherd's life, Master Touchstone?" his reply is no less serene. "Truly," says he, "in respect of itself it is a good life; but in respect that it is a shepherd's life, it is naught. In respect that it is solitary, I like it very well; but in respect that it is private, it is a very vile life. Now, in respect it is in the fields, it pleaseth me very well; but in respect it is not in the Court, it is tedious. As it is a spare life, look you, it fits my humour well; but as there is no more plenty in it, it goes much against my stomach. Hast any philosophy in thee, shepherd?"

Was ever so urbane a philosophy? He soars above all things by the native quality of his soul. Nothing perturbs him, nothing wounds him. He is set above the slings and arrows of outrageous fortune by the perfect balance of his intellect. His privileged bauble becomes a wand in his hand to convey to others the serenity of the upper air. Yet he is not indifferent to occasion. His is not the misanthrope's aloofness from the concerns of the living. He approves himself truly wise in in that he is tender, gentle, and instinctively delicate. Courtesy and kindliness radiate from him with somewhat of the noiseless ease that his rays flee the sun. His mind may have moved in heaven, but his body dwelt on earth, and the needs of Earth impressed themselves on him. So urbane a soul would truly enough have found it strange to have felt the fierce impulses of lyric love. That was removed from him; but he was lonely, and needed a companionship so intimate that only a woman could have given it him.

Thus he wishes to wed Audrey. Nay, he fears to wed her; but he needs her. He is not insensible to her faults. "Truly, I would the gods had made thee poetical," says he; yet since there is none other to have, he will have her, for all that she is "even a toy in hand here," and thus again he approves himself a philosopher. Nevertheless, it is true that she does not "bear her body seeming" in company; and so he, being, as Jaques tells him he is, a man of breeding, is driven to hesitation. A shadow folds him in eclipse as he does so, for this is most unfitting to so serene a mind as his.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The forest glades aid the health of his mind, however, since they are a most proper environment for him. Indeed, he seems like the peaceful, equable soul of them, though with a civic wisdom superadded. He cannot long remain in indecision, for that savours of irritation; and there is now only one thing for him, having once burst the prospect of marriage on his mind and hers. So he raises no more objections as to improper Sir Oliver Martexts. And so, at last, he weds his Audrey, his crude, country wench, whose faults he well knows, for she only can satisfy his need and so fulfil his philosophic calm. He does it delicately, tenderly. Then he appears before the Duke with her; and as she comes with him, it is thus he introduces her, not shamefacedly, but with kindly dignity: "A poor virgin, sir, an ill-favoured thing, sir, but mine own; a poor humour of mine, sir, to take that that no one else will: rich honesty dwells like a miser, sir, in a poor house: as your pearl in your foul oyster." An ill-favoured thing, but mine own! What rich wisdom shines there, what sane humanity! what serene splendour, what truth to the cardinal points of rich emotion! What an excellent Touchstone he proves himself with that word! He stands there, while the curtain shrouds him from our view, and his lips had just uttered the proof of his serenity; he had spoken a grave sagacity that moves in our minds as a final memory of the chrism that anointed him a Fool because he had seen and known wisdom. He tests truth and beauty in us.

THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA*

LIKE other nations, the Portuguese owe at least part of their history to their geographical situation and personal character. The former prevented expansion inwards, and stimulated it seawards in the direction of maritime discovery; the latter produced military and religious enthusiasm, showing itself in hostility to Islam. In the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries Portugal led Europe in discovery and conquest. The prime mover in maritime exploration was the son of King John I., Prince Henry (1394-1460), known as The Navigator, who launched successive expeditions down the West Coast of Africa, with the object of Christianising the people "for the glory of God and the extension of the Faith." He did not live to see the results of his enterprises, or the full development of the slave-trade, but the spirit which animated him survived, and was fostered by subsequent Kings of Portugal.

An attempt was made to reach Prester John in East Africa. Bartholomeu Dias commanded the expedition, and rounded the Cape in 1487 without knowing it. In 1493 the famous Bull of Pope Alexander VI. granted to Spain all the lands discovered, or to be discovered, west of a line running 100 (extended to 370) leagues from the west of the Azores and Cape de Verde Islands, and those east of the same line to the Crown of Portugal. King Manuel (1495-1521) was eager to resume the distant maritime explorations instituted by Prince Henry. The search for a sea-route to India was prosecuted with the double purpose of making Christians and obtaining spices. On this quest Vasco da Gama was despatched on July 8th, 1497, by King Manuel. After passing the Cape he followed the East Coast of Africa upwards to Malindi, and thence was piloted across to Calicut on the South Malabar Coast of India, where he arrived on May 21st, 1498. He was received courteously by the local Hindu potentate, called the Samuri or Zamorin, but trouble ensued regarding the Portuguese merchandise, and Vasco decided to depart, with a letter from the Samuri to King Manuel. He reached Lisbon in September, 1499: the value of his cargo was sixty times all the expenses of his expedition.

This voyage is regarded as having modified the whole course of history, by bringing the East and West nearer together: it transferred the headquarters of trade from the Mediterranean to Western Europe. The Moguls had not then reached India; the Lodis were reigning at Delhi; the Bahmani dynasty in the Deccan was waning; the Bijapur Kingdom held sway from Bombay to Goa; south of the latter place there were petty Rajas. Mahomedans from Arabia and Egypt dominated trade on the coast, which was infested by pirates. The King sent other Portuguese expeditions: under Cabral, who founded the first Portuguese factories in India, 1500; Vasco da Gama again; and Albuquerque and Pacheco, who extended their operations to Cochin and other coast towns, engaging in alliances and fights alternately with the local Rajas, who combined with the Mahomedan traders to resist the new-comers. By their sea-power and piracy, openly practised, the Portuguese succeeded in monopolising the Indian trade, but treated their rivals and the natives with inhuman cruelty, which passed into a proverb. Almeida, the first Portuguese Viceroy in 1505, aimed at commercial supremacy and expelling all competitors; he contemplated only the establishment of factories and commercial relations with India, being opposed to the idea of territorial dominion.

Alphonso Albuquerque, the second Viceroy (1509-1515), was ambitious to bring all India under the sway of Portugal. He desired to erect a fort wherever he located a factory, and to assert himself with the native rulers. His first attempt to take Goa from Bijapur failed, but in 1510 he succeeded in acquiring the spacious harbour, town, and island by a massacre of the inhabitants. He designed Goa to be the centre of a Portuguese Indian Empire. It became the capital from 1530: its territory comprises 1,062 square miles with an extreme length of 62, and greatest breadth of 40 square miles, and a population of half a million. He failed to seize Aden, but in 1515 captured Ormuz, a great trade emporium in the Persian Gulf, and Malacca in the Eastern Archipelago. His projects were too great for his forces. He sent out commercial missions to foreign States, and conciliated neighbouring Powers: he made some efforts to introduce justice, local administration and finance; to appease the natives he respected Indian usages and tolerated Indian creeds. He was superseded by another Viceroy, and died in 1515 at Goa, leaving the Portuguese power in India at the height of its greatness. Portugal commanded the sea-route and trade, and held thirty factories on the African, Indian, and Malayan coasts. Diu and Damaun, which still remain Portuguese, were captured in 1534-38. The conduct of the Portuguese on the Indian coasts, where they ravaged, burnt, and plundered villages with continual cruelty, aroused a confederation of the country powers against them; their prestige was lost, though they repelled the attacks. The Viceroys and Governors who succeeded Albuquerque were, with few exceptions, men of inferior calibre, corrupt and violent; their mismanagement of the trade ruined some of the principal emporia; the morals of the community deteriorated. Vasco da Gama himself was Viceroy for only three months in 1524,

* Vasco da Gama and his Successors: 1460-1580. By K. G. Jayne. (Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

when he died at Cochin. John da Castro (1545-1548) was the last of the heroes. There were twenty-seven Viceroys and Governors between 1505 and 1580. During this time Christian missions were established and prospered in India. The Jesuit Francis Xavier, the Apostle of the Indies, went out to Goa in 1542 under the patronage of John III. of Portugal. He preached, baptised, and founded mission settlements in Southern India, Malacca, and the Spice Islands; in 1552 he died in China. The Portuguese introduced the Inquisition into India in 1560, and the cruelties perpetrated in the propagation of Christianity added to the evil reputation which the Portuguese had acquired for themselves by their treatment of the natives. Even the Dutch were welcomed in comparison with the Portuguese.

The power of Portugal in the East never possessed the elements of permanent Empire, and it suffered, too, from circumstances beyond the nation's control. The decay of their power in India really dates from 1580, when Portugal fell under the rule of Spain. The Spanish Captivity, so-called, lasted from 1580 to 1640, and during it the Portuguese in India were not adequately supported from Europe. Indeed, Portugal, with its small population, could not furnish sufficient men of the proper class. Their numbers were reduced by wars, the slave trade lowered the national characteristics. Spain had other undertakings in America and the Netherlands upon her hands; Portuguese interests were sacrificed to those of Spain. Philip II. utilised the Portuguese revenues in attempts to subdue Holland. The Dutch gained their independence from Spain, and became a sea power stronger than the Portuguese. Retaliatory expeditions were despatched to India by the enemies of Spain. The Indian trade was directed to the Netherlands; the first Dutch Fleet which rounded the Cape in 1595 sealed the fate of the Portuguese trade; the Dutch gradually seized the Moluccas and Malacca from the Portuguese. In India itself the Portuguese had, as time advanced, established some factories in the interior. As military adventurers they reached Gaur, Dacca, Chittagong, the Sundarbans: they intermarried freely with the Indians and were called Feringis, or Franks. Akbar patronised a Portuguese Mission at Agra, and invited Portuguese Friars to Delhi. Another Mogul Emperor caused their expulsion from Hooghly in 1632. Their language has left its mark in India.

By the time that Portugal was emancipated from Spain her trade had been ruined, the Dutch were supreme in the Eastern seas, and England was making progress there. Ceylon was taken by the Dutch in 1656; the Marathas captured Bassein in 1739. The abolition of the Inquisition in India in 1814 was too late to repair its calamitous effects. The loss of their commerce was the ruin of the Portuguese power. Old Goa is in ruins, and modern Goa struggles to exist, maintained by a poorly paid administration and small military force. The other Portuguese possessions, Damaun, eighty-two square miles, and the island of Diu, less than seven miles by two, are of little value; and, as there can be no hope of a revival of a Portuguese Empire in India, the reasonable course would be to transfer the territories to England on suitable terms. But national pride stands opposed to reason, as in the corresponding case of Pondicherry and Chandernagore, still held by the French. The Portuguese have shown the way to England more than once; firstly, how to acquire distant trade by enterprise; and, secondly, how to lose it by projects beyond their strength and by gross mismanagement. The course of history is strewn with such wrecks and warnings. The book which has given rise to these observations does not cover the whole history, but is an excellent account of the great Portuguese leaders of whom it treats.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

VII.—FRENCH OR FLEMISH?

It is probable that the truest history of a nation is always to be found in its Art, if we study it with discrimination, for whether he seeks them in himself or in his neighbours the artist does undoubtedly register the emotions and opinions of his day. Therefore I think I need not apologise for approaching the burning question of the hour in Belgium through the medium of an artist's personality. It is a fact that I shall never be able to discuss the rights of the Flemish section of the Belgian population without thinking of M. Georges Eekhoud.

A few weeks ago I heard M. Eekhoud lecture on Lorenzaccio, Alfred De Musset's timid Hamlet, and after the lecture was over I was introduced to the lecturer and spent the rest of the evening in his company. I must confess frankly that I was disappointed. I had been told that, with Maeterlinck, Albert Giraud, and Camille Lemonnier, he was in the front rank of Belgian men of letters. I had heard stories of a youth spent in revolt against authorities and the conventions they support. I had heard of a decoration boisterously declined; in this country of cheap ribbon he is probably the only writer of any note who is not decorated. I had been led to expect a wild revolutionary; I met only a tame Professor. He had kindly little eyes and a courteous manner, but he clearly belonged to the fatal class that draws its opinions from books rather than from life. Equally clearly he was Flemish rather than Walloon, German rather than French.

There remained his books, and here a surprise awaited me. Side by side with sketches of a naïve and almost infantile sentimentality I found studies of rare emotions made with the sureness of touch of a master. I do not know that I have ever seen such contrasts within the walls of one book as are to be found in "Mes Communions." "Climatérie" is the story of two boys at a Swiss school, of whom the psychology recalled to me those long days of my childhood when I had nothing better to read than "Harry Milner" or the "True History of Sandford and Merton." These boys wept the same tears and behaved in the same romantic manner as the futile creations of Mrs. Sherwood and the eccentric Day Yet in the same book there are such things as "Appol et Brouscard" and "Le Sublime Escarpe," sketches of a brutality of morals and emotion that would have made Mrs. Sherwood turn in her grave. The same contrast is to be noticed in "Le Cycle Patibulaire," but in a modified form, for here a greater skill of expression has almost succeeded in refining the sentimentality to terms of sentiment. It is possible to read such a pleasant fancy as "Le Jardin" without feeling like a boy who has stolen a pound of chocolate; while, on the other hand, such a story as "Hiep-Hioup!" the tragedy of a gamekeeper whose noble violence of love awakens a genuine hatred in the breast of his malodorous Mary Fitton, lingers in the mind as a masterpiece of strong emotions. "Le Cycle Patibulaire" is a book that no one who is interested in French literature can afford to neglect.

Primatively the Flemish race is undoubtedly of a low type physically and intellectually, moved by that ineloquent brutality that finds admirable artistic expression in Camille Lemonnier's "La Mort." Under the influence of education this brutality, which might be described as unintelligent hatred, becomes softened to a sentimentality that is assuredly unintelligent love, and has been fully interpreted in Flemish by Henri Conscience. But this metamorphosis, in itself by no means surprising, does not account for the phenomenon of M. Georges Eekhoud, who is at once a rebel against conventions and a sentimentalist, which implies that he has accepted the most false of all conventions. To my mind the explanation of this paradox becomes simple when we look at the postage-stamps of Belgium, which are printed in two languages. Any one of exceptional intellect who is born of Flemish blood must be subject to two very strong influences, mutually antagonistic; most Flemish artists settle the problem by becoming violently French, like M. Maeterlinck. A few feel the calls of patriotism and endeavour to make something of the dubious Dutch dialect that serves them for a mother tongue. M. Eekhoud must have hesitated between these two points until at one time he enjoyed the doubtful advantages of a dual personality. There was M. Eekhoud, the lover of passion and youth and beauty, the leader of a forlorn revolt against the follies of civilisation, the creator of wild and terrible tales. But there was also Herr Eekhoud, the timid student of books and dreamer of tearful, sickly-sweet romance, who must surely have suffered torments of remorse for the unruly deeds of his turbulent alter ego. All that is best in M. Eekhoud's work was produced by the reaction of French culture on his mind, and if, as a whole, his work is disappointing, it must surely be because he hesitated to throw sentimental Dr. Jekyll overboard early in his career. When I saw Professor Eekhoud smiling benignly at the fatuities of his bourgeois students, I felt as if I were assisting at the funeral of Mr. Hyde, the man of genius.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

There are four Universities in Belgium, and in all of them the instruction is given in French. But the Democratic party is now moving to have the University of Ghent transformed into a Flemish University—so once more we have the spectacle of democracy seeking to bring about reactionary changes. This movement is really reactionary, going back at least as far as the Tower of Babel, for it is a deliberate effort to foster the continuity of the Flemish tongue by artificial means. Every intelligent man in the country talks French as a matter of course. But as the majority of the Flemish are too stupid to learn any tongue but their own ignoble patois, the democrats are anxious to burden a certain number of students with the same disability as the general mass of the uneducated. It is pretty enough to talk sentimentally about the mother-tongue, but if the children can speak a better language than their mother it is surely desirable that they should do so. This would seem an obvious truth, but it destroys nine-tenths of the arguments of the flamingants, as they are called. In two generations Belgium would become a French-speaking—and, what is far more important, a French-thinking—nation; but now we have the miserable spectacle of a number of clever men labouring to prolong the present antagonism of speech and thought, for there is not the slightest possibility of Flemish ever being the language of the nation as a whole. If democracy is always going to be so little intelligent, we shall soon long for the coming of a new prophet to save the people from being overwhelmed by the handicap of their rights.

This is one of those artificial movements which is started as an intellectual exercise, continued as a habit, and which ends by becoming a passion. I suppose the flamingants will have their University sooner or later, though there is at least a doubt whether they will be able to find any students willing to be taught in Flemish, save, perhaps, in Holland and South Africa. There is a story of a State-paid Professor of Flemish elocution who held his appointment for ten years without ever finding a single pupil. When the inspectors announced their periodical visits he had to hire pupils at five francs apiece to come and listen to his lectures! A University run on those lines would perhaps be the most satisfactory termination to a foolish crusade, which suggests, nevertheless, certain dangers to those who are interested—and England surely not least of all—in a solid and united Belgium. We have seen the unhappy results of the fostering of race-differences in our own relationship with Ireland.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

UNKNOWN MANTZELAND*

IN the heart of the province of Sze-chuan, in Western China, where the Yang-tse-Chiang makes a great loop, turning from a southerly course to north-east, before it settles to its main course due east towards the Yellow Sea, there is an enclave of some 8,400 square miles in extent, known as Lololand, inhabited by tribes of non-Chinese race, who have preserved their independence of the Peking Government to the present day. It was here that on December 24th, 1908, Mr. J. W. Brooke, a young Englishman, of Yorkshire family, was foully done to death while carrying out some explorations in the interest of geographical research. This somewhat ponderous volume is an account of Mr. Brooke's last journey related by Mr. Fergusson, who was travelling with him at the time in the interests of the British and Foreign Bible Society.

In the Spring of 1906 Mr. Brooke left England for the purpose of exploring the sources of the Brahmaputra river from the Indian side. The treaty that we had just then concluded with Russia obliged the Indian Government to forbid his entrance into Tibet, and finding all attempts to cross the frontier frustrated by the frontier officials he resolved to enter Tibet from the Chinese side. In three months he was at Sining-fu in Western Kan-su, and, while making preparations for his journey, witnessed the arrival of the Dalai Lama on his way to Peking, and two days later was granted an audience with the Buddhist Pope, being the first Englishman ever seen by him.

While arranging to start from Tankar, on the Chinese frontier, he was exposed to an encounter with an armed Tibetan, who suddenly attacked him without reason, and he was fortunate enough to escape with a slight sword-cut. Leaving Tankar he followed the route, by Koko-Nor and across the Tsaidam plain, that was taken by Huc and Gabet in 1844, and by Prejevalski in 1870, and was finally forced by the Tibetans to turn back when only two hundred miles from Lhassa.

At the very beginning of 1908 Mr. Brooke started on the journey that was to end so disastrously. Apparently he had abandoned the idea of reaching the sources of the Brahmaputra, and the object of this journey is nowhere stated. As a companion he took with him Mr. C. H. Meares, whom he had met the preceding year at Tientsin, and later they were joined by Mr. Fergusson. Their very erratic course, as traced in the maps accompanying the volume, seems to show that Mr. Brooke's object was to carry out a plane-table survey of a part of Sze-chuan inhabited by semi-independent tribes, known to the Chinese as Mantzeland, while Mr. Fergusson distributed books on behalf of the Bible Society. The names of the small semi-independent States traversed by the travellers will be new to everybody, except the missionaries who boldly penetrate nearly everywhere, being generally assured of a good reception on account of their surgical skill. Somo, Drukagi, Kanga, Damba, Ngaba, Ngolok are evidently names of Tibetan origin, and are not to be found in the ordinary maps. The language spoken in them differs from Chinese, and their relations with the Chinese Government are confined to supplying free transport to Chinese officials passing through the country, and a visit to Peking by the chiefs every seven years to pay tribute. Chinese authority goes for so little in some places that no official can visit them without first obtaining permission.

Adventure, Sport, and Travel on the Tibetan Steppes. By W. N. Fergusson, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. (Constable and Co 16s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Any information regarding an unexplored country, and a people that for ages have lived secluded from the world, is bound to be full of interest. We could have wished that the author had told us more than he has done. The chapters on Mantze Religion and Customs, and on Lololand are of especial interest. The inhabitants of these small, independent, and semi-independent States are apparently descendants of a Tibetan race, who, in past centuries, have been gradually driven by the Chinese out of the more fertile and easily accessible low-lying lands into the tangled mass of mountain and forest known as Mantzeland. And the fact is, we think here mentioned for the first time, that the final crushing of the Taiping rebellion and capture of its leader was effected by these tribes, after the Chinese had driven the rebels into the hill country. With proper safeguards and Chinese passports, together with missionary assistance, there seem no reasons why English sportsmen should not explore these mountains, but they must be prepared to rough it. Mr. Fergusson appears to have hardly recognised the opportunities he and his companion enjoyed of extending our knowledge of natural history, and, to judge from his book, the party were ill-equipped in that respect. That extraordinary animal the Takin (Budorcas taxicolor) was common, but only one was shot, by Mr. Meares, for whom it is claimed that he is the first Englishman who ever shot one. Serow and goral were also common, but we are left in doubt as to whether they belong to new sub-species or not; and it is therefore not surprising that we find ovis ammum written several times for ovis ammon. But the most puzzling animal we hear of is the chitze, or what the author calls the chamois. This is the first mention of chamois east of the Caucasus, and it is impossible to say what the animal alluded to is. As one was shot it is a pity that no photograph was taken of it. The Mantze country ought to abound in pheasants, but none are mentioned: indeed, the only game-fowl alluded to in the book is a "peimuhchi, a bird as large as a turkey."

This was probably a snow-cock (tetraogallus), the hailik of Prejevalski. Then we are told of a wonderful fish, called by the Chinese wa-wa-u, or "child-fish," which might be a mermaid from the description. It is related in a matter-of-fact way that a specimen was bought in the fish-market at Ya-chow and put into alcohol. The perfunctory manner in which these things are mentioned is sufficient to show how little the author appreciated his opportunities. There are two maps of the routes traversed in Mantzeland, but they do little to aid the reader, and they have that exasperating but too common fault of spelling names of places differently from the text—Cheo-Chien for Cheoser, Kai-She-Chia for Gaishechia, Yukuo for Yukoh, Piaowa-La for Pewa Pass are enough to make the most patient reader gnash his teeth, while many names of localities one would wish to identify are not on the maps at all. The book is plentifully illustrated with photographs, many of which are of considerable interest.

Through the courtesy of Mr. Rowland Ward we are enabled to reproduce an engraving of the head of that remarkable and little-known animal the takin, whose fall to the rifle of the first English sportsman fortunate to penetrate into its native haunts is alluded to in the foregoing review. In spite of the bovine character of its horns, it belongs really to the family of goat-antelopes; its nearest congener being the serow. It is a heavily built animal, standing about $3\frac{1}{2}$ft. high at the shoulder, with stout limbs, a short tail like a goat's, a large head, and horns in both sexes. So far as can be known at present, it is found everywhere, in suitable ground, over that large and unexplored tract of country between South-Western China and our Indian North-Eastern frontier.

Its existence was first made known some sixty years ago, by the late Brian Hodgson, who obtained specimens from the Mishmi hills on the Assam border. Since then a few specimens have been procured from the same locality, from time to time, through the tribesmen who cross the border to attend fairs in British territory, but no European has yet been able to gain admission into the country. The murder of Mr. Williamson at the hands of the Abors, who are neighbours of the Mishmis, reported within the last few days, shows why Indian sportsmen have not been able to penetrate to the haunts of the takin across the Assam border.

Its existence in Western China was made known at a later date by Milne-Edwards, but it is only in the last few years that specimens from that locality have been brought to England. In the Sze-chuan specimens the horns appear to be somewhat less upright, and are more wrinkled at the base than in the Mishmi specimens. The coats also seem lighter in colour, but the difference may only be seasonal. Stuffed specimens from both localities are to be seen in the Natural History Museum at South Kensington, where also may be seen a skeleton presented by Mr. J. W. Brooke in 1908, presumably the one shot by Mr. Meares.

Copyright, Rowland Ward, 167, Piccadilly, W.

The illustration represents a head from the Mishmi hills in the possession of Colonel J. Biddulph.

SPRING IN JAPAN

It is the Japanese imagination to make the world-large laughter of flowers out of the December snow; it is our fire of imagination that we build a land of Spring fairies already in Winter's heart of frost, and of wind too solemn even for speech. We flatly object to recognise the existence of Winter; we are happy to think that we have only three seasons in the year. I always think the Japanese mind is most wonderful where it leaves behind the Chinese thought, finite, hard, like the Greek thought, whose consciousness to ethics ever thought a Vision frivolous; and we thank the Buddhism which encouraged our appreciation of Nature as having a big share of moral life. We read in our literature the record of a long fight of those two thoughts, Chinese and Japanese. It is originally a Chinese thought to praise and moralise over the plum blossom; and the nightingale, speaking generally, is more a Chinese bird, or, we might say, a Greek bird, like Keats' nightingale, than a Japanese bird; but the nightingale, also the plum blossom, became quite Japanese things when we found in them a most feverish outburst of our desire toward Spring. We hardly think of truth and beauty as the ending words for a song on the nightingale as in Keats' ode; our mind goes straight to the irresistible impulse of the bird in leaving the deeper hills to hunt after Spring and sunlight. It is a great moment among many others when we show we are much related with the Celtic temperament; there is nothing like our Spring thought, often turbulent, ever so passionate, that we express most forcibly one of the clear national characteristics.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Outside the sky is ashen and dumb, as it is usually at the end of December; the maple-leaves sang a month ago their last farewell of glory written in blood. (What a patience and strength they saved only to reach that tragic end!) Within my room the Spring air already floods. The Chinese daffodils, aged but happy, bloom on the tokonoma, the holy daïs, where Spring always begins first to smile; a most appropriate picture is hanged on its wall, ready to greet the approach of the New Year in a gorgeous attire of old fashion. The fire burns in the hibachi, or fire-box, whispering a far-off forest story and the rustic humanity which is the best. What a country-like love in the charcoal fire! A while ago my servant boy returned home from the market where he bought the proper decoration for New Year's Day, made of straw, seaweed, lobster (it is a Japanese allegory to have a humorous side, as, for instance, with this lobster, which represents agelessness in its very old shape of crooked back); I told him that a big pair of pine trees should be put up at the entrance of my house to create the house of evergreen Eternity. I already hear outside the merry music of lion-dancers, who make havoc among the children, whose suspicious eyes wish to know where Happy New Year ever comes. We will soon see what a great part a fan plays in our Japanese life, which will be carried by each person going round to scatter good wishes among the people known or unknown.

I will stay within the shut doors, or shojis, live in the Spring air of my creation after much cost, and wait for the outside Nature to burst out in jollity; I know that then my moods will never be disturbed even when the doors of my house swing open, and the air within and without communicate with one another on equal terms. I shall see the low sky with the still lower clouds of cherry-blossoms by a stream (what a picture to please the Tosa school of artists!), and again the cherry-blossom with lanterns and jolly people in dance, which would be a subject for a Hokusai or Hiroshige. When a poet sings Spring to frighten from him the Invisible or Unseen, it is from his desire to make the affair sudden and strange, to make a mysterious world with laughter and tears arm in arm.

My Spring thought, which started more objectively, slowly entered in subjective appreciation, and my psychical quality of mind is strangely evolving in April, when I see not each shape of Spring, but the one big Vision or Imagination of all Spring now appearing, now disappearing, as one big mist, into whose seen or unknown breath my own existence will be lost; by losing myself I know I shall get a greatest joy of life. My desire will soon be exhausted when it is filled. And I will rest in reverie.

The season, too, will rest in rain before getting another pang of force. Nature, who began as strong and objective as a Chinese art, and then turned as voluptuous and quite real as the Shijo art, more as our beloved Ukiyoye art, is now becoming the art of Korin design in the season of iris and wistaria, great Korin's favourite subjects The Japanese nature of May is most decorative.

YONE NOGUCHI.

FIELD ARTILLERY

COLONEL BETHELL'S "Modern Artillery in the Field,"* which Messrs. Macmillan have just published, deserves, though it is a technical book for the use of the service, more than a passing notice in the general Press. The civilian reader is already acquainted with Colonel Bethell's deservedly high European position upon the subject. His international reputation with regard to modern artillery is established

The book is divided into four parts: Equipment, Practical Gunnery, the Minor Tactics of Artillery, and Combined Tactics. Thirteen plates and a frontispiece illustrate it. There are a large number of figures inset in the text to illustrate the description or argument with which a passage is concerned. The description of the various national equipments in the first pages is summary but sufficient. A word or two upon the historic order in which the principles and accessories of the Q.F. gun were developed might have afforded interest to the lay-reader, but would not have served the purposes of such a work. To the politician such an historical survey would be of first-class importance, and it is to be hoped that something of the nature will follow from Colonel Bethell's pen.

The writer's own considered conclusions are of particular interest. His decision in favour of the German use of every gun, as against the French theory of counter batteries, is of particular interest (pages 291-292) read in connection with what follows, which is a less certain judgment upon the French theory of short ranges. Did space permit, it would be a fascinating point to discuss, for if the French are right in their theory of short range (upon which the whole of their artillery tactics depend), then the British service, which inclines to the opposite theory, has been misled by the peculiar experience of South Africa, and by the tendency of every nation at the end of a long and difficult campaign to exaggerate the importance of long range. We must be content to mention here briefly the great authority of Langlois, and the fact that his conclusions were not unsupported by the realities of the Manchurian campaign.

Another section to which the general reader will turn with great interest is the comparison of the various forms of fire discipline in the modern battery, but what a purely technical book of this sort cannot be expected to give us—and yet what is really the deciding factor—is the rapidity of fire in practice of each service. It is perfectly true, as Colonel Bethell points out on pages 282 and 283, that mere rapidity of fire is not the be-all and end-all of the gunner. But a moment comes when a superior rate of delivery is equivalent to a total superiority over the enemy.

Now that is partly a question of material, but even more a question of moral factors. It is particularly true that when battery is firing at battery rapidity of fire will tell. It must always be remembered that exceptional feats in quick firing count for nothing any more than rifle competitions and marksmanship at very long ranges count in the making of a linesman. It is further true that the modern gun can shoot if it is pressed "more quickly than it is able to"—to use an Irishism. That is, it will be too hot to use long before it has reached the limit of its firing capacity. Still it is a good test of efficiency so see at what rate the men can "feed" their pieces; but that can only be seen by the eye—it cannot be judged on paper. In the remarks in which Colonel Bethell very clearly criticises the French theory of "neutralising" an enemy's battery, he implies by his argument what rapidity of fire will mean.

A word may here be submitted against the theory that

* Modern Artillery in the Field. By Colonel H. A. Bethell, R.F.A. (Macmillan and Co. 7s. 6d.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

only direct hits will help to silence a modern battery. It is a theory almost universal, but it does neglect the moral factor. It is, however, pleasant to read on page 298 the sentence, "Other troops may be demoralised after suffering 25 per cent. of casualties, but there is no record of a gunner running away from his gun." The next sentence gives the true reason why—it is not so flattering: the gunner feels safer behind his gun than anywhere else. There might be added to this dictum the truth that the gunner has something to do, and that, in any form of struggle and strain, is a powerful aid and steadier to the nerves.

The general reader will also be particularly interested in the section dealing with the use of guns against flying machines. Unfortunately, Colonel Bethell does not deal with what many competent observers believe to be the chief problem involved (to wit, the action of artillery against aeroplanes), save in one very short paragraph on p. 192. Now this point is surely of capital importance. As the lay or civilian phrase goes, "you have only to look" at a gas-bag of any sort to see how vulnerable it is.

Mr. Blatchford, observing the manœuvres of last year in Picardy for the Daily Mail, brought out this point very clearly; and indeed it needs no emphasis. The whole of the fifth chapter in the book before us deals with "balloon guns," and nearly the whole of it is concerned with the business of destroying a gas-bag, the rest being concerned with the use of aerial vehicles for the dropping of explosives. Well, there is little doubt that the gas-bag in any form will be an object so liable to destruction that its main use will be for cutting across "elbows" in communications, for the general survey of country from a great height, for the carrying of news, rapidly and unexpectedly, from a force which is cut off, and the carrying of it under cover of the darkness.

The real point of our changing moment is the aeroplane. The whole problem of war has hitherto been the discovery of the enemy's massing. If he was performing a "conversion"—that is, bringing great bodies of troops from his right to his left, or in some other way preparing an unexpected strength in a particular section of his line, the only way of guessing at that was by surprise or prisoners, or the hardy action of small groups of cavalry. Doubt always remained by far the largest factor in the business, until the advent of the aeroplane. The aeroplane has changed everything in that regard. Short of a tempest, the French service could, should war break out this summer, discover exactly the tactical plan of an enemy during the course of an action—and no other service as yet can meet them. Even when, or if, the German service (and our own) have caught up the lead of the French in this matter, the aeroplane will still remain the dominating point of the modern change. That force which can destroy its enemy's aeroplanes or put them at a disadvantage will blind its opponent: it will put out its eyes.

We emphasise this essential rather crudely because public opinion, and even military opinion, does not yet seem to seize its capital importance. The old army was like a blind man feeling: the army equipped with aeroplanes (in the only service which as yet has got a competent body of these machines) is like a man seeing. Whoever keeps his aeroplanes in a superiority of number and efficiency cripples those of his opponent's, retains for himself the power of seeing, and has all the advantages of a man with good sight over a man blind or half-blind in a fight between them. However violently the new fact be expressed or emphasised, it cannot be exaggerated. It is the capital change which the year 1910 forced in the Plains of Picardy upon the art of War.

The crucial question, therefore, is, What damage can be done to the aeroplane and how?

It is particularly a question for gunners. The rifle is out of it. The membranes of the aeroplane (which present the actually large visible targets) are not in question. A bullet through them would have no effect. If one of the main wooden supports were struck, the bullet at a distance would probably glance from its oval section, and a broadside shot means the hitting of a slender rod at many hundreds of yards range and at an indefinite height in the air. There remains the chance of striking the driver. It is infinitesimal. To destroy the propeller would not bring the aeroplane to the ground, for it can glide. In a word, the rifle is useless, and doubly useless from the fact that an aeroplane observes what is behind the enemy's firing line from a trajectory situated well within the firing line of its own troops, and at any height from 1,500 to 2,000 feet. Guns alone can deal with these instruments; but so far as recent experience goes, it is very doubtful whether they can deal with them effectively. The aeroplane is shooting through the air at anything between thirty-five miles and sixty miles an hour; it has a complete view of the country beneath it. The gun with which it can be attacked must be mounted upon a motor chassis and must follow roads. Of all objects upon the surface of the earth a road is the most conspicuous to an observer situated some hundreds of feet above the soil. The first preoccupation of the airman would be to mark upon the roads beneath him the presence of such an instrument, and he could detect it long before he had any chance of beginning to fix the range. Even did he give it that opportunity many shots would have to be fired with a smoke-trail shell before the target was approached, and the aeroplane could be out of range within twenty seconds.

An alternative suggestion has been to provide a number of such pieces and to conceal them. It is doubtful whether such a manœuvre would be successful, and that on account of the reason just given. The artillery could only act within its own firing line. The first range-fixing shot—practically certain to be very wide—would betray the attack, and an aeroplane can dart away from danger almost simultaneously with the discovery of its existence. The whole business may be compared to the shooting of birds, such as rooks, while in flight, with a pea-rifle. Now if the aeroplane is nearly invulnerable, it follows that war has wholly changed in its character.

On page 361 Colonel Bethell tells us that "a dirigible, aeroplane, &c., now form part of the equipment of every large fortress." The words "Saving those under the control of our War Office" should be added.

A SONG OF THE MOTOR

To travel through the night by road, one's own safety and that of trusting friends dependent on one's ever-watchful eyes, skill in handling the impulsive car and cool nerve to avert accident, is no light undertaking. When, in addition, the journey extends from Thames to Firth of Forth, the engine is not to be allowed to stop under any circumstance, and the car has to be kept running on top gear only, it is not altogether absurd to liken the performance to some of the deeds of derring-do which have been fortunate enough to become immortalised by the poets. It is true that very fine head-lamps throw comforting beams of white light a long way ahead, but this very light is sometimes the cause of doubt, for it makes such vivid contrasts that the sense of proportion and distance is upset. Any one knowing our English roads well is aware that they are absurdly narrow, stupidly cambered, and that they wind and twist and branch off suddenly in the most disconcerting manner. To drive a motor-car any distance through the country is like performing trick-driving in a gymkhana, so that one may imagine something of what a journey from London to Edinburgh means when undertaken through the dusk and murk of night.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Putting oneself in the place of the driver of a powerful car like the Gear-Boxless Sheffield-Simplex, which recently triumphantly carried out this run under the conditions referred to, in fancy one can follow something of his sensations and experience. London is threaded, say, in daylight, the traffic threatening several times to hold the car up—a contingency not to be thought of without dismay seeing that from start to finish top-gear only is allowable under watchful observation of official eyes, and that the whole raison d'être of the journey would be destroyed. Once in the suburbs, where gardens and trees have yet many weeks to wait before Nature fully awakes from her hibernation, more freedom of movement is possible, and the pulse of the six-cylinder engine can be more easily noted by the excusably-anxious driver, who has so much before him. Without undue haste, but losing no time, the open country is reached, and one can see from horizon to horizon the vast arc of the grey sky growing gradually darker with the rapidly-waning afternoon. Though with every sense on the alert, the driver has opportunity to note the sad and depressing effect of lonely expanses of ploughed fields bordered by gaunt trees, and he cannot help picturing them as they will be later when Summer comes into her own, with the drowsy air scented by innumerable flowers, larks fluttering joyously up into the blue gates of Heaven, hedgerows and ditches lush with vivid green nettles and grasses, and the whole countryside filled with the murmurous sounds of insect life enjoying the warmth of the sun that has given them their brief life.

Then the reality around him, with its cold searching wind and its remaining signs of long-continued wet, buffets away this momentary day-dream, and he instinctively makes a sideway movement with a foot resting upon a sliding pedal. This slightly opens the throttle and the car speeds on faster into the gathering dusk as if impatient to get its task done. The oncoming gloom then makes objects indistinct and the horn is sounded more frequently and imperiously, and in good time before overtaking or meeting other vehicles. The driver begins to consider the advisability of switching on the electric lamps, though it is not yet lighting-up time by law, and, finally, decides that he prefers to wait awhile even though he is obliged to peer sharply ahead. Another movement of the foot smoothly, but insistently, slows the car's speed to a more sedate pace, as the road winds and a town is not very far off if his calculations are correct. He proves right, and as soon as the first twinkling light comes into view he switches on all the car's lamps. For a few moments the contrast is such that his eyes have to correct their focus, and he sits a little more upright and masterfully at the wheel. The admirable torque or turning movement imparted to the driving shaft by the six pistons allows the car to proceed through the streets of the town quite inoffensively, and though an erratic slow and heavy waggon ahead necessitates pulling up to little more than a crawl, the driver senses from experience that the top-gear can be maintained.

Once more in the heart of the country and negotiating hill ranges, the car is given full latitude of pace and power, though by this time it is pitch dark, and side turnings loom up with startling suddenness, except when finger-posts or warning-signs properly placed are picked out far ahead by the beams from the head-lamps. Conversation among the passengers is desultory, and carried on in subdued tones, and, when spoken to directly, the driver answers in monosyllables. He has to try and remember his bearings in comparison with a map he closely studied beforehand. Though a map is carried, and is being constantly referred to by one of the party with the aid of an electric torch, a fork in the road may easily lead to a mistake in direction. Once the wrong way be taken inadvertently it will be impossible to turn back because that would demand the use of the reverse gear. To be on the wrong road at all is certain to add considerably to the difficulties of the attempt, and the driver has to slow down in all cases of doubt.

Hour after hour the car reels off the miles. The driver finds it difficult to determine whether he is going up hill or down except on really steep gradients. Strange freaks of memory come to his mind, such as the belief in pixies, talk of ghosts that haunt the highways, and Dick Turpin's famous ride. Slipping through dark villages or the deserted streets of sleeping towns, his thoughts irresistibly dwell on the people there who are forced by an unconquerable physical law to cease their labours or idle pleasures for the brief space of night. He knows that shortly his own eyes will be aching for lack of sleep, and he begins to hate and almost to fear the ever-receding pall of blackness ahead of the car's lights. The miles seem eternal, though the great-hearted car spurns them all without falter; the tension he has been enduring for so long and so far is beginning to tell on him; he realises that his very life and those of the passengers are in the hollow of his hand. An instant's misjudgment or lack of control from fatigue or eye-strain would mean disaster, and he must relax no jot in watchfulness though he yearns for rest.

Suddenly the exclamation "Scotland!" from the map-holder tells him that the great journey is nearly done. Another hour's progress, perhaps two, will show him the great castle dominating the modern Athens, for dawn is breaking slowly but surely. There are still big ascents to overcome, but the gallant car has conquered worse in the womb of the night, and he has now no doubt that the goal will be won and the great attempt become an accomplished deed. Tongues are loosened and succulent food is passed round, the driver champing hungrily and demanding more as he steers with one hand in perfect command of the docile car. Light and food restore his confidence, hills are breasted at "full throttle," the level "devoured," and descents almost flown. A dark grey mass upstanding in the distance in a haze of smoke resolves into hill and castle, and only a few minutes later the great top-gear run is at an end.

ANTHONY HAMILTON.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE MEXICAN CRISIS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

IN spite of the lurid reports in the daily press of "big battles"—which, reduced to their proper military significance, are nothing more or less than petty engagements—the optimistic opinion prevails in well-informed Mexican circles in London that the worst of the revolution is over, and that only guerilla warfare on a small scale is to be expected. It is felt that Señor Madero, the leader of the insurgents, must be coming to the end of his financial resources, and as revolt, like any other form of armed hostility, is an expensive game, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the collapse of organised resistance to President Diaz's forces is at hand. There is a very strong rumour abroad that the whole trouble has been engineered and kept alive in the interests of a certain powerful American financial group which has been opposed in a very active way to an important British enterprise in Mexico, and which hopes to profit considerably in the event of the downfall of the existing régime. If there is truth in this rumour—and emanating as it does from serious sources it is worthy of more than passing attention—then it is a pity that the Government of the United States should be used as a cats-paw. It would certainly seem as though the insurgents have some ulterior motive in the choice of the frontier as their battle-ground. British money is interested in Mexico to the extent of nearly fifty millions sterling, apart altogether from enormous sums invested in American undertakings operating in the country.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE POLITICAL SITUATION IN RUSSIA

For the moment there is a lull in the Russian political crisis. It must not be imagined, however, that the situation brought about by the suspension of the Legislature and the Imperial promulgation in the interim of the Western Provinces Zemstvos Bill is at an end. M. Stolypin has certainly achieved a notable triumph over his opponents, but it is a triumph very much of a personal nature and cannot endure. This view is borne out by the recent action of the Council of State, which body, after listening to a blunt explanation by the Premier, decided that its interpellation on the subject was not affected by any statements he had made. Article 87 of the Fundamental Laws, under which the Zemstvos Bill was promulgated, requires that any Bill so promulgated shall subsequently be submitted to the Legislature for confirmation. It therefore remains to be seen whether the Duma will prove complaisant, or whether, regarding the peremptory action of M. Stolypin as a wanton usurpation of constitutional rights, it will seek to censure him. In this latter event a grave crisis will be precipitated and the dissolution of the Chamber could be the only alternative to the Premier's resignation. In the meantime it cannot be denied that M. Stolypin has more than an appearance of reason on his side. To the Duma and its supporters he says blandly:—"Why do you complain? Though you may not think so, I have all the time been fighting your battles. You originally passed the Bill which is essentially Nationalist in character. The Upper House rejected it—and now I have merely invoked the aid of Article 87 in order to enforce your will. Am I not, therefore, the champion of popular liberties?" And, turning to the Council of State, he exclaims:—"It is your ardent wish to see the Monarchical Power maintained unimpaired. Yet, when I employ the Imperial Ukase as a means to legislation you call my conduct into question." Thereupon M. Stolypin confesses that he is bewildered. But the Council of State is also bewildered. And, last, but by no means least, the Duma is bewildered. It is a delightfully perplexing situation: a drama with a strong touch of comedy. Little wonder is it that amid such a storm of conflicting elements M. Stolypin should be a much-abused man. He is called a stern dictator, an implacable enemy of liberty, a usurper of monarchical power. But M. Stolypin cannot fill all these rôles and at the same time remain the champion of the people. What, then, is he? Here is suggested a nice problem for the student of Russian politics.

Dwelling upon the circumstance that, when as a country gentleman and practically unknown, he emerged from his estates on the banks of the Volga to save Russia in the hour of her supreme crisis, and emphasising the undeniable fact that his administration has been marked by steady reform, boldly conceived and almost heroically carried out, the British Press has pictured M. Stolypin not as being gifted with the attainments of a genius but simply as a man of lucid mind and direct method—in short, as a safe sentry to keep watch and guard over the interests of State. But surely he is more than this, much as it implies. Have not recent events proved him to be a diplomatist of first rank, endowed with rare and subtle qualities? For the rest, his strength lies in the fact that, unless he gets his own way, he is ready at a moment's notice to retire to the peace of his rural estates at Saratoff. The Emperor and the nation are reluctant to part with his services. It is not so much that there is none who could worthily fill his place; but it is the knowledge that he has secured to Russia an era of genuine progress—that, in other words, his policy has had practical results—which keeps him in office to-day.

To the Council of State M. Stolypin has made out a very plausible case. It would be foolish, nay, even criminal, he asserts, to make Article 87 a permanent feature of the Government. It must only be employed when warranted by extraordinary circumstances, and he is careful to add that these circumstances may arise whether the Legislature happens to be sitting or not. He goes on to explain—and here is to be found the grip of his policy—that Parliament could not be allowed to determine whether, in such event, circumstances were in reality "extraordinary" enough to justify the application of the Article; nor could the action of the Government in advising the Monarch be made the subject of discussion or interpellation. Finally, he lays it down that the right of the Throne to issue Ukases cannot in any circumstances be restricted. It is difficult to forecast the upshot of a situation so amazingly complicated. The Council of State and the Duma are equally offended by M. Stolypin's high-handed action. The Upper Chamber is angry not only because the Bill has been passed against its will, but because of the constitutional principle involved as regards itself. The Lower Chamber is irate principally because of the affront to its legislative dignity. Therefore, to a large extent, both Chambers have common cause. Yet, as a rule, they do not work together in anything like perfect harmony. The reactionary and Conservative elements find their natural home in the Council of the State. This body would doubtless have approved of M. Stolypin's methods had they been applied solely to the Lower House. But the case is altogether different when they themselves are affected. Then the sacred rights and privileges of the Legislature are inviolable, and M. Stolypin is viewed in the light of a harsh dictator. There have been some signs of a mild entente between the two Chambers, with the Premier as the enemy of both; but whatever progress may be made in this direction, obviously it will not lead to a solution, for the Duma contains elements that are fundamentally irreconcilable with those included in the Council. Oil poured on water may serve a useful purpose for a time, but any attempt to employ these constituents as a fluid mixture must fail. It is the same with the two branches of the Russian Legislature.

Thus it may be said that M. Stolypin has succeeded in confounding his enemies and confusing his friends. But, as I have said, it is a triumph that cannot endure. In spite of subtle explanations, the real motive that has animated him stands out in clear relief. He had grown utterly weary of the obstructionist tactics adopted by his antagonists, the friends of reaction, in the Council of State. Wisely he determined that so long as they barred the way he could not carry on the good government of the country. He could only consent to withdraw his resignation on condition that a rebuff was administered to them such as would restore beyond question his own power and prestige. It is a pity that while this procedure may be said to have achieved its immediate object, a struggle with the Legislature could not have been averted, a struggle, moreover, which has given both Chambers common cause against the Premier. Consequently M. Stolypin's triumph will yet prove to have been merely a momentary, and therefore an empty one. If not over the confirmation of the Zemstvos Bill, the principle involved may be raised in connection with other matters. Naturally the Russian people have become very jealous of the new and precious gift of representative government, and their Parliament is not likely to accept mildly M. Stolypin's ruling that in no circumstances has it a right to question the Government's action in enforcing Article 87. If the Premier is wise he will avoid another conflict with the Legislature. In any case, it would seem that a situation has been created from which he will find it very difficult to escape, and before long his resignation may be expected. In that event M. Kokovtsoff, the present Finance Minister, would succeed him, and M. Davydoff, the Director of the Credit Chancellery, would become Finance Minister. Happily, both these eminent statesmen are warm friends of this country.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CHINESE FINANCE

After lengthy negotiations, a contract for a loan of ten millions sterling has been signed at Peking between the Chinese Government and representatives of American, British, French, and German banking groups. No provision is made in the agreement for the appointment of a foreign official to supervise the expenditure of the money, and it is not yet clear whether this matter has been left in abeyance or shelved altogether. It is difficult to believe that the various parties concerned will neglect to take adequate measures to protect their interests. Corruption in China is still deep-seated and widespread, and past experience, notably in connection with native railway administration, dictates that elaborate precautions must be adopted in order to prevent the proceeds of the loan being squandered. Doubtless it will be urged that in the present case the security is gilt-edged; but as the money borrowed is to be devoted to such important objects as currency reform and the development of Manchuria, it is obvious that, security or no security, any maladministration will tend to undermine the general credit of China, and must inevitably affect the loan bonds in question. The need for drastic reform in the finances of the Empire was admirably summarised by Dr. Morrison a little while ago:—

> There is certainly room (he wrote) for financial reform in China, where no Budget is issued; where nineteen different kinds of dollars of different exchange value are current, besides newly-coined taels, Chinese rupees, and an infinite variety of copper coins and brass cash; where debased subsidiary coinage is issued and not accepted at its face value by the Government issuing it; where an unlimited provincial note issue, without a bullion reserve, and other irregularities exist that make China a paradise of the money-changers and its currency confusion greater than any country under heaven. In Peking five different dollars are current. In the adjoining Shansi province only British dollars are accepted without discount, while in the benighted telegraph service in many stations, even so near Peking as Kalgan, no dollars are accepted, but only silver bullion cut with a hammer and chisel. The inland taxation of the Empire, as at present designed, hampers industry, increases the trade depression, adds to the burdens of a trade already suffering, and prevents the growth of national wealth; yet the possibilities of trade and commerce in China under a rational financial administration are simply infinite.

In so far as a certain proportion of the loan is to be devoted to the development of Manchuria, it may be said to bear an important political aspect. American bankers, at the instigation of the Washington Government, took the lead in the negotiations. The declared policy of Mr. Knox, the Secretary of State, is to interest the Powers in the exploitation of the Three Eastern Provinces, so as to "neutralise" this region as far as possible, and supply China with the funds essential for the reassertion of her sovereignty. That Japan and Russia—both claiming and, as a matter of fact, actively occupying spheres of influence in Manchuria—were excluded is not without significance. It will be objected that neither of these Powers was in a financial position of sufficient strength to enable her to participate. Such an excuse may serve the immediate purposes of those engaged in diplomacy; but it will not satisfy the spectators of the game, who know full well that both Russia and Japan could easily find the necessary funds if it came to the point of having to uphold political prestige. Meanwhile, as a result of the initiative of America, the first and a very interesting attempt has been made to check the designs of Japan and Russia in Manchuria. But, with honesty and efficiency so sadly lacking in the Administration, it is open to doubt whether money alone can save this territory for China.

EARLY BRITISH MASTERS AT MESSRS. SHEPHERDS' GALLERY

Messrs. Shepherds' Spring Exhibition, now open in St. James's-street, aims, as heretofore, at bringing into greater prominence the work of some of the lesser painters of the British school, who are apt to be too much overshadowed by the great men who have made it famous. Singularly enough, the most remarkable picture in the collection does not belong to the British school at all, but is either Spanish or Neapolitan, the name of the painter being still uncertain. It represents the three-quarter length figure of a man looking into a hand-mirror, and is a very fine piece of work, full of strength and feeling and rich, beautiful colour. Another picture not of the British school which is very interesting and charming, in a totally different manner, treated with porcelain-like freshness, shows a young girl in a straw hat, and is by Philip Mercier.

Turning, however, to the British painters, such an Exhibition as Messrs. Shepherds' must always be valuable and interesting to students of British art. The fact that Reynolds, Gainsborough, Raeburn, and Romney were not the only painters of the British school whose work deserves attention is certainly one which requires to be emphasised, and our need of a more complete national collection was recently touched on in these columns. For their own merits no less than on account of their importance and interest from an historical and technical point of view, because of what may be called their blood-relationship to the works of our greatest painters, the lesser men of the British school are worthy of attention.

Messrs Shepherd have been able to bring together at least one picture by each of the Norwich painters—Constable and old Crome, Cotman and Stark—by the latter of whom there is a delicately-treated study of sunlight in a woodland landscape. Prominence is given, too, to a large and certainly fine landscape by Wilson—an "Italian Lake;" and the exhibition includes an interesting and charming portrait—"A young girl with a rose"—by a little-known woman-artist of the eighteenth century—Catherine Read. Among the paintings under more famous names, one of the most interesting is perhaps the small but delightful sketch by Gainsborough of a favourite dog, on the back of which is written in the artist's hand, "Bumper, a most remarkable, sagacious Cur."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

PRACTICALLY the past week has been devoted to holidays. Everybody left the City on Thursday firmly convinced that the markets would open on Tuesday with a boom. They did nothing of the sort. On the contrary, on Tuesday morning everybody appeared anxious to take a profit. The fine weather, so far from having filled people with confidence, seemed to have given them caution; only the oil enthusiasts remained serene. This is one more example of how contrary the Stock Exchange is. Since Tuesday we have had nothing but shocks. Mexico was to be annexed by the United States, the Rockefellers were going to wipe the floor with Kuhn, Loeb and Company, and every bull in the Home Railway market seemed determined to take his profit.

Naturally, no new issues have been made during Easter. The only person who was ever bold enough to bring out a prospectus in the holiday times was the inimitable Horatio Bottomley, who, if my memory serves me correctly, brought out his Associated Gold Mines of Western Australia during the Christmas holidays and secured an over subscription. But then Horatio Bottomley is a genius.

The Sungei Purun Rubber Company is going to make a market in its shares, and issues a notice for public information only. This is not the kind of thing we are accustomed to from high-class directors like Mr. Hamilton and Mr. Young. The Sungei Purun has an area of 1,119 acres, of which 615 acres are planted with young rubber, consequently the price to be paid is very high. Young rubber is not worth more than £10 an acre. But, quite apart from the price, it is a very bad precedent that high-class people should float companies in the way that this one is floated.

MONEY.—Naturally as soon as the holidays were over money became easy, and as a result gilt-edged securities hardened. If the bull account in Home Rails is seriously decreased this will relieve the Money Market, and as there is no demand for money anywhere the Bank Rate must fall. It is not of any practical consequence to the commercial world whether the rate is $2\frac{1}{2}$ or 3. It only affects the price of gilt-edged securities. It is, of course, more difficult for banks to make money with the Rate at $2\frac{1}{2}$, and, on the whole, it might perhaps be better if we could keep our Rate steady at 3.

FOREIGNERS. There has been absolutely nothing doing in the Foreign Market. It remains completely idle, and beyond a few bargains in Perus and a few purchases of Tintos by the bear brigade there has not been a bargain going.

HOME RAILS.—Everybody has been taking a profit, and Great Westerns have felt the draught acutely. There is no disguising the fact that a big bull account exists in the Home Railway market, and contangoes are so high that it is impossible for any one to carry Home Rails profitably. Reasonable people have felt for some weeks that a reaction was necessary. I am still a strong believer in the future of English railways, but it would be foolish to ignore the technical position of the market. Most probably we shall see a decline of two or three points in all the stocks that have been so greedily bought during the past month. Then the public will again become aware of the fact that Home Railways, with money at $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., are an excellent investment. Another boom will set in, and prices will go to a higher level. See-saws are inevitable on the Stock Exchange. Those who have paid for their stocks need not be in the least alarmed. Those, of course, who are carrying should close their accounts and buy in again later on. But stamps and fees are so heavy that it does not pay to be perpetually jumping in and out of Home Railways.

YANKEES.—The American position looks disagreeable. Kuhn, Loeb and Co. have been ousted from the control of Missouri Pacific by the Rockefellers. The whole thing is a disagreeable comment upon the nature of the American. As long as the Yankee is doing well he is the most amiable person on earth; but ill-luck or misfortune seems to develop all his worst qualities. I do not say that there has been treachery; but certainly I know that the Kuhn Loeb people believed themselves secure in the support of the Standard Oil when they decided to take up the Missouri Pacific deal. Quite apart from this little contretemps, general conditions throughout the Western States are decidedly bad. Prices of produce have been falling steadily, and the Western farmers, always extravagant in times of prosperity, see their profits fading away, and now talk in gloomy fashion. On the whole, it looks wiser to keep out of Yankees. The Steel Trust people have evidently unloaded most of their securities on Europe. At any rate, the list of stockholders read at the meeting showed this; but it may only mean that the Finance houses in Europe have lent money on Steels.

MEXICO.—The ghastly stories of battle that are telegraphed over from Mexico have scared the holders of Mex rails. This shows how little the Stock Exchange appreciates the size of Mexico. The Mexican Railway is hundreds of miles from the scene of the fight, and under no circumstances could be affected even if the whole State of Chihuahua were in flames. The story goes that when the Mexican "revolution" broke out all the leading financiers sent down representatives to Mexico to report, and that none of them could find any war going on at all; most of them came home and said that it was a newspaper revolution. The English appear to have an idea that it is a fight between Lord Cowdray and J. D. Rockefeller. Mexican officials in London remain placid and unmoved. They believe the whole thing to be a political move on the part of Taft.

RUBBER.—The Rubber market is absolutely without interest, and the jobbers are one after the other slipping into the oil market, which is their nearest neighbour. There is still a great deal of talk about rubber valorisation, and the Brazilians threaten all kinds of things, but nothing comes of it. The Highlands report was fairly satisfactory, but the Asiatic report was not liked. However, both shares are much too high. Ayer Kuning report was disastrous, and within nine months the company has to ask its shareholders for more money. This throws a lurid light on the dangers of rubber-planting in the East.

OIL.—The Oil market has been booming and prices have jumped in the most astounding fashion. Black Sea Oil-fields, which I mentioned as a tip when they were only 22s. 6d., are now nearly £2, and are talked much higher. Maikop Pipes are also a great feature. Indeed, all the Maikop companies have been bought. Some of them, such as Maikop Spies, are good, but no one should buy any Maikop shares except those that I have mentioned. However, I think that the oil market has taken the place of rubber. The public seem coming in, but those who bought at the bottom should take their profit.

KAFFIRS.—It is idle to talk about the Kaffir market, for nothing has been done. Reports come over, but they are colourless. Those who follow the workings of the Kaffir market declare that there is a large bear account and that working-costs will be considerably reduced in the present year. Personally I do not think that the public are interested in Kaffirs.

RHODESIANS.—The Lonely has been sending over the most astounding cables. In January last a new reef was discovered which has been assaying ounces to the ton. The old reef went about 22dwts. The extraordinary developments on this mine have given the whole Rhodesian market an entirely different aspect; as a consequence Lonelys are talked to £5. At the present time this mine has only a ten-stamp battery, but it has about 70,000 shares in reserve which Lewis and Marks will probably sell to the dealers at a very big premium. Incidentally the rise in Lonelys affects both. United Rhodesia and Mayo subscribed for 5,000 at par in this mine when it was floated. Chartereds are also being talked better, probably on the news that the Chartered Company will be represented at the Coronation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

If the Coronation festivities can be so arranged that each holder of one hundred Chartered shares receives a ticket to Westminster Abbey the dealers in the market will be very pleased.

MISCELLANEOUS.—A.B.C. shares have had a nasty slump on the reduction in the interim dividend. It is evident that the new management is not quite so successful as the old. Vanguards have been bought on the news that the row between this Company and the L.G.O. has been settled.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

SIR ISAAC NEWTON'S ASSIGNMENT OF COPYRIGHT IN 1726

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—In the recent Parliamentary debate on "Copyright" Sir Isaac Newton's books were referred to as works to be reverenced. It may, therefore, interest some of your readers to know that in 1726 (the year before his death) Newton assigned the third edition of his magnum opus to his publishers for the term of fourteen years. This was before the Copyright Act existed, which necessitated a Royal licence from George I. ratifying Newton's arrangement with his publishers. Among the State papers for the reign of George I. at the Public Record Office is the following petition, with copy of Newton's assignment:—

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty. The humble petition of William Innys and John Innys of London booksellers

"Sheweth

"That they have at great charge and expense printed a new and correct Edition of a Book intituled Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica Auctore Isaaco Newtono Eq. Aur. Editio Tertia aucta et emendata, the Right of which Copy the said Sir Isaac Newton has assigned over to the said William and John Innys.

"Your Petitioners therefore humbly pray your Majesty will be graciously pleased to grant them your Royal License for the sole printing and publishing the said Book for the Term of fourteen years.

"And your Petitioners shall ever pray, &c., J° INNYS."

"A copy of Sir Isaac Newton's Assignment.

"Know all men by these Presents that I Sir Isaac Newton, Knt., for reasons me hereunto moving have assigned and do hereby assign and make over to William and John Innys the whole Right and Title to the Copy of my Book intituled Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica for the space of fourteen years next insuing, commencing the 25th of the Instant March. Witness my hand this 4th of March, 1725.

"Is. NEWTON."

The Royal Licence bearing George I.'s sign manual, and dated March 25th, 1725-6, is among the S.P.D. at the Record Office.

Lord Kelvin (as he afterwards became) brought out a facsimile of the above-named third edition of the "Principia" in 1879 at Glasgow.

CHARLES DALTON.

32, West Cromwell Road, S.W.

EDINBURGH VACATION COURSES

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—We would again respectfully invite the attention of your readers to the Edinburgh Vacation Courses in Modern Languages to be held for the seventh time in August next, within the University of Edinburgh. They are the only courses of the kind held in Scotland or the North of England for the benefit of British students of French, and for that of foreign students of English, and they have always been warmly appreciated both on educational and international grounds. Students and teachers of French who desire to improve their knowledge of the language on the easiest, pleasantest, and least costly terms will have the opportunity of being taught language, literature, composition, conversation, phonetics, &c., during three or more hours daily, by a staff of six distinguished Parisian professors and lecturers. Our Council of a hundred members, including the Principals of the four Scottish Universities, the Secretary of the Scottish Education Department, and other eminent educational authorities, are earnestly desirous of promoting both national education and international friendship, in both of which aims they have hitherto had a most gratifying measure of success. But as we possess neither funds nor endowments for the payment of expenses, we can only hope for renewed success, provided the attendance continues to be adequate. We need hardly add that no profit or emolument accrues to any one beyond the very moderate fees paid to our admirable and self-sacrificing staff.

Hoping that you will generously afford a little space for our appeal,

We are, Sir, your obedient Servants,

(Sgd.) REAY (Patron),

„ ALEXANDER DARROCH, Prof. of Education (Vice-President),

„ J. KIRKPATRICK, Emer. Hist. Prof. (Hon. Secretary).

BOOKS RECEIVED

VERSE

A Coronation Ode. By J. E. Pemberton. Cornish Brothers, Birmingham. 6d.

La Lyre d'Amour: An Anthology of French Love Poems from the Earliest Times down to 1866. Selected and Annotated by Charles B. Lewis. Frontispiece. Chatto and Windus. 5s. net.

Masterpieces of Lyrical Translation. Selected by Adam L. Gowans, M.A. Gowans and Gray. 6d. net.

Pilgrim Songs on the King's Highway. Selected by W James Wintle. Illustrated. John Ouseley. 5s. net.

The Songs of Old England. Selected by W. James Wintle. Illustrated. John Ouseley. 5s. net.

A Wayfarer's Treasures. By C. O. G. A. C. Fifield. 3s. 6d. net.

The Unfading Light. By Caroline Davonport Swan. Sherman, French, and Co., Boston, U.S.A.

Fancy's Guest, and other Verses. By H. Houston Peckham.

Dartmoor Mist, and some other Fancies told in Rhyme. By B. A. Bruen Corkran. Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d.

PERIODICALS

Tourist Magazine; The Moslem World; Caithness and Sutherland Records; Old Lore Miscellany of Orkney, &c.; "The Queen" Newspaper Book of Travel; Journal of the Imperial Arts League; Journal of the Gypsy Lore Society; N.R.A. Journal; The Triad; Revue Bleue; Mercure de France; Constitution Papers; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Eugenics Review; The Bibelot; University Correspondent; Wednesday Review; Trichinopoly; Peru To-day; Country Life in America; M.A.B.; People's Magazine; London University Gazette; Top-Notch; British Journal of Inebriety; Museum of Fine Arts Bulletin, Boston, U.S.A.; Dublin Review.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND THROUGH CANADA.

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)
Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.
For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.
For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Now Ready. Price 6d. The April
BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Swing of the Pendulum in the World of Letters.

DICKENS'S LOVE STORY. Full News of the Letters to his Friend, Henry Kolle.—By B. W. Matz.

A LONDON LETTER. On Topics Concerning Current English Books and Authorship.

APRIL ALL SORTS. The Plots and People of Six Recent Stories.

A TWO-FOLD BIOGRAPHY. Charming Mrs. Craigie and Gifted John Oliver Hobbes.

THE BIBLE TERCENTENARY. The Moving Story of the Book of English Books.

THE BOOK NEWSMAN. Current Events and Comments Possessing a Literary Interest.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of March, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some April Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Note the Dickens Article, and do not fail to get the APRIL BOOK MONTHLY, which is published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.
(Royal Charter dated 1839.)
Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—
ARGENTINA & BRAZIL
via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.
WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.
From LONDON to—
MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,
EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)
For further particulars apply to
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY
18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 67, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2034 [Registered as a Newspaper.] APRIL 29, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ECONOMICAL

Sheffield Simplex

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—Middleton & Townsend, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE and CHESHIRE:—The Hollingdrake Automobile Co., Stockport. SOUTH WALES:—George Ace, Ltd., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—Murray Aunger, Ltd., Adelaide, S.A. Moulder Brothers, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.

SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest References. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

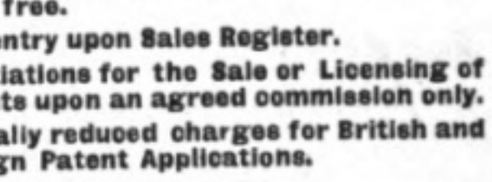
CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.



Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.
COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.
The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.
Interesting and useful Booklet free.
"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific MSS. carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science). Translations from French and German.
GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.
Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.
Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.
Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.
Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

A CHANCE for an AMBITIOUS DECORATOR.—A gentleman who is just finishing and decorating a West End residence desires to meet an artistic and original DECORATOR who would make designs for the decoration. Write Box 5,453, Willings', 125, Strand, W.C.

Edward Whistler,

II, Strand, Charing Cross, London.

DIAMOND MERCHANT :: :: JEWELLER & SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
ALSO
HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

George Odell,

31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES'. LONDON, S.W.

Ophthalmic and Mathematical Optician
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.

BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

The ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	507
Penance	508
The Bench Trust	508
Superabundant Shaw	509
An Oxford Poem by Henry Vaughan—III.	510
Reviews :—
Poetry and Verse—I.	511
The Amazing Duchess	512
Present-day Russia	513
The Church during the Last Century	514
A Home University Library	515
For the King !	516
Infantry Tactics	517
Visions	517
Shorter Reviews	518
Fiction	518
The Theatre	520
George Borrow—I.	522
Dover Straits	523
The late Sir Alfred Lyall	524
The Provincial Performances of Wagner's "The Ring of the Nibelung"	525
Cromwell's Head	526
The Poet's Holiday—VIII.	526
"Singapura"	527
French Reviews	529
Foreign Affairs	530
David Ricardo	531
In the Temple of Mammon	532
Correspondence	533
Books Received	534

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions : Inland 15s. ; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

Do the Government really suppose that their hectoring, bullying, non-compromise attitude is improving their prospect of passing the Parliament Bill into law ? Their Bill will go to the House of Lords in its original tyrannical shape. It will not in the House of Commons have been subjected to any thorough revision. It will have been passed, thanks to the thwacks of the mailed fist. There will have been no display of statesmanship. The House of Lords is to be called upon to swallow an ill-assorted, undigested mass with the pistol to its head. The nation, however slow to move, cannot remain impervious to the spectacle that the Opposition and the House of Lords are not receiving fair play, and if the people become convinced of that fact, there will be sufficient encouragement to the House of Lords and the Opposition to do their duty and resolve to reject the Parliament Bill. The condition of the front Ministerial bench in the House of Commons is a calamity for the due conduct of business, as well as for the interests of the State. Mr. Lloyd George's continued absence not only throws the national finances into confusion, but also is a serious blow to the good conduct of business in the House. With all his financial inability, he is yet a figure who, in other spheres of policy, speaks with authority and—in the House—with decorum. The House, led fitfully by Mr. Asquith in dogmatic, obstinate, and splenetic manner, is not in the mood to deal quite worthily with its business. In Mr. Asquith's frequent absences the leadership falls to a lieutenant who, by temperament, is peculiarly unfitted to occupy the position. The net result is that a revolution is intrusted to the guidance of a front bench which is not really fitted to control a Chamber even in times of peace and tranquillity.

We have received copies of the "Wednesday Review," published at Trichinopoly, and the "Indian Review," issued at Madras, for March. The latter, a monthly paper, is especially up to date and interesting in its treatment of current topics, and does not confine itself solely to Indian affairs. There is a well-written article, for instance, on "Bloated Armaments," deprecating the "exaggerated Navy" of England. Needless to say, we do not agree with all the writer says, and we are inclined to remark that in an Indian paper such an argument seems rather curious. Mr. Valentine Chirol has the place of honour with a closely-reasoned plea for a field of common endeavour in which "Englishmen and Indians" alike may labour for the welfare of the Empire. "So long as Englishmen and Indians have to live side by side in India," says the author, "it is eminently desirable that they should seek in their intercourse not the points of difference which political agitation must inevitably accentuate, but the points of contact which common economic interests always tend to produce." Such a sane point of view, wisely expressed, is calculated to do much good in these days of smouldering rebellion. A feature is made of extracts from the home reviews, the "world of books," and speeches on notable themes, and the interest is maintained at a high level by judicious editing. The "Wednesday Review," dealing with many serious matters, permits an occasional article in lighter vein; one entitled "The Humours of the Census" gives an amusing idea as to the difficulties of the supervisor and the enumerator in India. Leaving political questions out of consideration—since the writer of the "London Letter" seems rather at sea on two or three points—the March 29th issue of this capital weekly is well up to the mark demanded by both literary and commercial readers.

No particular infallibility in taste, we imagine, can be attributed to the various compilers of lists of the "hundred best books" who from time to time attract a modicum of attention; but when the area of selection is limited, as in the recent competition held by the Catholic Times, to the "Hundred Best Catholic Books" the result becomes rather curious. The list is divided into six portions—Devotional, Historical, Biographical, Poetry, Fiction, and Miscellaneous. Readers of THE ACADEMY will be especially interested in several of the names which have won a place. Mrs. Craigie, whose "Life" we recently reviewed, of course is represented by the "School for Saints" and "Robert Orange;" Mr. Hilaire Belloc leads off easily in the "Miscellaneous" column with his delightful "Path to Rome," and Mr. John Ayscough, whose name should be quite well known to our subscribers, has no fewer than four novels chosen by the competitors. We can commend their taste, but we are surprised that the clever study entitled "Mr. Beke of the Blacks" was not one of the books to be named. In poetry, Francis Thompson is at the head; to the surprise of those who organised the competition, Crashaw, Dryden, and Pope received too few votes for inclusion. The late Mr. Marion Crawford, Father Hugh Benson, Canon Sheehan, Sir William Butler, and other notable and familiar names figure prominently; altogether the lists, and the editorial analysis of them, form a most interesting page.

We announce with pleasure that a mass meeting will be held at the Albert Hall on May 23rd, which will be addressed by Mr. Balfour and Mr. F. E. Smith in furtherance of the Imperial Preference propaganda. This evidence of the vigilance and activity of the Tariff Reform League will be most welcome to all who have the unity and interests of the Empire at heart.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

PENANCE

"O Soul," the Spirit said, "thee, men shall call
A flower. Thy thoughts shall rock on summer wind;
Praised shalt thou be, and loved—yet deaf to all;
White, tremulous and ravishing—yet blind:
Fragrant as Eastern gardens, when at noon,
The sun doth all his mighty love confess,
Yet all thy perfume banned from thee. And soon
A death shall visit thee of bitterness
To bend thy stately height of yesterday,
Make havoc with thy petals hour by hour,
Till those who pass thy resting-place shall say:
'There lies among the leaves a withered flower.'
For thy few sins, these be thy sinless woes;
Go, blind and beautiful. Thou art—a rose."

W. L. R.

THE BENCH TRUST

We hear from time to time rumours that in certain eventualities 500 respectable gentlemen will attain to the goal of Radical felicity, and dress themselves in coronets and ermine. There will be no time for the appointment of a Royal Commission to report on the best method of selection. No advisory committees can be appointed, because the members would inevitably recommend their own claims, and the claims of those united with them by ties, which might be elusive if examination were attempted. Pending the carrying out of the heaven-sent scheme for attaining to the highest dignities, Mr. Asquith's leaders are clamouring because they are not appointed Justices of the Peace in battalions.

These gentry are very difficult to satisfy. When Lord Loreburn was appointed Chancellor he added many thousand names to the Commission of the Peace, the large majority of whom professed the Radical faith. To have gone further in this direction would have been to prostitute the Bench and convert it into a rabble of political placemongers.

Then arose a great upheaval. The Lord Chancellor, instead of "redressing the balance," positively in many cases appointed gentlemen of Conservative views on the entirely irrelevant ground that in his judgment they were the men best fitted to fulfil the judicial and administrative functions of a Justice of the Peace.

In September last we wrote:—

> Lord Loreburn has been the target for virulent howls from the Socialist mob, who are the rag-tag and bobtail of the once great Liberal party. His crime, as would be expected, is his honesty. He declines to appoint a street-corner politician to the Magisterial Bench simply because his heroics are directed against the foundations of Society. Lord Loreburn prefers to appoint a rational man, although in his eyes he labours under the disadvantage of being a Conservative. Merit appeals to him, not politics for profit.

These remarks apply to the period when, following the customary method, Justices were appointed by the Lord Chancellor on the recommendation of the Lord-Lieutenant.

As a concession to clamour a Royal Commission, composed of representative men, under the chairmanship of Lord James of Hereford, was appointed, and in the following passage the Report is almost nakedly unashamed:—

> Our Commission bids us labour to find a remedy for an evil assumed to exist. It is therefore our duty to suggest steps for securing the selection of Justices of the Peace unaffected by their supposed political merits.

"Assumed" to exist! Are we wrong when we say that the Commission was appointed as a concession to clamour?

In the Reference to the Commission are these words:—

> Whereas we have deemed it expedient that a Commission should forthwith issue to consider and report whether any and what steps should be taken to facilitate the selection of the most suitable persons to be Justices of the Peace, irrespective of creed and political opinion.

What a disappointing reference! There is no need to waste time in glancing at the action in the House of Commons of Mr. Wedgwood, Mr. Agar-Robartes, or Mr. King; but Mr. Neil Primrose, as the son of a distinguished father, naturally arrests our attention. This young gentleman wrote a letter to the Lord Chancellor, to which no self-respecting Minister or man would deem any reply necessary. The ingenuous youth calmly ignored the whole trend—Advisory Committees and all and sundry—of the Report of the Commission appointed by his own party—a Report dated as recently as July last. According to the Commissioners—

> "The evils now existing in the system of selecting Justices of the Peace can, to a great extent, be remedied by removing political opinions and political action from the influences affecting such selection."

Not so!

> "A Daniel come to judgment! yea, a Daniel!
> O wise young judge, how do I honour thee!"
>
> [Mr. Neil Primrose (patronisingly)]: No doubt no fault can be found with the gentlemen who have been appointed, but I would venture to point out to your lordship that as good men, with even better claims, could have been found among the Liberals in that district [Isle of Ely], and that it has caused great dissatisfaction that the party which raised your lordship to the high position which you hold should be treated with this studied neglect.

The schoolmaster is indeed abroad—and armed with his birch-rod. The exquisite taste of ignoring all the labour of poor Radical Bob Reid in the House of Commons and the country, and assuming to himself, the Wedgwoods and the others the rôle of kingmaker is inimitable. If, however, the erring Chancellor is fittingly rebuked, the Royal Commission is entirely flouted:—

> [The Lord Chancellor] is the head of the Justiciary, and in that character is entrusted with the task of deciding what is best for the administration of justice. He is your Majesty's responsible adviser in regard to the appointment of Judges, and in giving such advice he does not act as a politician.

Clearly, therefore, Mr. Primrose, as a politician, has no right to question the action of the Lord Chancellor, neither has the Lord Chancellor, "not acting as a politician," any other resource than to view Mr. Primrose's action as youthful indiscretion requiring no notice, or alternatively as an instance of undiluted impertinence.

We adhere to the opinion we expressed in our issue of July 16th last with respect to Advisory Committees:—

> The small Committees which are proposed to be formed as advisers to the Lord Chancellor and Lord-Lieutenant on selection, are very much the sort of bodies or persons from whom those gentlemen receive advice at the present time. The only conceivable object in creating these representative Committees is as a tribute to the fussiness of the present day. It is a symptom of the prevalent rooted objection to leaving well alone, and in some way flaunting the perfectly obvious and already existent as a matter of grave importance, a discovery remarkable for its novelty. With respect to the desire to withdraw the political atmosphere from the region of judicial appointments, we are very sceptical whether the small Committees will prove to be of any special value. If the Lord Chancellor and Lord-Lieutenant are as open to political pressure as has been suggested, we see no reason to believe that these small advisory boards, composed of goodness-knows-who, will be any less likely to be open to similar pressure.

We do not believe any better result would have been arrived at if the Chancellor had been able to consult such a Committee in the case of the appointments to the Ely Bench

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SUPERABUNDANT SHAW*

CONSCIENTIOUSLY, but with intervals for refreshment, we have read through the five hundred pages of this tome, and feel strongly inclined to hide ourselves for six months or so in rocks and caves of the earth, where the blinding rays of Mr. Shaw's genius have not yet penetrated, where the craft of the assiduous biographer is unknown, and where a heavenly, peaceful silence on the subject of Shaw and all his works might soothe our troubled breast. Yet, on another page of this same issue of THE ACADEMY, Mr. Shaw is still to the fore—but the writer of that pleasant critique had not blazed his way through a forest of Shaw before attending "Fanny's First Play." We feel disposed also to link arms with Professor Henderson, M.A., Ph.D., and to inform him that there exist useful minor arts of condensation, discrimination, comparison, and elimination of which he seems never to have heard. Away back in the dim recesses of North Carolina he heard the siren voice of the clever, garrulous gentleman who is busily engaged in reforming England, and "conceived the idea" of writing a book—at first only a short book—entitled "G.B.S." Would that he had carried out his project of composing that preliminary volume, and ceased upon the midnight, for it would have been fifty times more readable and interesting than the present portentous effort.

However, assisted by Mr. Shaw's "abundant sympathy and encouragement," the ingenious lion-tamer investigated, grew more and more enthusiastic, and finally lost his head in sheer admiration of the beauty of his task. He came to England (at Mr. Shaw's invitation) to "study his subject;" he sat at Gamaliel's feet, and has here set down material sufficient to stay the appetites of Mr. Shaw's most eager disciples for many a long day. The unsophisticated reader of Professor Henderson's disquisitions will imagine that Shaw is a combination of Disraeli, W. S. Gilbert, Meredith ("a master of the comic spirit," says the ardent biographer), and several other world-famous names—this perhaps is because Mr. Shaw's voice rings loudly through the professorial megaphone; but on some of his pages Professor Henderson rather disqualifies himself as a critic of any value. The comparison of Shaw with Gilbert, for instance, though it has been made before by Mr. Walkley (and doubtless by others), strikes us as wrong. Sir William Gilbert wrote—alas, that we must use the past tense!—frankly to amuse, and his roseleaf irony scarcely ever reached the dignity of satire; Shaw writes grimly, with laughter as the handmaiden of his sardonic denunciation; it is the difference between pelting a man with bon-bons and bombarding him with explosive crackers, between a battle of flowers and a battle of swords. Much more reasonable would it be to compare Shaw with Henry James, despite the utter dissimilarity of styles and the infinitely greater depth of insight of our acclimatised novelist, since in the work of both authors the conflicts, crises, and in fact the whole interests centre not in any extrinsic events actually portrayed, but in the minds and souls of their characters.

It is perhaps inevitable in such a work as this that certain repetitious phrases should get upon the reader's nerves. On page after page Mr. Shaw "frankly confesses," "vehemently repudiates," "replies with quizzical disdain," "solemnly announces," "candidly avers;" he "once remarked to me," "smilingly reminded me," "continued impressively," and so on. We hear how Paderewski affected Shaw; how David Bispham, the De Reszkes, Gerster, Patti, Joachim, Ysaye, and the music of various composers affected Shaw; how Holbein, Rembrandt, Velasquez, Hogarth affected Shaw; and the question is forced upon us, What really does it matter to anybody? If a biography was necessary, why not have eliminated all this superfluous and dreary droning out of Shaw's opinions? Why not have written in clear, concise, pithy English a survey and valuation of the dramatic work which is undoubtedly of considerable worth, by which he has become so widely known? We confess we do not care two straws to hear that Mr. Shaw as a small boy could whistle whole operas and oratorios "from the first bar to the last" with the facility of a street urchin who whistles music-hall songs, or to be told how he "sang incessantly." There is far too much of the trivial in Professor Henderson's appreciation of his hero.

On the other hand, the chapters which tell of the rise of the Socialistic spirit in London, dating as it does from about 1880, of the genesis of the Fabian Society, and of various controversies upon economic matters, are capital reading and form valuable contributions to the history of the period. "Bernard Shaw," wrote "George Calderon" in the preface to that curious little play "The Fountain," "like Lloyd George and all those nurtured in the Socialism of the early 'eighties, still believes in the fantastic old Wicked Rich myth," and these particular chapters throw some sharp sidelights upon the progress of that myth. The illustrations, of which there are many, are as a rule very good. Another excellent feature is the portion of the book dealing with the brilliant Vedrenne-Barker seasons at the Court Theatre—seasons which made theatrical history rapidly and forced both the critics and the public to sit up and look about them. Again, the biographer can be a keen commentator when he permits his head to rise above the streaming flood of Shavian words, as this quotation shall prove. Referring to the plays, Professor Henderson says:—

> The vital defect in Shaw's women is that they are too blatant, too obvious, too crude. They are lacking in mystery, in finer subtlety, in the sub-conscious and obscurer instincts of sex, in the arts of exquisite seduction, of keenly-felt yet only half-divined allurement. The Life Force goes about its business, one would fain remind Mr. Shaw, not openly and with a blare of trumpets, but by a thousand devious and hidden paths. . . .
>
> Shaw's mistake consists in painting woman, not as she really, normally is, but as his preconceived philosophic system requires her to be. He planks down for our inspection less a life-like portrait of the eternal feminine than a philosophic interpretation of the "superior sex." . . .

After this, however, the author remarks:—"Of course, there is always the danger of taking Shaw too seriously." There is indeed. Can we take Mr. Shaw seriously, for example, when he writes that the real object of the modern system of education "is to relieve parents from the insufferable company and anxious care of their children," and that "children are nuisances to adults except at playful moments"? Professor Henderson has by no means escaped that pitfall of too solemn a judgment of his subject. He refers to an amusing little interview with Mr. Shaw which appeared in THE ACADEMY for April 30th, 1898, signed "C. R." (possibly Mr. Clarence Rook); we have looked it up on our files, and have been highly entertained. If Professor Henderson read it through, it should have warned him.

We need not say much more, although plenty more could be said. This premature 500-page biography has its interesting portions, its valuable chapters, its amusing interludes, but there is far too much of it. Professor Henderson will for a time, we trust, continue to elevate the intellectual standard of North Carolina without troubling his head about our clever, agile, persistent, entertaining, paradoxical social reformer. In the sunny, Shavian future of our earth, no doubt, when Mr. Shaw's plays are performed in the green gloom of Papua, when not only Dan and Beersheba, but Melanesia and Polynesia—yea, even to their outermost palm-crowned isles—shall ring with his name, some scantily-clad unredeemed aborigine of those fortunate realms will send in to the London publishers his own notions as to Mr. Shaw; and the end will be at hand. For then our genius will sigh for fresh worlds to conquer, and, if Professor Lowell's fascinating theories have come true, "Man and Superman" may be purchasable in a cheap edition at a Martian bookstall, or in exchange for an obolus on the Lethean shore. You never can tell.

* George Bernard Shaw: his Life and Works. By Archibald Henderson, M.A., Ph.D., of the University of North Carolina. (Hurst and Blackett. 21s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

WILFRID L. RANDELL.

AN OXFORD POEM BY HENRY VAUGHAN—III.

BY LOUISE IMOGEN GUINEY

A SECOND and more eligible R. W. is one Richard West, of the Northamptonshire Wests, sprung from the great house of De La Warre. A couple of years older than Henry Vaughan, he matriculated at Christ Church in 1636. He was certainly a "wit," a rattling one, and altogether as active, unquenchable, and conspicuous a collegian as his generation boasted. His name literally strews the pages of Oxford publications, issued without pause or fail upon the many "emergent occasions" of that not lifeless reign: in Latin or in English, in moods grave or gay, Richard West is everywhere, and everywhere gives evidence of a most masculine mind, satiric, observant, fearless, and trenchant. He himself is wholly unknown to our times; his many verses remain uncollected, and are hardly worth collecting, despite their characteristic power. He has at least one "conceit" which makes a grand line, almost Homeric, where he describes a huddled battlefield as a scene where

> The earth lay bury'd in unbury'd men.

In 1640 Richard West was chosen to make what was called the "Musick Speech," delivered in the old Music School. No better proof of his great popularity, the admiration with which the Oxford world of his own day regarded him, could well be afforded than the existence of a half-dozen manuscript copies, in the Bodleian and elsewhere, of this address. It was aimed rather especially at the ladies among the auditory, and gives one an illuminating insight into the state of a society generally considered decent and dignified, for the address is one long cross-fire of graceless and tasteless impudence, where implication and innuendo of the lowest sort serve for humour, and rough-shod didacticism for scholarly point. However, there seems no reason to doubt that this wild young orator was the same Richard West who, according to Foster, afterwards took Orders, and on the recommendation of the virtuous George, Lord Berkeley, was preferred to a living. West was a stout Royalist, and suffered for the cause, a circumstance which is commemorated in the fine Latin epitaph still to be seen near his grave in Shillingford, Dorset. He published one Assize Sermon, a vigorous effort. His youthful signature, 1636, and another of 1640, "Richardus West, Grad.," exist in the Bodleian Admission Books. He died after the Restoration, leaving a family.

Some circumstances go far to show that he may have been the R. W. in Vaughan's mind. One is that during Vaughan's residence at Jesus, Richard West (perhaps on taking a tutorship) transferred himself from "the House" to the Welsh College. A second is that he had his own direct connection with Breconshire. Lastly, the mention of Randolph (obiit 1634) in Vaughan's verses is not at random. "Much doctrine lies under this little stone." West, who adored Randolph's memory, and seems to have tried hard to be like him, calls himself, in a prefatory verse printed in the 1640 edition of Randolph's works, his "brother-in-law." This is an example of the happy looseness of the terms of kinship in that age. His real relationship to that splendid and now unappreciated poet it would be hard to define when stated: West's mother married, as her second husband, Randolph's father. The only other bard whom Vaughan places in his Elysium is Ben Jonson; but Ben with him, as with all his contemporaries, was a convention, a first principle: besides, he was Randolph's own much-venerated poetical "sire." For the rest, the tripping measure, the oddly mingled air of scholarship, revelry, and sincere affection, the rather haughty aloofness and indirection of Vaughan's rueful, idealistic little poem, wonderfully play into our scant but sure knowledge, won from his own pages, of Richard West of Christ Church, forerunner and kinsman of a whole dynasty of minor British poets bearing both his names.

Richard West had indeed "one mind" with Henry Vaughan: doubly so, if all that Vaughan says of his own rebellious youth be true. A bit of University legislation formulated at this very time, and quoted by Wood, reproves particularly the wine-bibbing Masters of Arts, "which should give younger Youths a better example." Such a caution may have gone not far wide of West and his admiring friend, while aimed at many like them. As for "arrests" by the predatory "sergeants," West's name does not appear in those old interesting MS. books, the archives of the Chancellor's Court (1); but we get there, under an acceptable date, a bare entry which looks corroborative:—

10 Maij: 1639.

Acta habita . . . coram venerabili viro Accepto Frewen.
Willelmus Taylor contra Henricum Vaughan. } stet.
Mylles [procurator]. }

Now, besides the young poet, there were two Henry Vaughans in Oxford in 1639. One was a City tradesman, unlikely to be sued in the University Court; the other, a consequential Welsh parson and don of Jesus College, may piously be considered disqualified, on other grounds. No alternative remains but to suspect that the Henry Vaughan best known to posterity is the subject of this suit for debt and consequent "mulct," the details of which go for ever unrecorded. It is a case of aut Siluris aut diabolus.

West and Vaughan, like most men of their generation, which was deeply religious under a foam of worldliness,

> Weary of [their] vain search below, above,
> In the First Fair [did] find the Immortal Love.

The wonderful Augustinian lines are Carew's, himself an example of ultimate conversion, and what Donne calls "a Christianly death." But in the summer months of 1640 there must have been slight promise of the young Welshman's reformation. Nor was R. W. one to egg him on towards the aeterna securitas et secura aeternitas. Mr. Thomas Vaughan, senior, far away at Newton in Llansantffraed, under the Brecon Beacons, may have come sorrowfully to that conclusion. Whether he was in any way spurred on in his action by the difficulties of keeping at College his elder hope, who, by his own confession, was not of an economical turn, we shall never know. Henry Vaughan, as we have observed, has nothing to say of educational, nor even structural, Oxford. If he were being "sent down," with his father's knowledge or connivance (a theory by no means absurd), the fatality would excuse a certain soreness towards the more tangible aspects of University life. Nay, more, it would entirely explain the curious and baffling lack of any mention of his Oxford nurture in "Ad Posteros," that poem professedly autobiographical which appeared in "Olor Iscanus," 1651. In any event, this we know, that at the close of his second year, the future disciple of "holy Mr. Herbert" received marching orders for London town: no doubt, to Richard West's tremendous regret and indignation. Perhaps just before the fatal day of parting the two comrades held their final orgies in the Cornmarket, while their hearts were full of grief, and full of dare-devil courage to bury the grief out of sight. Hence the slapdash valediction in metre to that "ingenuous friend" with whom the writer passionately wishes to share "one grave," with whom he prays thereafter always to "stay," drowning his oppressive "cares and discontent" in the medicinal waters of Lethe (2). And what

(1) In the old MS. Proceedings of the Mayor's Court, kept in the Oxford Town Hall, there are unfortunately no Christian names given. The fact that a West figures twice during October, 1638, in these recorded suits, and that a Vaughan appears rather frequently throughout the years 1638-9, counts for nothing one way or the other where full entries might have established or disproved definitely the point at issue.

(2) In Virgil, however, those who "stay" are in quite a different class from those who "drink." The latter, first washing away all former memories, have to go back into the turmoil of life again.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

more natural than that consciously, deliberately, with extreme wistfulness, the young Vaughan should have mirrored, in every facet of his mock-merry lines, the serene pastoral beauty of the academic scenes he has loved, and may call his no more?

REVIEWS

POETRY AND VERSE—I.

The Collected Poems of Maurice Baring. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

Songs of the Road. By A. Conan Doyle. (Smith, Elder and Co. 5s. net.)

Clyde Songs and Other Verses. By J. J. Bell. (Gowans and Gray, Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.)

Poems and Sonnets. By Percy C. Ainsworth. (C. H. Kelly. 2s. 6d. net.)

Chords of the Zither. By Clinton Scollard. (G. W. Browning. New York.)

The Muse who inspired Mr. Maurice Baring to write these "Poems" must surely be the most graceful and beautiful of the nine sisters. For her no crude, tempestuous emotion, no heat of inharmonious expression, no tinkling spangles and flashing paste; she must be served by careful labour among the mines of language, decorated with the long-sought diamond, the ruby and emerald cunningly arranged with "suns and silver stars." We emphasise the shining, spotless beauty of the poems, and note the calmness of their passion, and are lost in admiration at the delicacy of their workmanship; but the thrill which they bring is not that which comes from some vivid presentation of humanity or human emotions. It is rather the brilliant artistic and intellectual pleasure of a Greek medallion or a carved ivory pagoda. Not a passage in the whole book can move us as do some of the lines in "Love in the Valley," for instance, or a stanza of "Thyrsis," though perhaps these comparisons are a little unfair. But we will quote and discover Mr. Baring's secret:—

Like far-seen palms in the desert air,
  Like phantom isles hung over the seas,
Like glistening haze in the noontide's glare,
  Or webs of silver on twilight trees:
So thou seemest, a film of light,
  A baseless dream which at dawn must die;
Like dew of the morn or the snowflake bright,—
  Child of the moon, descend from the sky.

Come, for the darkness has risen from earth,
  And the moon has breathed o'er the sleeping sea;
We are weary of toil, we are sated with mirth,
  We are fain to dream, and our dream is of thee.
The moon and the stars and the lotus flower,
  The lilies and dusk are of no avail,
For thou art the dream of the twilight hour,
  And lotus and lily, O fair, O frail!

It will be seen that Mr. Baring's art is essentially pictorial. On page after page he delights us by flashing pictures, called up by unerring skill in the magic spell of words. He shows us a round world of beauty:

Lands ever golden with ungarnered corn,
And yellow roses teeming with brown bees. . . .

As when the moon, a luring sorceress,
Casting enchantment on the stealthy tide,
Compels the salt and bitter flood to creep
And nestle in the inlets of the world,
And fringe the darkling beaches with pale surf. . . .

The white sails of unnumbered argosies
Like flakes of snow upon the crimson seas.
  . . . and all the skeins of foam
Unravel softly on the vanquished sea.

A hundred other examples of this fascinating visualisation and command of imagery could easily be given. Naturally, excelling in this method, Mr. Baring does not make such an appeal to us in the longer blank-verse dramas of "Tristram and Iseult" and "Proserpine"; the lyric is his especial métier, and for his sonnets and lyrics we have nothing but praise as works of art—the only technical flaw we have discovered is the rhyming of "argosies" with "seas" in one of the quotations above.

Sir Arthur Conan Doyle wisely warns us, in a rhyming prelude, that his "Songs of the Road" are not to be regarded as making any high bid for poetic laurels. Some of them are suitable for recitation, and they are full of energy, terse, and often epigrammatic; we must, therefore, set these good qualities against what the verses lack in art. The story of the artist who threw his picture out of window in disgust at his ill success, and repenting, replaced it in his studio, to find himself hailed by the critic-visitor as an Impressionist, is exceedingly good. He took the hint, and now—

'Neath his sheltered garden wall,
When the rain begins to fall,
And the stormy winds do blow,
You may see them in a row,
Red effects and lake and yellow
Getting nicely blurred and mellow,
With the subtle gauzy mist
Of the great Impressionist.

With more complex themes the author deals occasionally, and reaches a much higher level than mere rhyming. In "Man's Limitation" the eternal puzzle is touched upon finely, though not solved:—

If you may sing His praises,
  For health He gave to you,
What of this spine-curved cripple—
  Shall he sing praises too?

If you may justly thank Him
  For strength in mind and limb,
Then what of yonder weakling—
  Must he give thanks to Him? . . .

There comes no word to tell us
  Why this and that should be,
Why you should live with sorrow,
  And joy should live with me.

"A Lilt of the Road," acknowledged as "the doggerel Itinerary of a Holiday," is out of place in this book. It is such poor stuff that we are surprised the author thought fit to include it.

Mr. J. J. Bell's "Clyde Songs" appeal to us more strongly than do his "Other Verses," for they are full of that hybrid life, neither wholly sea nor wholly river, which makes our great navigable estuaries so inspiriting to the thoughtful onlooker. Songs of tugs, of dredgers and hoppers and lighters, of tramp-steamers and ghost-ships, of mariners and nor'-westers—all these bring a touch of the salt sea-wind, and have a delightful lilt, which at times carries the very rhythmic beat of the engines. Therefore the songs of birds and flowers, and more gentle things which follow, seem a little tame, though we hasten to say that some of them are true poems.

Sincerity and depth of feeling, and the inclination to treat larger themes than those which form the stock-in-trade of the mere rhymester, characterise the "Poems and Sonnets" of the Rev. Percy C. Ainsworth, whose death has recently saddened many who knew his worth. A quotation will illustrate this; the poem is entitled "The Life Everlasting":—

It is not something yet to be revealed—
  The everlasting life—'tis here and now;
Passing unseen because our eyes are sealed
  With blindness for the pride upon our brow. . . .

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It dwells not in innumerable years;
It is the breath of God in timeless things—
The strong, divine persistence that inheres
In love's red pulses and in faith's white wings.

Many of the lyrics are full of fine, delicate thought poetically expressed; as a rule they are more pleasing than the sonnets, although the latter are technically correct and carefully wrought. A wistful note runs through all the book:—

No man loveth the land possessed
As he loveth the promised land, wrote the author in a tender little poem entitled "Some Better Thing;" and we can only express our heartfelt regret that a man who saw life so sanely and had a true lyrical gift should have passed away at such a promising moment of his career.

There is plenty of graceful rhyming, but not much poetry, in Mr. Clinton Scollard's "Chords of the Zither." He celebrates, as his title suggests, that peculiar atmosphere known to minor novelists as the "glamour of the Orient," and celebrates it very prettily, with the aid of musical words and lilting stanzas. It is our own loss, doubtless, if we have to look up the meaning of "tettix" and "carob," but we appreciate keenly how handy the latter word must be when a rhyme for "Arab" is needed. In the magazines the author's verses are a charming variation from the hackneyed themes usually treated; collected in one volume they sound the one note rather too persistently. The poet, however, sings as he wishes, not as we wish, and if he would always sing as melodiously as Mr. Scollard the critic's mood might be less irritable.

THE AMAZING DUCHESS

The Amazing Duchess. Being the Romantic History of Elizabeth Chudleigh. By CHARLES E. PEARCE. Illustrated. (Stanley Paul and Co. Two Vols. 24s. net.)

MR. CHARLES E. PEARCE has the happy knack of extracting from his subject only the most salient and vital incidents. He has saturated himself in the period of the early Georges, not because he wanted to pick out one of its most extraordinary women and write a book about her, but rather because he has a natural leaning towards eighteenth-century times. We catch his enthusiasm. His gay, almost rollicking, style makes for no dull reading. From the first page to the last we are in for a very good time indeed. A book of this kind is far more entrancing than the average novel. It is charged with a hundred characters, a hundred scenes that stamp themselves clearly upon the mind. Over and above the masques and bons mots and brilliant scenes of revelry rises Elizabeth Chudleigh, amazing from start to finish of her extraordinary career. We may not find it in our hearts to love Elizabeth, or even to agree with all the chivalrous utterances of Mr. Pearce concerning her, but, nevertheless, she interests us profoundly, because she possessed a personality so strong and so original that she succeeded in climbing to the height of her ambition. She had a forceful character, unceasing energy, and a belief in her own powers, all of which were factors in the building up of her many triumphs. Other women of her period were hopelessly neurotic, subject to "vapours," given to intrigue and the spreading of petty slander, their lives spent in a restless search after pleasure. Elizabeth was a supreme opportunist. Present circumstances, however unpleasant, were by no means barriers to future attainment. She forced circumstance into the hot furnace of her desire, and by her very strength of purpose compelled it to serve her own ends. The pity of it all is that a woman with so much capacity, so strenuous, so alive to everything about her, should have been simply content to win social position, to amass wealth, to laugh at the Church, law, and convention generally merely to satisfy a vanity that was almost a disease. And yet we must take Elizabeth for what she was, and not for what we think she might have been. When we sum up the events of her life, and the comments of others concerning her, we are forced to admit, in agreement with Mr. Pearce, that the real Elizabeth is, and perhaps ever will be, a profound and fascinating mystery. Her maxim was to be "short, clear, and surprising." She was certainly surprising!

Elizabeth's first lover was the Duke of Hamilton. Quoting Miss Chudleigh's own remarks on the subject: "She returned his love with true affection, as deep as her nature would allow her to feel for any one." This was pretty candidly expressed. We are inclined to think that all Elizabeth's love affairs, from the Duke of Hamilton to her infatuation for the rogue Worta, were subordinate to her love of ambition, to her love of self. The little affair with the Duke of Hamilton came to nothing, in spite of the fact that "the young couple plighted their troth, at the same time swearing each other to secrecy." There was not much secrecy at a time when calumny was rife, when Walpole and others cultivated the pernicious habit of writing with zest about the latest scandal of the hour. Mrs. Hanmer intercepted the Duke of Hamilton's letters, with the disloyal intention of making arrangements for her niece to marry him instead. Elizabeth, no doubt, keenly felt the apparent neglect of her lover, and in consequence began to encourage a young naval officer, the Hon. Augustus Hervey. There was considerable passion on Hervey's side, nothing of the kind on Elizabeth's. This being so, it is difficult to understand why so shrewd a woman, with a keen eye to money, should have married an almost penniless naval officer, unless she did so as a stopgap or simply out of pique. The midnight wedding took place at Lainston, and everything was done to keep the whole affair a secret. Elizabeth was a Maid of Honour, a privileged position she had not the slightest intention of losing.

Two days after the marriage Lieutenant Hervey was ordered to the West Indies, and Elizabeth returned to her duties at Court, heartily glad to be rid of a man she so heartily disliked. Upon Hervey's return he persistently attempted to see his wife; but to no purpose. Elizabeth refused to meet him. This very strained relationship was suddenly relieved by Hervey being ordered to the Mediterranean. However, the relief was only of short duration. Hervey again returned to England, and all Elizabeth's tactics this time could not prevail upon her husband to desist from troubling her. He met her in her rooms in Conduit-street, and the scene that followed is best described in Mr. Pearce's own words: "Hervey's face flushed, a fierce light leaped to his eyes when he saw the woman, then at the zenith of her charms, and who was his wife by right and by law. That she did not love him was nothing at such a moment. He strode towards her. Alarmed at his appearance, and fearing bodily harm, Elizabeth turned towards the door. In an instant Hervey had bounded across the room, and she was locked in!" The sequel to this thrilling event was that some months after Elizabeth became a mother. The Hon. Mrs. Hervey was still known at Court as "Miss Chudleigh," and in consequence still maintained her position of Maid of Honour. Her temporary retirement to Chelsea was covered by the excuse that she needed a change "for the benefit of her health."

In these days of nude and semi-nude dances upon the music-hall stage we cannot, perhaps, appreciate fully the sensation Elizabeth caused at the famous Somerset House masquerade in the rôle of Iphigenia. Her lack of raiment awakened considerable comment, even at a time when modesty was certainly not in the ascendant. The King, however, was delighted, and, according to Walpole, often more piquant than truthful in his remarks, his Majesty was very much in love with the lively Elizabeth, to whom he gave a valuable watch, "discharged out of his private purse," and also made Mrs. Chudleigh housekeeper at Windsor Castle.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We need not go into detail as to Elizabeth's marriage with the Duke of Kingston, and all the scandals that preceded it at Tunbridge Wells and Knightsbridge, to say nothing of the storm of comment that followed later. From Thomas Whitehead, the Duke's valet, we get some curious and interesting sidelights on Elizabeth's character at this time. The picture drawn by Whitehead does not reveal a happy state of affairs, although we must remember that this man's letters on the subject were considerably biassed. The Duke of Kingston was apparently entirely under the control of his wife, and on two occasions she caused his belongings to be unceremoniously flung out of the carriage into the road. Whitehead remarks: "It was her usual custom in hot weather, while at table, to rise from her chair and fan herself by taking hold of her petticoats and well shaking them." The valet has something to say in regard to Elizabeth's abnormal appetite. He writes: "At dinner-time, and in company of a dozen or more, I have often known the Duchess rise from the table, having stuffed most immoderately, go into the adjoining room, leaving the door open, . . . presently returning to her company smiling and say: 'I beg your pardon, a fit of the gout took me in the stomach, but I am now much better.'" Further details follow, and we are not surprised to learn that "Her Grace was ever complaining of a pain in her stomach and head, ... for she never allowed nature sufficient time to digest her victuals. Between breakfast and dinner-time, while airing in the park, I have known her order the carriage five or six times, and take tea, chocolate, sweet cakes, and Madeira, or some other damper, every time she returned." Thus does the possible prototype of our modern Harriet expose the little weaknesses of Elizabeth.

After the death of the Duke of Kingston the will was disputed, old stories were revived concerning Hervey, now Earl of Bristol, and the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Court was brushed aside. Elizabeth was informed that she must return immediately from Rome to answer a charge of bigamy brought against her. She was tried in Westminster Hall, and Mr. Pearce gives a vivid description of the famous trial. Its result and the years spent at the Russian Court and elsewhere we have not space to discuss. In conclusion, we may add that Mr. Pearce has achieved a striking literary triumph. He has rolled up the curtain of the eighteenth century, and upon the stage of the past we see vividly before us the amazing Elizabeth Chudleigh.

PRESENT-DAY RUSSIA

Russian Flashlights. By JAAKOFF PRELOOKER. (Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d.)

THOUGH this most interesting and thrilling work is mainly based on facts and terrible incidents that have unfortunately been only too common during the last ten years, it reads in many parts more like a sensational novel than sober truth. But those who are as well acquainted with the real life of Russia as the author of this work undoubtedly is need not have recourse to fiction to startle or rivet the attention of their readers; for the actual truth about the events that are continually occurring in the great Empire of the Tsar is more startling and more full of dramatic incident than any novel or play ever conceived by the ingenuity or imagination of man. When the long-drawn-out drama of the Russian revolution comes to be written, when all the details of that awful struggle between the ideas and ideals of the West and the East are made known to the English people, it will be seen that the short, sanguinary, fitful, and turbulent French Revolution was but child's play compared to this silent, grim, and protracted death-struggle that has convulsed the Russian Empire ever since the days of Nicholas I., when the ideas sown throughout Europe by the soldiers of the French Revolution and of Napoleon commenced to permeate the Russian people. On whatever side our sympathies may be, we must confess that the revolutionists described in these pages were men indeed.

The thousands who have cheerfully marched to the scaffold, to the dark, cold cells of the fortresses, there to find an early grave or a fate more horrible—the dark mines and frozen tundras of Siberia—are heroes without question. When the complete story of this terrible drama is known in free England, of the numbers who have been shot, sent to prison, or exiled for claiming those rights and principles which every Englishman regards as his sacred birthright, most of us will sympathise with the revolutionists in their great struggle, although we cannot always condone or admire their violent methods. The hairbreadth adventures of which this book is full read like sensational fiction, and had we not men living amongst us like Prince Krapotkine, Volkonsky, and others who have avoided these perils, we should say such things were utterly impossible. The account of the remarkable life and escape of Gregory Gershuni from the Akatui Prison in Eastern Siberia is the most thrilling of all. To escape from such a place, under the very eyes of the prison authorities, required not only marvellous skill and ingenuity, but nerves of iron and a contempt of death which is only equalled by the Japanese and the Mongolian races of Asia. But Gershuni was neither a Japanese nor a Russian, but a simple little Israelite, one of that despised race which has played such a foremost rôle in the struggle against the autocratic and bureaucratic rule of the Tsars. Even at his trial Gershuni's dignified conduct and powerful, statesman-like speech produced an extraordinary impression on all present. In fact, after signing the death-warrant, one of the Judges, pointing to the prisoner, said quite loudly, "Yes, this one is indeed a man!"

It is a grave indictment that such gifted men should be driven by the present state of affairs obtaining in Russia into capital crime, which, of course, must be punished by death or exile to Siberia. It is still a greater pity that the Russian Government cannot find some better use for many of the bravest of its sons and daughters than placing a halter round their necks. Russia has none too many men of intellect that she can afford to see the élite of her manhood and womanhood hanged, shot, or sent to eat out their hearts in the barren wastes among criminals and felons of the lowest type. Let us hope that these barbarous methods of combating modern thought, which have long since been abandoned in Western Europe, will soon be a thing of the past in Russia also. The mystery of Father Gapon, "Traitor or Martyr," is one of the most thrilling chapters of the book. Gapon appears to have been done away with by the revolutionists because he would not sanction their terroristic and bomb-throwing methods. He would not go far enough for the extremists, who therefore regarded him as a traitor, and he was cruelly put to death, notwithstanding his many services to the people. It was a case of "the revolution devouring its own children," as in France during the Terror. Rutenburg's cruel act cannot be justified, even if the plea be true "that he undertook the assassination of Gapon in order to establish the confidence of the revolutionists in himself."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The excesses and mistakes of such extremists as Rutenburg have done more to discredit and overthrow the Russian revolution than all the agents of the Government combined. The fact that a man like Mr. Prelooker, with his humane—one might almost say Christlike—ideals, should be a revolutionist, or entertain profound sympathy for the revolutionary cause, speaks volumes for the terrible state of the Russian Empire, since peaceful, Godfearing, cultured, and refined men of the type of the author do not become revolutionists without good cause. The life of the author of this work and his attempts not only to broaden out and reform the religious beliefs of his own Jewish brethren but to bring about a reconciliation between Jew and Christian, are almost as interesting as his account of the marvellous escapes of Russian revolutionists from Siberia. His painful attempts to acquire a University education, the struggles of this youth, full of energy, enterprise, and enthusiasm, his desire to do something great, something that would benefit the whole of humanity, are the key of this much misunderstood man's character. From such men as Prelooker the Russian has little to fear, if treated with consideration, tact, and courtesy, for their weapons are not the bomb and the knife of the assassin, which merely destroy the body but do not change the mind of those who are attacked.

Not the least interesting portion of "Russian Flashlights" is the light it throws on the author's own character and the difficulties he has experienced in maintaining his own independence. From its pages we see that he has many enemies, and it is a mistake to think that his path, even in England, is strewn with roses. He has met, and is still meeting, with plenty of attacks and bitter opposition. As the irony of fate would have it, the campaign against this reformer has been carried out not so much by outsiders as by the very people whose cause he is defending with devotion and ability, and whom he is helping not only with his pen, but with his purse as well. "Like Gapon, he does not go far enough;" did he live in Russia, with all its violence and acts of terrorism on both sides, he would probably meet Gapon's fate, notwithstanding all he has done and suffered for the cause of freedom, progress, and religious liberty.

It is evident that until the Russian revolutionists become more humane in their methods and less extreme in their views, they will never command sufficient sympathy in Russia or abroad to overthrow the present existing Government itself, for violence begets violence, and whether this infraction of the Divine law proceeds from above or below, the effects are equally disastrous on the State and the people belonging to it. It is high time that the extremists on both sides came to their senses. This will only be possible when men such as Mr. Prelooker are allowed to live in their own country and work for the regeneration of the ignorant masses and the amelioration of their hard lot. When we remember that fifty years ago the Russian people were mainly serfs, bought and sold like cattle, together with the land they tilled, we cannot expect them to be fit for those political rights which we have only obtained after hundreds of years of struggle and the slow methods of evolution. But that very much more could be done for the suffering [redacted]down-trodden millions in Russia than is at present the case is evident from a perusal of this enlightening work.

On reading it we come to the conclusion that the Revolution in Russia which is paralysing the energies of that great Empire will continue until the reins of power are taken from the hands of the police, the priests, the bureaucracy, and placed more in the hands of the upper and middle classes, or such representatives of the people who may be classed among the "intellectuals." It is no secret to those who are conversant with Russian affairs that the revolutionist agitators are still in full activity, and that all the hanging, shooting, transporting, flogging that has been tried by the reactionaries against the revolutionaries is useless. The latter are only awaiting an opportunity to spring into being, active and potent as of old, but far more cautious and experienced, for their follies and mistakes have taught them some bitter lessons. The gallows, the knout, imprisonment, exile, and physical torture cannot kill the movement or rob it of the enthusiasm of its adherents, as the pages in this volume only too clearly prove.

Want of space does not permit us to dwell more on this illuminating work. It should be subsequently published in two parts, and in a cheaper form, for, strictly speaking, the Life of Joseph Prelooker and "Russian Flashlights" are two separate subjects. Whether we agree or disagree with the aims of the author, we cannot fail to be enlightened and entertained by his notable and worthy book.

J. W. B. S.

THE CHURCH DURING THE LAST CENTURY

The English Church in the Nineteenth Century. By FRANCIS WARRE CORNISH, M.A. (Macmillan and Co. Two Parts, 7s. 6d. each.)

WE have in this book the conclusion of the series forming a complete History of the English Church, edited by the late Dean Stevens, of Winchester, and Dr. W. Hunt. There have been seven previous volumes. These last are a monument of patient industry, and represent an enormous amount of real hard work. No one who desires to possess a valuable book of reference to the questions which agitated the Church during the last century can dispense with the records in these volumes. The mass of materials at hand for so recent a period probably constitutes the historian's chief difficulty, and one which we are not quite sure has been satisfactorily overcome by this writer. So we have two volumes instead of one, as in the rest of the series. And for the ordinary reader we think one would have sufficed.

To begin with, the book is altogether over-weighted with long and elaborate accounts of ecclesiastical law-suits. For example, no less than eighty pages are occupied with the obsolete controversies raised by "Essays and Reviews" and the Hampden, Gorham, and Colenso cases. For present-day interest one-tenth of this space might well have sufficed. There are many other instances of disproportionate expansion. Mr. Cornish's work merits the highest praise from the point of view of remarkably painstaking research and most careful accuracy, but he is too minute in his record of unimportant details. Who now desires to know that "Dr. Christopher Wordsworth (1774-1846), Dean of Bocking, and afterwards Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, published a pamphlet in 1810 expressing objections to the intrusion of an undenominational society on the province of the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge"? Or that an obscure Archdeacon had a quarrel with one Josiah Pratt over the rival claims of S.P.G. and C.M.S. at a meeting held in 1817 at the Octagon Chapel, Bath? Such trifles are unworthy of a great subject: they make the student impotent, and, further, they tend to withdraw attention from the development of aims and ideals, the historic sequences of causes and effects, the main principles and ethics of history. It is true that a good historian must apply a relentless scrutiny to every available historical document, paper, letter, or pamphet; and this we admit Mr. Cornish has well done. But it is equally true that the historian needs a very sound judgment as to the importance of the facts necessary to include or exclude in their relation to the general course of events. It is here, we think, that the author is somewhat deficient in a sense of proportion. Nor does he attempt to follow the methods of the scientific historian, "whose ideal is to state facts and causes, but never to pronounce sentence." Such a detached attitude is, however, hardly to be expected, seeing that the air is still full of the religious controversies of the nineteenth century. But Mr. Cornish's comments are rather extensive. Yet they are generally free, as he claims, from "the spirit of a partisan," with one notable exception. We cannot avoid the conclusion that he is, to some extent, biassed against the Tractarian Movement, of which he rightly gives a very full account. It is curious that so penetrating a writer should seem unable to distinguish with logical clearness between Catholic and Roman Catholic. There is no excuse for saying that "Tract 90 was meant to reconcile with subtle reasoning two irreconcilable positions—the Anglican and the Roman," however this statement may be modified by other assertions. For it was nothing of the kind.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In Tract 90 the writer says that—

> It is often urged . . . that there are in the Articles propositions or terms inconsistent with the Catholic Faith. . . . The following Tract is drawn up with the view of showing how groundless the objection is. . . .

Here it is obvious "Catholic" does not mean "Roman Catholic." Nor can we agree that Tract 90 "has in the event proved a breaking down of the hedge between England and Rome." Mr. Cornish falls into a not uncommon error when he speaks of the Thirty-nine Articles as Articles of Faith. In the Prayer-book their designation is Articles of Religion, which is a very different thing. Again, Mr. Cornish seems to regard the Articles solely as a barrier set up between the Anglican and Roman branches of the Church, apparently overlooking the fact that several are directed against certain Lutheran and Calvinistic doctrines. Newman, it is said, in Tract 91, "looks at the whole question in an unhistorical perspective," and makes "unhistorical distinctions."

This last assertion is provoked by the passage—

> The Articles are not written against the Creed of the Roman Church, but against actual existing errors in it, whether taken into its system or not.

Mr. Cornish's objection to this simple fact arises from that strange confusion of mind which places the Articles—a result of local struggle—on a par with the Catholic Creeds of Christendom.

We have written at some length on this point as illustrating the author's attitude towards a movement with which he is not in sympathy, and of which he evidently finds it difficult to form a broad and judicial estimate. The same spirit is shown in Mr. Cornish's comments on the struggles of the clergy for toleration and liberty of action and practice in matters now unquestioned or even admitted to be legal. He begs the whole question by calling these clergy "law-breakers." He does not understand the opposition of the clergy to Bishops. Nor does it occur to him to estimate the potential force of principle underlying a movement which has overcome the opposition, power, and influence of several generations of Bishops, and successfully defied the coercive legislation of the State. But such things an impartial historian is bound to observe in weighing the balance of cause and effect in the making of history.

There are a few omissions. Nothing of interest is said of the development of religious life and work of the Church in Wales, which, in view of attempts at disendowment, is surely of importance. There is scarcely any account beyond a passing reference of the relation of the Church to literature and art—a great subject worthy of careful treatment, considering the far-reaching influence of religion upon English literature and art during the nineteenth century. This is an oversight difficult to understand. Nor is there apparently even an allusion to the modern growth of what is called "Christian Socialism."

But, although we have offered these criticisms on Mr. Cornish's work, we are, at the same time, constrained to repeat that he has produced a standard book of reference to the events (important and unimportant) of Church life in the last century. And after all the scholarly student of history cannot but value deep research nor that minute grasp of detail which enables him to form his own independent judgment.

A HOME UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

The French Revolution. By HILAIRE BELLOC, M.A. With Maps.

Polar Exploration. By DR. W. S. BRUCE, F.R.S.E., Leader of the "Scotia" Expedition. With Maps.

Short History of War and Peace. By G. H. PERRIS.

Irish Nationality. By MRS. J. R. GREEN.

The Socialist Movement. By RAMSAY MACDONALD, M.P. Illustrated.

The Stock Exchange. By F. W. HIRST, Editor of The Economist.

Parliament. By SIR C. P. ILBERT, Clerk of the House of Commons.

Evolution of Plants. By DR. D. H. SCOTT, M.A., F.R.S. Illustrated.

Modern Geography. By DR. MARION NEWBIGIN. Illustrated.

Shakespeare. By JOHN MASEFIELD. (Williams and Norgate. 1s. net each.)

IT is, in some senses, not the most fortunate of titles to have chosen. It suggests pedagogy and text-books. It upcalls visions of cramming and mental strenuousness. Yet it was obviously not these things that Messrs. Williams and Norgate had in mind when they schemed their Home University Library. The names of its editors suggest confidence, for it would be difficult to select three men better fitted, taking temperament together with academic qualification, for the purpose of guiding the high ship of knowledge into the confined spaces of busy lives than Herbert A. L. Fisher, Gilbert Murray, and J. Arthur Thomson. This might have been postulated before a list of the books they proposed to introduce into their scheme had been decided on; but the list that is now before us assuredly makes their claim good.

Mr. Hilaire Belloc handles the "French Revolution" in characteristic and vigorous style. His familiarity with his subject is a pledge and earnest of his matter. But he has not sought to make his book a mere compendium of accepted opinion; he has couched his lance to warfare. In his interpretation of the eager beliefs that interpenetrated the philosophic wave which preceded and largely helped to evoke the Revolution it is impossible always to concur. Similarly in his estimate of the "Characters of the Revolution" it is difficult always to see eye to eye with him. And the whole chapter "The Catholic Church" awakes the critical mind. Nevertheless, all this goes to quicken the indubitable fire there is in the book; and it would be difficult to discover in any other short compass so complete a statement of "The Military Aspect" of the Revolution—a not inconsiderable portion of that momentous awakening. If

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Belloc was fitted to undertake the French Revolution, there are few men better able to undertake "Polar Exploration" than Dr. William Bruce. Knowing both Polar Regions, he writes not only with considerable learning, but with personal knowledge and experience. It is no small tribute to such a book as this to say that the historical portion is its least interesting phase. Yet it is well deserved, for he treats with extraordinary charm on questions of Arctic Flora, Animals, Meteorology, not to say the Coloration and Formation of Ice, and Magnetism. Mr. Perris has a somewhat more recondite subject in his "History of War and Peace." Seeing that he traces his history from the Euphrates valley to The Hague Conference, it will easily be gathered that he studies brevity with good effect, but it is not at the expense of his subject. Moreover, his book is a substantial addition to the cause of Peace.

The issues already mentioned are bound in red cloth; the next four volumes are bound in brown, to signify, doubtless, their homelier interest. Yet surely Mrs. J. R. Green was worthy of a more vivid hue; or, if not Mrs. Green, at least the "Irish Nationality." This is perhaps the most valuable of the whole series, and the most needed. It is a right understanding of a much misunderstood subject, and as such should be placed in all hands far and wide. Mr. Ramsay Macdonald, in handling "The Socialist Movement," deals with a somewhat better-known subject, and his treatment is complete and exceedingly able; but he fails, rather, to distinguish between the Socialism of enthusiasm and the very much more crabbed affair of the Parliamentary tactician. The Editor of the Economist on "The Stock Exchange" makes somewhat drier reading than does Sir Courtenay Ilbert on "Parliament." But they both deal with organisations that were once agents, but which have now, by the increasing subtlety of their professional participants, become masters. It is interesting to hear Sir Courtenay Ilbert speak of the member who wishes to "declare his independence of party by declining to receive any party whip." "By so doing," he says, "he sometimes increases his chance of a hearing in the House, but usually endangers his seat."

In most such series as these Science predominates. It is a worthy sign of the times that in this series Science is relegated to secondary importance. Dr. Scott covers somewhat familiar ground in his "Evolution of Plants;" and if he does not succeed in saying much that is different to his predecessors in the popular botanical field, he gains in force by laying emphasis on the palæontological side of his subject. To those who recall dry-as-dust schoolbooks on Geography Dr. Newbigin's book will come as a revelation of interest and charm.

There is only one literary book in the whole series; and its subject is, very fitly, Shakespeare, which honour is consigned to the care of Mr. Masefield. His was undoubtedly a difficult task, considering the scope of the series; but he has not treated it with the success we should have expected from him. What he says he says well: the difficulty is rather in what he has elected to say. After giving some seven pages to Shakespeare's "Life," and another five to "The Elizabethan Theatre," the remainder of the book is occupied with a detailed analysis of each play, taken in conjectured order of writing. The result is not so much a book on Shakespeare dealt with as a whole as a pocket running commentary on his plays, in which he shows an over-disparagement of the read play as against the acted version. We have not seen any of the better plays that has not lost infinitely in acting.

Messrs. Williams and Norgate have rendered a considerable service in this series; and it is to be hoped that the public demand will compensate them. Newly-written books, well printed, neatly bound and daintily got up, at a shilling each, is a revelation indeed even in this day of cheap books. In point of fact, some of these books, as, for instance, that by Mrs. J. R. Green, deal with subjects that are not covered by books at five and six times their price. Commercial success should follow the venture, if only because it has already achieved the far higher success of supplying a genuine need.

FOR THE KING!

The Champions of the Crown. By Lucy Sealy. With Twelve Portraits. (Methuen and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Miss Sealy has chosen a capital subject, for there is plenty of interest in the careers of the men who were Charles I.'s chief supporters in the field against either the English Parliamentarians or the Scottish Covenanters. In these pages we have a series of biographical sketches of ten gallant and several of them very dashing nobles or gentlemen who figured conspicuously on the Royalist side during the great Civil War. Miss Sealy thinks that some odium attaches to the name of "Cavalier," and that many people on hearing it call up a vision of "roystering, godless soldiers, fighting solely for power, wealth or license." There may still be, perhaps, some benighted or prejudiced folk who hold that view. If so they will do well to peruse Miss Sealy's volume. She first introduces to us two "Champions of the North"—the well-known Marquess of Newcastle (on whom the author of the "Life of Sir Kenelm Digby" recently wrote an important book) and Sir Marmaduke Langdale, a "very lean and much mortified," but none the less extremely energetic, man, whom the Roundheads detested the more bitterly as he was a Roman Catholic. We are next presented with accounts of two "Champions of the West"—first, William Seymour, Marquess of Hertford, who in his romantic youth married the fair and unfortunate Arabella Stuart, and afterwards proved to be a very inefficient commander; and, secondly, doughty Sir Ralph Hopton, who was a far better soldier, one, indeed, who had carefully studied the methods of Gustavus Adolphus. Next a "Champion from the Fens" comes forward in the person of the right gallant Robert Bertie, Earl of Lindsey, an able general, whom Charles at first appointed to be his Commander-in-chief, and who, had he not been overruled in favour of the headstrong Prince Rupert, might perhaps have won that battle of Edgehill at which he received the wounds from which he afterwards bled to death in Essex's camp from lack of medical attention. Following Lindsey comes another good soldier, Sir Jacob, afterwards Lord, Astley, the very type of an English Royalist, and here described as a "Champion from the Midlands."

At last there stands before us the "Champion of the Blood Royal," Prince Rupert, he who, in spite of all his bravura and a certain amount of military talent, was responsible, in our opinion, for more Royalist defeats than any other general of the period. Disastrous for the King's cause at many a time was that privilege which Rupert, in his overweening vanity, exacted that nobody, excepting Charles in person, should ever give him orders. Imagine Napoleon giving carte blanche to those great cavalry leaders of his day, Murat and Lasalle. In pleasant contrast to the impulsive and passionate Rupert appears the serene, high-minded and accomplished "Champion of the Constitution," Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, who was unhappily struck down at the first battle of Newbury. England could ill afford to lose such a "promoter of all endeavours of peace betwixt the King and the Parliament." In that connection, had Falkland lived longer, much might have been accomplished, perhaps, by his wisdom and his influence.

"A Champion of Adventure" is the name which Miss

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Sealy bestows on George, Lord Digby, a singular and contradictory nobleman of whom in a later century Horace Walpole wrote that, with great parts, he had always hurt himself and his friends; and that, with romantic bravery, he had always been an unsuccessful general. Very different was James Graham, the ever-famous Marquess of Montrose, who became the Royalist "Champion of Scotland." He was, we think, the very best leader of men serving on the side of the Crown throughout the whole Civil War. And he was also a strategist. On reading of some of the episodes in his long contest with Argyle one is reminded of the bold and skilful movements executed by Napoleon during the memorable Campagne de France of 1814. Montrose figures last, but certainly not least, in Miss Sealy's pages, and of all the biographical sketches which are there assembled that of him has seemed to us the most attractive.

The author's industry in gathering together a variety of interesting information respecting the personages who figure in her gallery is to be commended, but her book is not impeccable. This being the first time we have met her name we think that "The Champions of the Crown" may be, perhaps, her first serious literary effort. We would point out to her, then, that her style is susceptible of improvement. We could wish here and there for a somewhat lighter touch, and, in connection with such a theme as she has chosen, an occasional dash of vivacity. Further, there are times when she uses slipshod English. This may be due to excessive haste in composition, a besetting fault among many writers of the present time. But we must add that the construction of Miss Sealy's book is also somewhat unfortunate, as it entails no little repetition. For instance, after describing the conduct of one character at Edgehill, she subsequently has to describe that of another at the same engagement; then, farther on, that of a third, and ultimately that of a fourth also. Again, Marston Moor crops up repeatedly. Thus, while each individual sketch is satisfactory in itself, the ensemble of the book suffers. When Miss Sealy comes to Montrose she strikes fresh ground, and it is, perhaps, for this reason that we have found her account of him more to our liking than others. Still her book has its merits and its utility, for all the men in her gallery are interesting and some of them important personages. A portrait is given of each of them, as well as one of Elizabeth of Bohemia, whilst the frontispiece reproduces the well-known painting by Vandyke, showing Charles I. in three positions.

INFANTRY TACTICS

A Study of the Development of Infantry Tactics. By Colonel Beca. Translated by Captain A. F. Custance. With a Preface by Colonel Hacket Pain, C.B. With Plans. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d.)

Captain Custance has rendered a great service to students of military problems in this country by placing within the reach of all the views contained in this small book. Without necessarily agreeing with Colonel Beca (indeed, we disagree strongly with some of his conclusions), we must confess to having read with great interest this terse and clearly expressed study of infantry tactics.

With the present grouping of the great Powers of Europe, it seems likely that our next great war will find us fighting with the French as allies and the Germans as antagonists. Any officer who has read this book cannot fail to have learned much of the tactics of the French and German armies respectively, and for that reason, if for that only, it should well repay perusal. The Preface and Introduction to the book are necessary helps to the British reader, Colonel Hacket Pain explaining clearly the tactical tendencies of the French and Germans, while Captain Custance's diagrams show clearly the various formations which Colonel Beca alludes to in the course of the work.

The views of the author appear to be the very opposite of those held by most British officers after the late Boer war. He voices the opinion widely held abroad that only by sheer weight of men thrown into the fight opposite the point to be assaulted can an attack succeed, and that the preliminary disposition of troops for battle should therefore be of relatively great depth. In short, his tactics are those of penetration, not those of envelopment. The following quotation from one of the last paragraphs of the work well sums up his views:—

> It is therefore a formation of columns in depth which we find favoured nowadays in the decisive attack, and which in reality constitutes a reversion to Napoleonic methods; and in spite of the adverse criticisms of the advocates of the new tactics (chiefly British), who still maintain that they see in these methods only a sacrifice of human lives, but which were crowned with complete success at Plevna, and also in the late Titanic struggle in the Far East when the Japanese did not hesitate to push forward in masses upon masses.

The book abounds in information as to past military history, some of it of very great interest. Speaking of the causes of Prussia's success in 1866, he says: "One man, Moltke; one idea, decentralisation; one force, multiplicity of tactical units." He quotes the opinion of General Langlois as to the causes for our non-success at the beginning of the South African War. He says that the tactics adopted by the British Generals were characterised by:

A.—The absence of properly-organised protection.
B.—The want of knowledge of the duties of advanced guards.
C.—The total absence of the knowledge of the principles of manœuvring.
D.—The neglect of preparatory action.
E.—At once passing to the decisive stage along the whole front.

The author adds that our disasters must be attributed to our own shortcomings. We may perhaps take heart of grace from remembering the somewhat indifferent success of picked German troops in that same country against an enemy very inferior to the Boers.

As previously mentioned, the writer relates that the Japanese in their late war in Manchuria did not hesitate to push forward in masses upon masses to hard-earned but complete victory. Without taking the word masses too literally, this is true, but it is also true that the Russians at decisive ranges used volleys, were bad shots, and were armed with a rifle which, at short ranges, was not correctly sighted. On the whole, this is a most interesting book, and one to be read.

VISIONS

The Giants of the Earth. By C. M. Salwey. (Taylor. 1s. net.)

We have hitherto associated Mrs. C. M. Salwey with very excellent Japanese work. In the present book, however, she has given us a few prose studies purporting to be the visions she has received in regard to things spiritual. We have had many visionary books abounding in mystical references to Daniel, Ezekiel, and the Book of Revelation. The majority of these volumes have had the depressing effect of not enlightening the reader, but leaving him dazed and bewildered. Mrs. Salwey, however, is a true mystic, whose aim is not to mystify, but to set down in simple, forceful, and poetical language the knowledge that has been vouchsafed to her. Her message rings true because it is so eminently sincere. She approaches the Kingdom of God in the spirit of a little child, and not as Omar did, in the spirit of a blustering and wine-tossed man. This is not a sealed book hedged about with adepts, astral bodies, and Theosophical phraseology, to be comprehended only by the initiate. It is the message of a mother treading softly down the ways of the world, communing with the big, strong creatures of wealth and storm and warfare, and finding at the end of her spiritual adventures that Love is the key to all mystery and the one true form of eternal happiness.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Giants are the Gods of Gold, Iron, Nature, and Fire. In addition there is the Goddess of the Sea, or the Angel of the Waters. Of the God of Gold Mrs. Salwey writes:—"His throne was of gold, the kopje in which he rested on the mountain-side was refulgent with the same precious metal." Kopje was certainly the wrong word to use. It suggests the Boer war, and even a god cannot rest in but on a kopje. From Giant to Giant the inquiring woman passes. Mrs. Salwey is most successful in "Monarchs of the Forest." Here her prose is touched with poetry, and suggests the Buddhist conception of the oneness of all life. The trees seem to be mingled with the presence of spirits, and the soft murmur of the branches is the sound of their voices. Thus speaks the Monarch of the Forest:—

> As a child you held in your hand a plaything dear to you, made of our substance. We formed the comforts and luxuries of your home as well as its necessities. Your hands have often touched us. Your arms often encircled those of our community who flourished near your birthplace. You rested your tired limbs in the shade we flung. You culled the flowerets we had assisted to rise and live; and when life had run its course of those dear to you, we preserved their frail bodies from sudden decay. Yet from that moment we were dearer to each other than by any previous alliance, for we became part of each other. We claimed them as our ally, to work out the mysterious will of Nature indorsed by the Will of God.

When the woman has desired above everything a love that shall extend to all parts of the world, to all races, she comes in contact with the God of Fire. Then it is that she receives a quickening influence that banishes all dross and leaves the soul shining and pure, filled with the joy of giving a love that has its fountain-head in the Divine Himself.

This little book, so full of spiritual charm, so touched with poetry, concludes with the waking of the wandering woman. She sits at an open window looking out into the garden. Her little son stands by her side. Thus he speaks:—"'Mother . . . there has been a storm, but it is over now. I am quite safe—don't be afraid: we are together. I am sure God has taken care of all my sparrows—and, see here, in the storm God came down into my little garden and in a great hurry He picked for you my tallest lily!'"

SHORTER REVIEWS

Latin-English and English-Latin Dictionary. (T. Fisher Unwin. 2s. net.)

This small dictionary will be appreciated when travelling. It appears to be accurate and to compress into a small space a very large number of words with their shades of meaning lucidly explained. The little work of some four hundred pages cannot fail to be extremely useful. If dictionaries of modern languages are to follow, compiled on the same lines, we think that they will be of even greater value and convenience, because a dead language is more often studied in the library, where complete dictionaries are to be found on the shelves, while a vade-mecum of modern languages is convenient to every one on his travels.

"The Queen" Newspaper Book of Travel. A Guide to Home and Foreign Resorts, 1911. (Horace Cox. 2s. 6d.)

"'The Queen' Newspaper Book of Travel" is a very thorough guide-book, which all people suffering from the modern mania for change should have on their bookshelves for reference. We specially appreciate the fact that the places dealt with are mentioned in alphabetical order, as no time is lost hunting up counties, districts, &c. The several chapters entitled "Practical Hints" should prove useful; as also the common-sense advice given about the clothing needed for different tours. The work appears to us, after a cursory examination, to be very complete in all respects, and—a fact which is not to be disregarded—it is written both simply and comprehensively.

FICTION

A Fair House. By Hugh de Sélincourt. (John Lane. 6s.) If this is not a great book, it is an excellent book, and, what is more, it is a book penned in a pure and lovely spirit. Mr. De Sélincourt is not a writer of great books, but he is a very individualistic writer. There are perhaps not many whose work can readily be detected; but he is certainly one of them. It is not a question of style, for he cannot boast a style in the high sense of the word: it is rather a question of manner, a certain way of looking at life. To call that a philosophy would be to err, at least in the general acceptance of that word. For example, he is in war against morbidity of any kind, and in morbidity should be included the affectation after mere cleverness that is so prevalent in some quarters. In this very book the only disturbing element is caused by a writer, one Selby Parramore, who is the author of books that are bitter and clever and brilliant. Even at his expense Mr. De Sélincourt does not indulge in diatribe or harshness, regarding him as more a loser in his own soul than a creator of trouble in the souls of others. This is the conception of the book. Of plot it has little or none. Its very characterisation is slight and sketchy. Not that the chronology is a matter of a week or so, a short space of time that does not enable him to give sufficient attention to his characters: in point of fact, it covers no less than twenty substantial years. The opening chapter discovers John Camden in gloomy and passionate rebellion over the death of his wife at the premature birth of her first child. His friend Toby Warren discovers him so, and seeks to rouse him from his gloom and deadness of emotion, taking him finally off for a week's walking tour. Mr. De Sélincourt depicts his spiritual recovery of himself, and his absorption of interest in his child—the child that he had seemed to be so listless about in his grief—very finely. After that the story is concerned with their mutual lives—her education, her development, and his development with her and through her, and the nature of their affection the one for the other. It is not much to make a story about, but it is a very beautiful picture. If it be didactic to expose the wrongness of wrong, and the folly of lovelessness by the presentation of loveliness, then this book is didactic: didactic or not, it is beautiful. Whether there is sufficient in it for the purposes of a book is quite another matter. It is not perhaps often that a reviewer desires to say that a book is a frail, sketchy, and inconsequential thing, but is withheld from his word by the fact that the frail thing was written in a very lovely spirit. This is such an occasion, anyway. There is only one moment of keen interest, and that is when Selby Parramore tampers with the pure, innocent affection of Bridget Camden; but that hardly arrives when it is over. Mr. De Sélincourt can do bigger things than this. Why does he not set himself to them? He knows surely that Colossus has his own virtue independent of exquisiteness.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Adventure. By JACK LONDON. Coloured Frontispiece. (Thomas Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.)

IT is not often that the title of a story is any real criterion of what the story consists. In this instance Mr. Jack London, dealing with love between whites amidst head-hunting cannibals of the South Seas, introduces the stay-at-home reader, surfeited with the usual insipid fare, to phases of adventure of a distinctly exciting and novel kind. The heroine is an American girl. Not one of those named Sadie or Mamie, dressed in the latest Parisian confection, who talks Yankee slang and is for ever "bossing" her Poppa. Oh, dear no, not at all. The damsel is named Joan, and over heavy braids of brown hair she wears a cowboy Stetson hat (occasionally called a Baden-Powell also), while on her hip hangs a long-barrelled 38 Colt's revolver in its holster, and this is accompanied by a full cartridge-belt of slender girth, as one might expect when it encircles the female form divine. She knows how to use her gun, too, and does not exactly shut her eyes when firing it off. She can steer a whale-boat through the dangerous surf, and, better still, command and navigate a schooner, the only woman on board; and recruit bloodthirsty cannibals, whom everybody else is afraid of, for work on the plantation.

The hero, a Britisher, she nurses through a fever, to which, but for her, he would most assuredly have succumbed. But when convalescent he can find nothing better to do than to be shocked—as most Britishers generally are—at such "goings on," and to tell her that she must not do this and must not do that, for "What would Mrs. Grundy think?" out in the South Sea Islands! The way this solitary white girl deals with hordes of rebellious, vindictive, and treacherous savages seemed to us marvellous until we read the other day how a Mrs. Roby journeyed into Central Africa, and prior to that into other wild parts of the globe, entirely "on her own" and without mishap. Joan is apparently afraid of only one thing, and that is matrimony. But after many thrilling adventures—which our readers should hasten to make themselves acquainted with, and they will not regret it—this delightful young lady embarks on the greatest adventure of all, the "excellent mystery," when she "nestled in the circle of his arms, saying softly, almost in a whisper—'I am ready, Dave.'"

And 'twas thus the Stars and Stripes struck to the Union Jack away out in the Cannibal Islands. We have purposely left Dave, the Britisher, in the background, for he naturally takes somewhat of a back seat all through the story, until the finale. But he loses nothing by it, for he wins in the end the sweetest Yankee girl it has ever been our privilege to meet, and we thank Mr. Jack London for introducing us to her. And all for two shillings, with a most alluring coloured frontispiece thrown it!

Mrs. Thompson. By W. B. MAXWELL. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

MR. MAXWELL has achieved an unusual triumph in this story by taking as his heroine a woman of the mysterious age known as "over forty," proprietress of a large general emporium in a provincial town, and interesting us so deeply in her career that we were unwilling to put the book down unfinished. We had the good fortune to select the adventures of "Mrs. Thompson" for reading during a journey from Devonshire to London, and the author must take it as a high compliment when we say that we could have wished for another half-hour in the train in order to complete the pleasant task of perusal.

Mrs. Thompson is "the best business man in Mallingbridge," and a widow who lacks no suitors; until the young cad Marsden enters her employ and rouses by his sheer masculinity the passions which her weak, insignificant husband had never evoked, she resists all offers. Marsden, however, takes her by storm, artfully, and marries her; then begins her downfall. He saps by his excesses the vitality of the huge business she has so splendidly built up; but he never breaks her spirit. By a magnificent coup she joins forces secretly with "Bence's," the rival house on the opposite side of the street, and in due course packs Marsden off, a disappointed and disgusted scoundrel, to the other side of the world. With her romance is combined the love-story of her daughter Enid, who, however, is a much less convincing character. There are some excellent scenes in the book, notably the gathering at the office of Mr. Prentice, the solicitor, where the secret alliance of the two businesses is disclosed. "Mrs. Thompson" is not so psychological as "The Rest Cure," but it is a much stronger story, and one which we heartily commend to our readers.

Fedora of the Halls. By ARTHUR APPLIN. (Everett and Co. 6s.)

HITHERTO the name of Mr. Arthur Applin has been invariably associated in one's mind with the more lurid-covered, cheap reprints which bespatter the railway bookstalls. In fact, after a hasty glance at them, they were left severely alone. It would seem to be an unreasoning prejudice which caused such sorry treatment to Mr. Applin, for on reading "Fedora of the Halls" the conclusion arrived at inevitably is that the author writes in such an interesting manner that one is compelled to read to the end. "Fedora" is a novel showing the music-hall artiste both before and behind the footlights, in her "diggings" in provincial towns, and in her intimate dealings with Jew agents—scoundrels of a pronounced order. The heroine is a charmingly impulsive young girl, who, left penniless with a brother and sister by the death of her father, eschews the idea of the belittling life of a governess or a companion, and stakes her all upon making a success on the variety stage. Possessed of a strikingly beautiful figure, she provides herself with the necessary "dresses" for a Salome dance, and is rushed off to a small provincial hall. Her various adventures, the friends she makes among her fellow artistes, and the final success and result are vividly told, but two points strike the reader with a certain amount of force. The first is how is it that a girl who, as far as one can judge, has never in her life danced on the stage, makes an instantaneous "hit," even before provincials? Perhaps this is one of Mr. Applin's little sarcasms. Secondly, it is remarkable that in her dealings with the opposite sex she takes to individual members of it as a duck takes to water, generally without being introduced. Apart from these little features, which, after all, only make one desire to read more of this unique creature, the plot is skilfully unfolded, and the result is good.

The Coil of Carne. By JOHN OXENHAM. (Methuen and Co. 6s.)

MR. JOHN OXENHAM'S latest story is told with the same smooth charm of style which we have been led to expect from him. The not very closely applicable title refers to a predicament which existed when at one time it seemed impossible to discover which of two children was the legitimate heir of Denzil Carron, who was a Pre-Victorian blade and son and heir to Sir Denzil Carron of Carne. The author gives us some effective description of the beautiful stretch of sandy sea-shore adjacent to Carne and of a reed-rimmed mere near at hand. But the characters are not motive to our sight. The evil that men had done shows its effects in the story and makes up the plot, but whenever the evil-doers appear themselves their blemishes have faded and they are as good as any one else. A young curate invalided from the East End of London (we did not know that slum-work dated from so early in the Victorian era) becomes a good influence at Carne. He is altogether too up-to-date an ideal with his Cambridge Blue and his muscular Christianity. What with the abstraction of modern goodness and the smoothing over of contemporary wickedness—charitably cloaking it with the excuse that it was "of the time"—the author manages to preserve in his story almost everything except the air of reality. There is a spirited description of the scene of the Crimean campaign; but throughout variety of character is sacrificed to good-nature, and artistic truth to pleasantness.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Trevor Lordship. By Mrs. Hubert Barclay. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

Eleanor, the heroine of this book, which is essentially a girl's one, loved and was loved by a clever young literary man, who, through force of circumstances, is compelled to go abroad and colonise. The engagement, however, holds through the fifteen years of his exile, although he almost forgets her, and she looks upon him as a man who was in love with her in another life. Her entire individuality has been killed by her egomaniacal father during this time. At last, however, the death of the man's parents brings about his succession to the estate and title held by his father, and he returns. Honour compels him to marry Eleanor, whom he has never released from the engagement, and she falls in with the arrangement, simply because it seems to her that there is nothing else to be done, and because she cannot get out of it. They marry and settle down in their house, Trevor Lordship, he immersed in his books, she keeping the house and servants in order. The rest of the incidents in the story leads up to the awakening of these two curious dead people and the new birth of the old love in their hearts. As a character-study of this odd couple the book is not without interest, and there are one or two slight surprises in the pedigrees of the subsidiary characters, which help to carry it to a happy ending.

The Princess Virginia. By C. N. and A. M. Williamson. (Methuen and Co. 2s.)

To tell the truth, we do not think that the present new romance by the well-known Williamsons is worthy of their well-earned reputation. It is founded on the somewhat hackneyed theme of a German reigning Prince, whose marriage area is limited, falling in love (as it was intended by the lady he should) with what is his embodiment of a perfect mate; but all that he can offer, under the stern eye and tongue of his Chancellor (made after the most approved German model), is a morganatic marriage, declined with scorn, as the lady the Princess Virginia, masquerading as Miss Howard, is really the chosen bride for him.

Given these materials such able constructors of modern fiction make the most of them. There is a motor-car, but it is only employed under normal conditions, and the story does not revolve with its wheels. Some parts of the book remind us of "The Golden Rose," by Mrs. Fraser, written on a somewhat similar theme, though treated differently.

"The Princess Virginia" is a readable story, but not, as before mentioned, up to the standard we have justly given to the authors' fiction, although in fairness it should be said that the price is only 2s.

THE THEATRE

"FANNY'S FIRST PLAY" AT THE LITTLE THEATRE

At the first performance at the Little Theatre of this quite amazing play the audience and the laughter and the enthusiasm resembled those which were often to be found at the Court Theatre in the old glad days. Packed into the small space of Miss Kingston's most charming Wedgwood-like room were all the brain and intellect of what may be called the Shavian society. Miss Lillah McCarthy has pretended to withhold the name of the author of the piece, which is called "An Easy Play for a Little Theatre." If there were any secrecy as to its authorship it was dispelled five minutes after the rise of the curtain. The men and women who were discovered in the dining-room of a Denmark-hill house were creatures of Mr. Shaw's well-known brand. If Sir W. S. Gilbert had never perpetrated the "Bab Ballads" Mr. George Bernard Shaw might have remained a dramatic critic. In all human probability he would have employed his spare time as a Labour member in the House of Commons, and would have spasmodically amused the Unionists and outraged his own party until his constituency replaced him by a mere typical demagogue, with the usual lack of intelligence and the usual strength of lung.

It may be said at once that in "Fanny's First Play" Mr. Shaw has justified himself. In his recent productions, when he endeavoured to write really serious work, he bored us consumedly. When writing "Fanny's First Play," however, it was indeed good to throw back our head and shout with laughter at his spontaneously idiotic jokes, his exquisite verbal fireworks, his characteristic philosophy, his acute characterisation. He gave us an introduction, a play in three Acts, and an epilogue. The introduction was only mildly funny, and far too long. It contained three shrieks of laughter. The play itself did not contain one word too much, and may be placed side by side with "Candida" and "You Never Can Tell." The epilogue was the most exquisite piece of impudence of which Mr. Shaw can boast, and boast he will.

To tell the story of the thing would be a waste of time. You might as well set out to describe the antics of a tadpole. There were, however, several moments in the play which must have surprised even Mr. Shaw for their truth to life—moments which were charged with emotion and the best kind of drama, and which fitted into his comic scheme like diamonds in a tinsel crown. We defy any one to sit unmoved and listen to the conversation between a mother and a daughter, which takes place in the second Act, in which the girl describes and defines her emancipation from the dull round of sham peacefulness and happiness of her home-life. The grief of the religious mother was most painful and very beautifully interpreted by Miss Cicely Hamilton, who is an actress of peculiar power. To pick out the gems of this play and discuss them seriously is to imitate the impudence of Mr. Shaw himself. When we have said that "Fanny's First Play" is Mr. Shaw's tenth or eleventh play we have said everything. It goes without saying that it is brilliant work, and it should attract to the Little Theatre all those who must be sick to death of ordinary theatrical fare. There is more genuine wit in ten lines of this play than in all the three Acts of those others which are apparently produced by the commercial actor-manager because he believes them to be works of art. For the benefit of playgoers and the prestige of the English stage we wish that Mr. Shaw had not made "Fanny's First Play" an easy play for a Little Theatre, but that he had read the introduction and the epilogue to his personal friends, put them both back into his drawer and produced the play itself at a big theatre. Shorn of its wilful eccentricity, it is exactly the thing that the public wants. The public does not go to Little Theatres; it suspects them. It does not know where they are, and will not take the trouble to find out. It prefers those places of entertainment in main thoroughfares in which there are orchestras and an absence of the sudden three dumps before the rise of the curtain. We congratulate Miss Lillah McCarthy on having been privileged to produce "Fanny's First Play," and we greatly appreciate the perfection of her production. We wish her enterprise every success. But if this play could be seen by the great ordinary public we are sure that it would have the effect of raising the standard of entertainment, and of making such dreadful stuff as "A Fool There Was," "Baby Mine," and others too numerous to mention impossible of production; and the actor-managers who have control of nearly all the theatres would be obliged, however much they disliked it, to put on the work not of the bagman dramatist, but of the man who knows how to write and has something to say.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. George Bernard Shaw will doubtless be amazed that we should take him so seriously. He will certainly affect horror at our desire that he should begin the renaissance of the English commercial stage. It is obvious that so long as he is content to entertain and interest and give memorable afternoons just to the few daring people who are not afraid to venture into back streets and precious places, his inimitable work will remain altogether unknown to the English public—to the English public's great loss. Only when Mr. Herbert Trench produces a play is the English public enabled to see acting so suprisingly excellent. It may be said that not one member of the cast of "Fanny's First Play" is ever engaged by the ordinary actor-manager if he can help it. And yet, from Miss Lillah McCarthy down to the actor who played the servant, the company was so admirable that it would open the eyes of the loyal but discontented playgoer who continues to manifest an intermittent interest in the theatre, and who does not believe that English acting exists. There is hardly a name in the cast which will be recognised outside Little Theatre audiences, members of the Stage Society, the Playgoers' Society, and the enthusiastic supporters of side shows. How often, for example, does one find the name of Miss Lillah McCarthy in theatre programmes? And yet here is an actress of very remarkable gifts, endowed with a beautiful personality, and of wide and even extraordinary experience. Then there is Miss Dorothy Minto, who as Dora Delaney would draw all London if it knew where to go. Her portrait of a typical little cockney demi-mondaine is simply exquisite. To the smallest detail she is perfect. Mr. Fewlass Llewellyn, Miss Gwynneth Galton, Mr. Arnold Lucy, Mr. H. K. Ayliff, Mr. Shiel Barry, and Mr. Claude King are good enough to rank with the famous actors of the days of Bancroft. Then there was Mr. Raymond Lauzerte, whose performance of Lieutenant Duvallet was inimitable. How often are any of these actors included in the casts of the all too frequent London productions? Their work is well known to, and greatly admired by, the same handful of people who, alone among the English race, support the intellectual drama. All we can do is to exhort those people who have deserted the theatre because they have very naturally come to regard it, generally speaking, as something beneath contempt, to make an exception in the case of the Little Theatre. And when they hear the characteristic things which Mr. Shaw has put into the mouths of his faithful portraits of some of the dramatic critics, they will discover the other reason why the London stage offers them so little attraction.

"THE BUTTERFLY ON THE WHEEL" AT THE GLOBE THEATRE

When the curtain rises on the third Act of the new play at the Globe Theatre, written by Mr. Edward Hemmerde and Mr. Francis Neilson, you find yourself in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, Court II. Mr. Justice Burroughs is on the bench. He is biting the end of his quill pen, and listening with keen attention to the cross-examination of little Mrs. Admaston by Sir Robert Fyffe, K.C., M.P. The court is packed to suffocation. The Home Secretary, Mr. George Admaston, is seated almost within arm's length of his wife, who stands in the witness-box wearing an uneasy and half-defiant smile. The beautiful Lady Atwill can be seen, and there are Lord Ellerdine, many members of what is called the Smart Set (to whom all the parties of the case are known), and Roderick Collingwood, the co-respondent.

Mrs. Admaston's leading counsel has just sat down, and Sir Robert, with the blandest of smiles and the most persuasive of voices, is on his feet. Piece by piece you learn that little Mrs. Admaston has spent far too much of her time away from her busy and ambitious husband, that she has fallen into the hands of an entirely pleasant but quite characteristically callous and immoral set, and that her favourite is Roderick Collingwood, a man of infinite leisure and more than a sufficiency of means. The point is whether this girl, careless of appearances, ignorant of the insidious methods of men of the world, has been unfaithful to her husband, and whether there are any grounds for his obtaining a divorce on account of the intimacy of Collingwood. You learn that Mrs. Admaston, Lady Atwill, Ellerdine, and Collingwood left London to make a stay at St. Moritz, that the luggage of Mrs. Admaston and Collingwood was unregistered, and that these two state that they got into the wrong train by accident, found themselves in Paris by accident, stayed the night in the same hotel together, in which they shared a sitting-room out of which, by accident, was Collingwood's bedroom, and that the girl spent nearly an hour in her dressing-gown with Collingwood alone in the sitting-room. To all of this Mrs. Admaston agrees, but she maintains on her oath that, although such conduct can certainly be called foolish and careless, it can come under a heading no worse. You believe her, not only because you have seen these two typical worldlings in the Paris hotel, but because you can see that the girl is not an inherent liar. What Sir Robert Fyffe wishes to know is this: How came it that the luggage was fortunate enough to find itself on the wrong train with its owners? Why Collingwood's room led into Mrs. Admaston's sitting-room, and why Collingwood stated to Admaston over the telephone that Ellerdine and Lady Atwill were also in the hotel? In answer to these questions Mrs. Admaston had only one answer, "I do not know." Was it true that Collingwood was making passionate love to her at the moment when the husband rang up? Yes. Was this the first time that Collingwood had made passionate love? Yes.

Sir Robert Fyffe would see. There was a place called Salby, belonging to Lord Ellerdine. Mrs. Admaston agreed that she had stayed there. She further agreed that once when Collingwood was motoring her to that house the car broke down and they were obliged to spend the night at the same inn. Did she write a letter to her husband stating that, notwithstanding the breakdown, she and Collingwood arrived at Selby in time for dinner? She did. Sir Robert Fyffe, bending forward and speaking with a rasp in his voice, put it to Mrs. Admaston that not only did they not arrive in time for dinner, but that, in a dressing-gown even more attractive and flimsy that the one in which she appeared before Collingwood in the Paris hotel, she sat with him in this country inn alone until the small hours of the morning. Mrs. Admaston agreed.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Sir Robert Fyffe implored Mrs. Admaston to be careful. In his most earnest manner, and with the air of a man who holds all the picture-cards, he asked Mrs. Admaston if she wished his lordship and the jury to believe that on these two occasions she had remained faithful to her husband. Sir Robert demanded the truth. The poor little butterfly then bursts into a tirade. What is the use of telling the truth when everything she says is twisted and turned against her? She has been foolish, yes. Collingwood has made passionate love to her again and again, yes. She has gone out of her way to keep the facts as to her carelessness from her husband, yes. It is her habit to take off her things and come down in a dressing-gown; but she has never been unfaithful to her husband, never, never, never.

A smile runs through the court. One of Sir Robert's devils leans forward. Admaston shoots a quick glance at his wife's distorted face. His lordship bends down kindly. Mrs. Admaston is not doing herself justice when she does not confine herself to the questions asked by Sir Robert.

Sir Robert makes it clear that owing to an anonymous letter written in a peculiar handwriting to Admaston's sister, in which it was stated definitely that Collingwood and Mrs. Admaston had planned to get into the wrong train and pass the night at the Hôtel des Tuileries alone, a detective was employed to watch them. Mr. McArthur, K.C., Mrs. Admaston's leading counsel, springs to his feet. He protests that this letter is not evidence. His lordship agrees with Mr. McArthur, but desires that the letter shall be handed to the party in the witness-box. The girl glances at the letter, the writing of which is utterly unknown to her, and cries out that she has been placed in a trap, a monstrous and abominable trap. His lordship requests that the letter may be handed to him. He does not, of course, look with anything but suspicion upon anonymous letters. Nevertheless, he thinks it best to read it to the jury, together with another anonymous letter in the same handwriting which has been received that day by Admaston's sister, in which the writer begs that the first letter may be withdrawn. The second letter purports to come from an old and faithful servant of the family.

There is a rustle in court. The heads of the jury—honest taxpayers who are the unwilling witnesses of little Mrs. Admaston's torture—move together. Collingwood rises to his feet and makes an incoherent protest. He is hushed down. And then Sir Robert bends forward once again. His bland smile has given place to an expression of triumph. He points his guns at the little trembling figure, down whose cheeks the tears are running, and fires a very volley of overwhelming evidences of guilt at her head. He proves that his victim has lied again and again. He proves beyond question that the trip to Paris was planned. In the face of all these things he wishes to know whether Mrs. Admaston still maintains that she has not been unfaithful to her husband, and whether she can ask his lordship and the jury to believe that she is merely a careless and foolish young woman.

And then the butterfly on the wheel, badly broken, with nearly all the beautiful colours of her wings rubbed off, bursts into a very torrent of appeal and reproach and agonised condemnation of the system under which she is being tortured beyond endurance. At the end of it she breaks down utterly and bursts into terrible weeping. His lordship, like every one else in Court, including Sir Robert. is somewhat moved, but he notices with some relief that the hands of the clock have passed his luncheon-hour. "I think, gentlemen, that we will now adjourn." He rises, and the curtain falls.

This is the scene, admirably written and carried out and very perfectly acted, which should draw all London to the Globe Theatre. There has certainly been nothing so faithful to life of its kind put upon the stage within memory. It is not possible to imagine a more convincing or powerful K.C. than that portrayed by Mr. Norman McKinnel, or a typically careless but innocent society girl more touchingly and beautifully played than by Miss Madge Titheradge. When it is said, too, that Mr. Collingwood is played by Mr. Lewis Waller, the Ellerdine by Mr. Sothern, the Judge by Mr. Stanley Turnbull, and the Lady Atwill by Miss Beryl Faber it may be imagined how well the authors are served. Mr. Lewis Waller is not seen in this play in the part of one of the many over-heroic heroes of romantic drama with which his name has been so long associated. He plays the man of the world with such ease and charm, however, that it is to be hoped that he will not revert to sword and high-heeled shoes again for a considerable period, but that when a successor to "A Butterfly on the Wheel" is needed, and we do not think that he need be anxious as to a successor, he will give London the opportunity of seeing him in other modern plays.

GEORGE BORROW—I.

George Borrow is a paradox. His own assertions, in speech and in writing, prove him to have been stolidly conservative, bound by strong affection to the traditional laws, proprieties, and politics of his country, and yet in the books he has left to the world he has portrayed a life that is nomadic, untraditional, and quite irreconcilable with his professed opinions. He bent back for his materials to the remnants of old races, old customs, old faiths, and old superstitions, and he has given an intense emphasis to life's undercurrents.

Many of his opinions contradict one another. His very works in their broadest conception show this inconsistency. He who wrote "Lavengro" also wrote "Wild Wales," and more unlike works from one and the same author cannot be named. It is not that they differ in quality, that one is good and the other bad, for they are both great books, each a work of genius; but they do not appear to be the work of the same genius. Borrow's experiences were so varied, his knowledge of men was so extensive and so out of the way, that he was able to meet with and to appreciate such opposite types as Jasper Petulengro and the preacher Williams; and yet nearly all those who knew him have some tale to tell of his abrupt manners and surly, unsociable temper.

He combined the narrow-mindedness of the street sectary with the tolerance of the agnostic; he possessed the parochial instinct of the Celt with the imperial conception of the Saxon. He had great knowledge, and yet was strangely ignorant. He knew thirty languages; but, in spite of some very dogmatic assertions, failed to appreciate what was best in them. He was moved throughout his life by many strange impulses, yet was lacking in some of the most primitive emotions.

Perhaps the explanation of his character lies in this last fact. To some extent he seems sexless. Where usually emotions might be expected, prejudices are found. In that greatest test of a man's nature, the attitude towards the other sex, he presents an almost sphinx-like inscrutability. With a solitary, although great, exception, he never drew a woman's character sympathetically. The exception is, of course, Isopel Berners, and in adding her to the gallery of immortal women he has succeeded in acquiring an unenviable reputation for heartlessness. The whole episode, although humorous in treatment, is really a fragment of a tragedy, but whether Borrow himself realised this is doubtful. If Shakespeare had told the story he would have made it clear whether Lavengro was only a half-hearted lover, or a man of Mephistophelian intellect, dealing in terrible irony at a woman's expense. No matter how the incident is viewed, Borrow comes out badly. He fails to substantiate the claim to large-mindedness which he is at some pains to establish throughout "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In all probability Borrow felt largely and nobly towards his fellows, but in doing so he had no feeling of sex. He lacked knowledge of the intimate and intricate emotions and mental differences that exist between men and women, and he was, therefore, able to treat with perfect and bitter irony that subtlest of all emotions, a woman's love.

A casual glance at the story of Borrow's work reveals yet further paradox, for, having attained fame comparatively early in his career, he lived long enough to know himself discredited, and he was so far forgotten that the news of his death came as a surprise to many who were under the impression that the literary lion of the 'forties had long passed away.

Borrow first attracted attention with "The Zincali," after some years of hack-work, as described in "Lavengro," and he sprang into fame a year or two later with "The Bible in Spain." Ten years later he dimmed his contemporary reputation with "Lavengro," and when in 1862 he published "Wild Wales," it seemed that his literary fame was quite extinguished. The eclipse did not begin to pass away until his death drew attention to him once more. The cult of Borrow was then born, and the number of those who call themselves Borrovians is now legion.

Yet another strange evidence of the atmosphere of contradiction which invests Borrow is the fact that he who to-day seems the most lovable of men, and who shares with Johnson and Byron a personality which lends lustre to their works, was peculiarly adept at ruining friendships. Perhaps the Borrovians would not have loved the man so much in the flesh. He possessed those traits which always tell against a man's personal reputation. He was self-opinionated, and so aroused instinctive opposition; he was self-conscious, and consequently unnatural; and he was jealous, and thus estranged sympathy.

His life, indeed, is a record of fragmentary friendships. He knew many famous people intimately for short periods. His works attracted men, but the rough edges that seemed so delightful in reading were a little too rough for real life. His response to Miss Strickland's offer to send him her work, "The Queens of England," was not calculated to breed favourable opinions. "For God's sake, don't, Madam," he said, "I should not know where to put them, or what to do with them." He could hardly have propitiated Thackeray by telling him that Punch was a periodical which he never read. Even his friendship with that most placid of men, Edward FitzGerald, wore out. It must take a Boswell to bear the repeated shocks of such a man.

Borrow has many faults, both of the man and of his work, which cannot be ignored, for a mere list of his virtues will only leave a flavour similar to that left by the endless procession of famous Scotchmen of whom no one ever heard out of Scotland. Merely to enumerate his virtues is to dub him "worthy," and so set him on the threshold of oblivion.

He was, to take the faults of the man first, more bigoted than even the rising antipathy to the smug self-satisfaction of the day demanded; he was possessed of a temperament so jealous and sensitive that he could detect an insult in a commonplace remark and a condescension in a courtesy; and he was so vindictive and spiteful that he could never forget an affront. He always endeavoured to overwhelm the offender with a vituperation that robbed him of all his dignity. Nevertheless, he possessed sterling qualities. Splendid grit, indomitable patience, a generous nature where his prejudices were not roused, and detestation of cant made him estimate the unco' guid, and also those of the ultra-fleshly school, at their true value.

He had other traits, which, while illuminating the man, may not receive such great approbation. He could knock a man down; drink an almost unlimited amount of beer without disturbing the respectabilities; break the ice to bathe at seventy years of age; and live an irreproachable life in rather questionable circumstances. There is in these qualities stuff for the cynics, but there are other people who will consider them a magnificent tribute to the man's worth.

DOVER STRAITS

To the travelled Briton, hurrying homeward or reluctantly leaving the Old Country on service and exile, Calais is still the gate of England. Such a traveller watches with quickening pulse the white walls looming up on the horizon as the steamer which bears him Northward-ho! from that port dips her nose into the breakers. The complete circle of years ago perchance is but a number of segments now. There are gaps in it which can never be filled this side the grave. Those he left children have grown to be men and women; snow will have fallen on the heads of folk he last saw in the prime of life. The transitoriness of earthly things sounds its insistent note in his ears. The traveller himself perhaps does not feel a day older than when he left England; nevertheless the world-without-end conviction of the unresting foot of Time is borne in upon him. He has been, let us say, successful beyond his best hope, and has experienced the exhilaration of service. He, when little more than a boy, has learnt to play his part in the scheme of government, unhampered by control. He has "bossed the show" in India or a colony, and the youngster who does that for the first time adds a cubit to his stature. "At home" things will drop back into truer perspective, for there he is still "one of the boys." To the man who is flying South the white walls are a background of regret and old memories. He realises that life is no longer all "beer and skittles," and that he has to face the game and play it. It will be his fate, perhaps, now and then to shuttle backward and forward across the narrow Strait. Every time he does so—it may be unconsciously from the force of events—the tireless movement of Fate will bring home to him its lesson :—

> "Nativity, once in the main of light,
> Crawls to maturity, wherewith being crown'd
> Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
> And Time that gave, doth now his gift confound."

The Straits of Dover are the bond that links us to a past transcendently remote. There we once joined hands with the Continent of Europe; yet even from that age of grey antiquity the relics of men have come down to us. They and the animals who were then their earth-mates, but who have now disappeared from the scene, once passed over the vanished bridge of chalk, which has fallen into the sea of oblivion. Man showed his dawning intelligence by his superior cunning as a beast of prey. The mammoth and the cave-lion and the woolly rhinoceros pitted brute strength and ferocity against the instincts of the human hunter and trapper, and in that contest strength and ferocity went under. The present writer possesses the molar of a mammoth found by the navvies working in a diving-bell on the bed of the sea when the Admiralty Harbour at Dover was under construction. What a record does that bit of fossilised bone bring to light!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Straits of Dover did not exist at a period as recent as the human type. Science strains her eyes to trace the dawn of man upon the earth. She finds a few scattered relics in gravel-beds, where once great rivers flowed. As those rivers sawed their way down they left successive terraces behind them, and, in those pebbly terraces, stranded at higher levels than those of to-day, flints shaped by men lie scattered. Those crude weapons were missiles, and the brain behind the hand that hurled them gave the primitive savage race "dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth."

Dover Straits in the light of history are but of yesterday. To imagine their formation we must go back to a period when icefields of stupendous extent lay across North Western Europe. In England the southern edge of the icecap skirted from the north of London, and thence across the midlands to Bristol. Run a sweeping line to the eastward across the Netherlands and North Germany, and away towards the Arctics once lay a vast glacier-field. The North Sea at its southern extremity was a cul de sac. The reindeer roamed in vast herds as far south as the Pyrenees.

To this ice-locked desolation came a change of climate. Floods of inconceivable violence rent and sculptured the face of the earth. Gravel beds were swept away, valleys chocked up by moraines, vast areas scoured and tormented by a plague of swollen waters. Thus were the Straits of Dover forced. The impounded waters, welling up, broke through the chalk dam and burst their way into the sea beyond. Great Britain became an island. Wave on wave of wild men from the South were destined to beat upon our shores, but from henceforth they must commit their fortunes to the boisterous ocean, crossing the storm-swept Strait. The white walls faced one another across a gulf. Many a race of primitive men, when they reached that watery barrier, must doubtless have been baulked in their onward march by the "salt, estranging sea."

Thither, at last, came Cæsar with his beaked triremes. The white walls were made to be scaled, for the tide of the Roman Conquest knew no petty barriers. Where his expeditions landed will be discussed for all time. In default of a better guess, let us say that it was near Sandwich that the Roman legions first gained foothold on our shores. Through morass and swamp and primæval forest the great roads were driven—missionary roads, along which might made right. How ruthless soever was the all-conquering tramp of the Roman mercenaries, and however brutal the methods of their captains, the waste was tamed, and with the process of the suns men grew to yield obedience to a higher law.

Let it not be forgotten that Dover was still a link in the imperial chain which stretched between London and Rome, when the power of the Roman arms dry-rotted and chaos fell upon their British province. Be sure that henceforth Dover held its place whenever invasion or foray was planned on either shore. At last the wild sea-rovers of the North swept down. Careless of life, they landed wherever they willed. At the Norman Conquest they were masters of the Danelaw, which men now call East Anglia. A sea-wolf was every mother's son of them. Let any man be niddering and his fate was sealed; they would not cumber their craft with such human raffle. So that strange crusade swept over Europe. The conquest of the Normans, in comparison with all these remote comings and goings, appears a modern movement. They brought in their wake detestable cruelty, intolerable wrong, but nevertheless the root of ordered governance was planted, and by slow degrees men yielded homage to the fruit it bore.

As the years have crept on and the stream of business and pleasure has flowed and ebbed across the Garden of England to the Continent and a land beyond, Dover has held her head high. She has not escaped invasion. We know from the pages of "David Copperfield" how the slogan cry of "Janet! donkeys!" was the signal for the invasion of local rights and how prompt were reprisals. With that exception the ancient borough has slumbered scot-free from hostilities.

Had the Channel Tunnel been built we should doubtless have experienced a foreign invasion of holiday-makers on a growing scale; but happily, alike for the intending shareholders and the country, the Tunnel remains a scheme on paper. The national premium against panic risk which it would have entailed would have been too severe. Now Dover has its great harbour. A square mile of deep water is enclosed, but the opinion of Navy men on it as a rendezvous is unfavourable. The force of the currents across the entrances is extreme and the risk to warships in entering and leaving correspondingly great. Moreover no dock exists at Dover in which a disabled ship could be repaired. If a squadron lay there in war time it might conceivably share the fate of a rat in a trap. And so, from the bare white cliffs of past ages we trace the sophisticated Dover of to-day.

THE LATE SIR ALFRED LYALL

The sudden death of the Right Honourable Sir Alfred Lyall on April 10th is a great loss to literature. He had, doubtless, other claims to distinction; he had held high offices in the Indian Civil Service, that school of statesmen and administrators second to none in the world. To mention only his latest and highest posts, he was Foreign Secretary to the Government of India during the second Afghan War of 1878-1880, when the despatches drafted by him and embellished by Lord Lytton were masterpieces of style and substance, though the Viceroy found that the Secretary saw everything from so many points of view that he had difficulty in making up his mind. He was Lieutenant-Governor of what were then called the North-west Provinces, which are now the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh. In the latter capacity he procured the creation of a Legislative Council and the establishment of the University of Allahabad, both of them important measures. But, though pre-eminent in ability, he failed to gain the confidence or affection of his subjects—native or English. His politics were too profound for general comprehension. He was more in his element as member of the Secretary of State's Council for fifteen years, and he was wise in declining the Governorship of the Cape. He had leisure to devote to literature, in which he had already made his mark while still in active employ. His "Verses Written in India" should be widely known. "The Old Pindaree" (1866) is full of vigour:—

My father was an Afghan, and came from Kandahar;
He rode with Nawáb Amir Khan in the old Maratha War.
From the Dekkan to the Himalay, five hundred of one clan,
They asked no leave of prince or chief as they swept thro' Hindusthan.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

His "Theology in Extremis," in which "moriturus loquitur," is some revelation of his own mind:—

Here stand I on the ocean's brink;
Who hath brought news of the further shore?
How shall I cross it? Sail or sink,
One thing is sure, I return no more;
Shall I find haven, or aye shall I be Tossed in the depths of a shoreless sea?

"The Land of Regrets" could hardly refer to his own successful career, but has often been applied to the cases of his less fortunate colleagues in the service:—

He did list to the voice of a siren,
He was caught by the clinkings of gold,
And the slow toil of Europe seemed tiring,
And the grey of his fatherland cold;
He must haste to the gardens of Circe;
What ails him, the slave, that he frets
In thy service? O Lady sans merci!
O Land of Regrets!

These were his lighter jeux d'esprit: his more serious efforts were in prose, always philosophical, sometimes quite poetically expressed. His style in itself afforded pleasure to the reader apart from the matter. In his "Asiatic Studies," first collected in one volume, and in 1899 expanded to two volumes, he wrote of the Religion of an Indian Province; of the Origin of Divine Myths in India; on Religious Policy; Natural Religion in India; besides political papers on the Rajput States and Permanent Dominion in Asia. They showed great penetration into the religious and social facts which he probed with singular acuteness. But he found time for historical and biographical work also. He wrote Lives of Warren Hastings, Lord Dufferin, and Tennyson, and contributed to the narrative of Lord Lytton's Indian Administration. "The Rise and Expansion of the British Dominion in India," which has run to five editions, is, though not correct in every detail, the best philosophical history extant of the British period. His contributions to literature are too many to enumerate. They, and his general career, gained for him the Oxford D.C.L. and the Cambridge LL.D., and his nomination to the Privy Council. His last important office was as President of the International Congress for the History of Religions held at Oxford, late in the summer of 1908. Thus for some years he had obtained a unique reputation, not only as the best Anglo-Indian writer, but also as a literary authority of acknowledged merit, judged by the highest standard. His Indian work brought him to the front; it never submerged him. He held his own in literary circles by his depth of thought, his originality, his perception, his power of style and expression, all the qualities which go to the formation of literary genius, The country is the poorer for his death. By its awful suddenness he was spared much that he would have felt mentally as well as bodily.

THE PROVINCIAL PERFORMANCES OF WAGNER'S "THE RING OF THE NIBELUNG"

THE primary importance of the recent presentation in Leeds, Manchester, and Glasgow of Richard Wagner's tetralogy "The Ring of the Nibelung" relates to its musical aspect and to the musical state of the country. Not far removed from this, however, are the dramatic, scenic, literary, and humanist aspects. The laws which make for the success or failure of such an undertaking are not merely those of the music of the people, but of their artistic, and therefore of their higher life generally. The musical condition of the districts lying around these great cities, though far from being ideal, is such as to form a good soil upon which the enthusiast who knows may sow his seed of interest and curiosity. The actual materials for the production of a great musical work are probably more suitable in Great Britain than in any other country in the world. British vocalists and instrumentalists, as individuals, are generally admitted to be unsurpassed, while the former have shown lately that they are by no means lacking in histrionic ability. The dramatic sense of the people is perhaps not so keen either by nature or training as is their musical feeling. What there is of it has certainly been neglected or distorted since pageants have taken the place of plays. Still less or worse is the general artistic sense of the average Englishman. Art is not a sufficiently vital force among the commercial and working communities to be accepted by them as a complete and inseparable entity. Each art is to them a separate thing arising only from the direction of the taste in pastimes. They do not realise any common source of all arts, and therefore fail to grasp the possibility of any expression of thought or life through a combination of them all. Ars una, species mille, they do not recognise, but rather regard art and kind as equal in number and proportion.

Yet these performances have proved the conditions to be not quite as bad as many would have us believe, and have done a really great work in assisting to better them. Incidentally they have done much also in showing the capabilities of individual artists, and affording opportunities of experience of which there are too few. They have also served to introduce to a district where his genius will be amply appreciated a truly great conductor in the person of Hofkapellmeister Michael Balling. So far as sheer achievement is concerned the outstanding feature of the whole undertaking has been the conducting of Herr Balling. To take a single but important point, he showed the old idea that the orchestral writing of Wagner necessarily drowns the voices to be utterly fallacious, and this without the aid of a covered well such as exists at Beyreuth and Munich. With an orchestra numbering over eighty scarcely a single note of the vocal part was missed, and the mutual support of stage ond orchestra was nearly perfect. Even to those whose knowledge of Wagnerian methods was limited to the last degree the association of voice, gesture, scene, and orchestra was helpful, and this fact may be taken as a tribute to the all-round excellence of the representation, as well as to the effectiveness of the manner in which the association is brought about.

The particulars in which the work most nearly failed to make an appeal to the British audiences were the long recapitulations of what has gone before, and the lack of choral items. Why the latter should be a detriment to the appreciation by so utilitarian a race as that of our islands it is difficult to say. Presumably it is on musical, not dramatic, grounds that it is so, but that the condition does exist the careful observer could not fail to see, although applause, except at the end of each Act, was not permitted.

The essentially British character of the audiences was somewhat striking, especially in Leeds and Manchester, where German and Jewish elements in the population are considerable. It almost appeared that the proportions of British and foreign elements were about the same in the audiences as in the body of people engaged in the production. Though the conductor, assistant-conductor, and stage music conductor, as well as the promoter, were all Germans, yet the production was more British than Teutonic. The thirty-four characters were presented by some twenty British artists, and the orchestra consisted mainly of members of the Scottish Orchestra, of whom few, if any, are immigrants. The individual triumphs of Madame

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Gleeson White as "Brynhilda" (who was quite equal to Miss Agnes Nicholls, who had previously appeared in the part), of Mr. John Coates as "Siegfried," Mr. Frederic Austin as "Wotan," and Miss Edna Thornton in four minor parts, including those of "Erda" and "Flosshilde," cannot be passed by without a word of highest praise; and the stage management under Mr. T. C. Fairbairn, though not flawless, must be acknowledged as having overcome in a praiseworthy manner difficulties of an exceptional character.

Persistent rumour has it that Herr Denhof is making arrangements for the formation of a more permanent institution with the object of presenting this and other Wagnerian works on an adequate scale in the provinces. After the highly successful issue of his latest undertaking, this will surely be a desirable consummation of his efforts.

CROMWELL'S HEAD

By Montagu Wood

A goodly number of correspondents have charged into print the last few days to express their enthusiasm on the discovery of Cromwell's head, which has been picked up by somebody somewhere and is guaranteed as a genuine curio. One writer, however, has surpassed all others, and probably himself, in the eloquence and exuberance with which he capitulates the merits of the great Protector, and denounces the barbarity of a bygone generation which it is the duty of this generation to redress—the barbarity consisting in the fact that subsequent to Cromwell's decease the said head was summarily dissevered from the rest of Cromwell. The enthusiast in question, however, seems singularly to overlook the circumstance that posthumous decapitation, though designedly uncomplimentary, is by no means a barbarous, and is certainly a painless, process of penalisation. On the other hand, the victim of this comparatively innocuous operation did not hesitate to remove the head of his leading antagonist from off his shoulders when the antagonist was in an animate condition, a procedure that can hardly commend itself to the humanitarian or to the anti-vivisectionist.

Cromwell was undoubtedly a great Englishman, one of the very greatest Englishmen these islands have ever evolved, and hence it was only meet and fitting that a statue should be erected in his honour a few years back in the metropolis of the Empire, save that by a strange freak of irony and defective humour in its promoters it was established under the very walls of the House of Commons, whose existence he had used armed violence to suppress. Cromwell was in fact a typical Radical. He posed as a faithful soldier of Parliament, and his earliest exhibition of power was to compass its destruction. He posed as a Brutus and an ally of liberty, and he had no compunction in evincing himself to be a Cæsar and an unconscionable trampler upon freedom. Above all, he originated as a fiery vituperator of the methods of Strafford, probably the first statesman of his century in Ireland, while he himself applied to that distressful country a ferocity of treatment unequalled in its annals. He was thus a very congenial prototype of the Radical party to-day, who talk glibly of the voice of the people and gerrymander its utterance, who vilify the peerage and scramble over one another for its honours, who thump tubs to belaud the sanctities of the Constitution, and are agog to tear it in pieces to serve the purpose of the hour. There have been two great outrages on the independence of Parliament in history: one the arrest of the five members, and the other the disbanding of its components by Cromwell; but the worst and least remediable is the one which will now come to pass, if it is to come to pass, when the first items of a squalid regiment of ignoble noblemen slink into the Upper Chamber to degrade it equally by their presence and their votes. There is no need to pay any very special ceremonial reverence to Cromwell's head, though doubtless it has a considerable value to any collector of anatomical bric-à-brac; but if it should be decided to deposit it with much devotional circumstance in Westminster Abbey, then would it not be as well, in the same spirit, as a pendant to Cromwell's statue standing sentinel to the House of Commons, to erect an effigy of Mr. Asquith smirking at the House of Lords?

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

VIII.—THE GREAT MAN

To the people who do not write it must seem odd that men and women should be willing to sacrifice their lives in the endeavour to find new arrangements and combinations of words with which to express old thoughts and older emotions, yet that is not an unfair statement of the task of the literary artist. Words—symbols that represent the noises that human beings make with their tongues and lips and teeth—lie within our grasp like the fragments of a jig-saw puzzle, and we fit them into faulty pictures until our hands grow weary and our eyes can no longer pretend to see the truth. In order to illustrate an infinitesimal fraction of our lives by means of this preposterous game we are willing to sacrifice all the rest. While ordinary efficient men and women are enjoying the promise of the morning, the fulfilment of the afternoon, the tranquillity of evening, we are still trying to discover a fitting epithet for the dew of dawn. For us Spring paves the woods with beautiful words rather than flowers, and when we look into the eyes of our mistress we see nothing but adjectives. Love is an occasion for songs; Death but the overburdened father of all our saddest phrases. We are of those who are born crying into the world because they cannot speak, and we end, like Stevenson, by looking forward to our death because we have written a good epitaph. Sometimes in the course of our frequent descents from heaven to the waste-paper basket we feel that we lose too much to accomplish so little. Does a handful of love-songs really outweigh the smile of a pretty girl, or a hardly-written romance compensate the author for months of lost adventure? We have only one life to live, and we spend the greater part of it writing the history of dead hours. Our lives lack balance because we find it hard to discover a mean between the triolet we wrote last night and the big book we are going to start to-morrow, and also because living only with our heads we tend to become top-heavy. We justify our present discomfort with the promise of a bright future of flowers and sunshine and gladdest life, though we know that in the garden of art there are many chrysalides and few butterflies. Few of us are fortunate enough to accomplish anything that was in the least worth doing, so we fall back on the arid philosophy that it is effort alone that counts.

Luckily—or suicide would be the rule rather than the exception for artists—the long process of disillusionment is broken by hours when even the most self-critical feel nobly and indubitably great; and this is the only reward that most artists ever have for their labours, if we set a higher price on art than money. On the whole, I am inclined to think that the artist is fully rewarded, for the common man can have no conception of the joy that is to be found in belonging, though but momentarily and illusively, to the aristocracy of genius. To find the just word for all our emotions, to realise that our most trivial thought is illimitably creative, to feel that it is our lot to keep life's gladdest promises, to see the great souls of men and women, steadfast in existence as stars in a windless pool—these, indeed, are no ordinary pleasures. Moreover, these hours of our illusory greatness endow us in their passing with a melancholy that is not tainted with bitterness. We have nothing to regret; we are in truth the richer for our rare adventure. We have been permitted to explore the ultimate possibilities of our nature, and if we might not keep this newly-discovered territory, at least we did not return from our travels with empty hands. Something of the glamour lingers, something perhaps of the wisdom, and it is with a heightened passion, a fiercer enthusiasm, that we set ourselves once more to our life-long task of chalking pink salmon and pinker sunsets on the pavements of the world.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Last week I met an Englishman in the forest that starts outside Brussels and stretches for a long day's journey across the hills. We found a little café under the trees, and sat in the sun talking about modern English literature all the afternoon. In this way we discovered that we had a common standpoint from which we judged works of art, though our judgments differed pleasantly and provided us with materials for agreeable discussion. By the time we had divided three bottles of Gueze Lambic, the noble beer of Belgium, we had already sketched out a scheme for the ideal literary newspaper. In other words, we had achieved friendship.

When the afternoon grew suddenly cold, the Englishman led me off to tea at his house, which was half-way up the hill out of Woluwe. It was one of those modern country cottages that Belgian architects steal openly and without shame from their English confrères. We were met at the garden-gate by his daughter, a dark-haired girl of fifteen or sixteen, so unreasonably beautiful that she made a disillusioned journalist feel like a sad line out of one of the saddest poems of Francis Thompson. In my mind I christened her Monica, because I did not like her real name. The house, with its old furniture, its library, where the choice of books was clearly dictated by individual prejudices and affections, and its unambitious parade of domestic happiness heightened my melancholy. While tea was being prepared Monica showed me the garden. Only a few daffodils and crocuses were in bloom, but she led me to the rose-garden, and told me that in the summer she could pick a great basket of roses every day. I pictured Monica to myself, gathering her roses on a breathless summer afternoon, and returned to the house feeling like a battened version of the Reverend Laurence Sterne. I knew that I had gathered all my roses, and I thought regretfully of the chill loneliness of the world that lay beyond the limits of this paradise.

This mood lingered with me during tea, and it was not till that meal was over that the miracle happened. I do not know whether it was the Englishman or his wife that wrought the magic; or perhaps it was Monica, nibbling "speculations" with her sharp white teeth; but at all events I was led with delicate diplomacy to talk about myself, and I presently realised that I was performing the grateful labour really well. My words were warmed into life by an eloquence that is not ordinarily mine, my adjectives were neither commonplace nor far-fetched, my adverbs fell into their sockets with a sob of joy. I spoke of myself with a noble sympathy, a compassion so intense that it seemed divinely altruistic. And gradually, as the spirit of creation woke in my blood, I revealed, trembling between a natural sensitiveness and a generous abandonment of restraint, the inner life of a man of genius.

I passed lightly by his misunderstood childhood to concentrate my sympathies on the literary struggles of his youth. I spoke of the ignoble environment, the material hardships, the masterpieces written at night to be condemned in the morning, the songs of his heart that were too great for his immature voice to sing; and all the while I bade them watch the fire of his faith burning with a constant and quenchless flame. I traced the development of his powers, and instanced some of his poems, my poems, which I recited so well that they sounded to me, and I swear to them also, like staves from an angelic hymn-book. I asked their compassion for the man who, having such things in his heart, was compelled to waste his hours in sordid journalistic labours.

So by degrees I brought them to the present time, when, fatigued by a world that would not acknowledge the truth of his message, the man of genius was preparing to retire from life, in order to devote himself to the composition of five or six masterpieces. I described these masterpieces to them in outline, with a suggestive detail dashed in here and there to show how they would be finished. Nothing is easier than to describe unwritten literary masterpieces in outline; but by that time I had thoroughly convinced my audience and myself, and we looked upon these things as completed books. The atmosphere was charged with the spirit of high endeavour, of wonderful accomplishment. I heard the Englishman breathing deeply, and through the dusk I was aware of the eyes of Monica, the wide, vague eyes of a young girl in which youth can find exactly what it pleases.

It is a good thing to be great once or twice in our lives, and that night I was wise enough to depart before the inevitable anti-climax. At the gate the Englishman pressed me warmly by the hand and begged me to honour his house with my presence again. His wife echoed the wish, and Monica looked at me with those vacant eyes, that but a few years ago I would have charged with the wine of my song. As I stood in the tram on my way back to Brussels I felt like a man recovering from a terrible debauch, and I knew that the brief hour of my pride was over, to return, perhaps, no more. Work was impossible to a man who had expressed considerably more than he had to express, so I went into a café where there was a string band to play sentimental music over the corpse of my genius. Chance took me to a table presided over by a waiter I singularly detest, and the last embers of my greatness enabled me to order my drink in a voice so passionate that he looked at me aghast and fled. By the time he returned with my bock the tale was finished, and I tried to buy his toleration with an enormous pourboire.

No; I will return to that house on the hill above Woluwe no more, not even to see Monica standing on tip-toe to pick her roses. For I have left a giant's robe hanging on a peg in the hall, and I would not have those amiable people see how utterly incapable I am of filling it under normal conditions. I feel, besides, a kind of sentimental tenderness for this illusion fated to have so short a life. I am no Herod to slaughter babies, and it pleases me to think that it lingers yet in that delightful house with the books and the old furniture and Monica, even though I myself shall probably never see it again, even though the Englishman watches the publishers' announcements for the masterpieces that will never appear.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

"SINGAPURA"

BY SYDNEY M. ENGLISH

"SINGAPURA" knows many travellers; they come and go, pass into her gates and pass out again. But Singapore herself remains unchanged. Ceaseless the swirl of her rivers, changeless the tide of her seas, unsilenced the peal of her bells; she will remain, undaunted, the Lion-City for ever.

In Penang, and later at Port Swettenham—that perfervid port we visited for our sins—we caught our first glimpse of the East; or, stay, was it not as we wended our slow way along the Canal, as we viewed the red hills of the desert, in sight of that long line of dauntless pilgrims, marching, ever marching, to the goal of their desire, or the death which may overtake them on their way?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

But Singapore is not the East to us; it is not still enough. To and fro, to and fro swarm those units from the boats, crowding the streets, and filling the hotels. Time is of value in Singapore; tide and ships—even cargo-boats—when once their business is concluded, wait for no man.

"How long will it take me to see Singapore?" I asked my friend and guide. He looked at me doubtfully; he knew the East fairly well himself.

"You can see it in a couple of days," he said, at length, "or if not in that time, it will probably take years. I have been in Singapore three years myself and I do not know the place yet."

"Do as you will with me," I returned, "only show me what is real. The boat leaves again in three days' time."

So we did Singapore. Not as the average tourist "does" a place. Why should we? We had no time to waste. First—for we left the boat in the afternoon—we had tea at the cricket-club; then, as the hour grew near, we drove in rickshaws to that summer rendezvous of the residents of Singapore situate along the beach at Katong. Dinner here, underneath the cocoanut-trees, and then the lonely drive back again through the cocoanut plantation into the dark grove of banyan and mango trees. . . .

No lights on either side, only the elfish flames of fire-flies and glow-worms, like will-o'-the-wisps, illuminating this corner, now that, leading us on one moment but to leave us in a greater darkness the next. All is silence about us, a silence filled with mystery and life, broken here and there by the hoarse barking of a giant bull-frog, or the amorous call of the lizard.

Looking back, our faith must have been great in our sure-footed rickshaw-pullers who seemed to find their way along the rough path by instinct, or long habit, rather than by any sense of sight or hearing. Once on the open road again I sat up. "Where to now?" I asked. My guide smiled. "To China Town. I think it will interest you. It is—well, the real thing."

It was indeed. From Lavender Road—what a sweet name for so undeserving a district!—we made our way into the native quarters. It was growing late, though but few shops had shut yet. The smell of flaring oil floats mingled with aromatic joss-sticks and the lights from the spluttering wicks fell on the up-turned faces of Chinaman, Kling, Malay, Arab, and Parsee, giving an expression of almost ferocious grotesqueness to their usually expressionless countenances. And, as I tramped those uneven streets, finding my unaccustomed way over cobble stones where at home would be well-paved crossings, stepping blithely over wooden planks and railings, came my first vivid sense of the reality of the East. For the first time since my departure from the old country I could put out of my mind the artificiality of trumpery villages, streets of cardboard shops, and tinsel mosques offered for our enchantment at so-called Eastern Exhibitions at home; electric-lit Earl's Courts and coloured-fountained Shepherd's Bushes—comic operas of emerald-hued canvas and the like. The East, China and Japan, forsooth! This was something different.

"Oh," I sighed, "now I know. I can feel it——"

"What?"

A party of young Englishmen turned and glanced at me as I lifted my face. Very plainly I heard them say, though I do not think that their lips moved: "Out from home; a new chum."

"You are not disappointed?" asked my friend searchingly.

For a moment I did not answer. "Are people generally?" I returned then. But I knew his answer.

"I think they look for the wrong things. Come——"

And he dived into a native store, hung with rich, silken embroideries of every hue and design. The men in the shop eyed us lazily. "Don't they want to sell anything?" I whispered, when we had passed round the store unsolicited. Apparently they did not; or, at least, were accustomed to the ways of the overpowering white race who so casually turned over their goods with no intention of purchasing.

We next visited a working-jeweller, and admired the skill with which he manipulated the most primitive of tools no less than his quiet ignoring of our presence by his side. Here I was first initiated into the mysteries of the abacus, that wonderful counting-board used by the Chinese in their reckoning. Perhaps during my passage through China Town what struck me most was the lack of enthusiasm shown by the busy workers, their infinite patience and unflagging industry. So they go on day after day without rest, without holiday, save for that great festival the Chinese New Year.

Now out into the crowded road again, dodging rickshaws, motor-cars—generally driven and owned by Chinamen—and expert bullock-drivers, investigating the hawkers' stalls, so unlike anything we have ever seen in Western countries, on which dried particles of vegetables, meat, or fish, strung on a stick, are exposed for sale. Or steaming pots of other curious and unappetising concoctions, the contents of which we think it wiser not to investigate too closely. But at the corner of the road is gathered a larger crowd. Some one is doing a big trade there to-night, and as we make towards that group of eager shoppers our nostrils are assailed by an overpowering odour quite indescribable.

"Durian. . . ." muttered my companion. I looked at him, inquiringly. "Is that it?" I asked, thinking of all that I had heard about this wonderful fruit of the East. "But how can one ever like it?"

He shook his head. "Oh, it is an acquired taste and the fruit is not so bad when it is out of its shell, I believe. In fact folk say it is delicious when once you get used to it."

I was willing to take his word for that and quickened my footsteps, leaving that unsavoury corner almost at a run. We were just passing a Chinese temple and I asked eagerly if we might not enter one and see what it was like, but my companion overruled the suggestion.

"Not to-night," he said. "To-morrow we will go up to Johore, and you will see the celebrated place of worship there. Now I am going to take you to the "Europe;" I promised. And you will, besides, have an opportunity of sampling some of the strange beverages indigenous to this part of the world in particular."

At the "Europe" there was a ball in progress. A party of friends from another hotel soon joined us, and we found ourselves studying the cosmopolitan crowd of men and women gathered together—men of all nations, women of all climes. Even at hospitable little Monaco I have never met so many species of differing characteristics. Having already sampled a Number Dua, I resolutely refused the counter-attractions of Stengahs, Pahits, and the like, accepting instead what is commonly called by the American fraternity a "soft drink"—in this case a mild lime-squash. Those who have visited the East are no doubt familiar with these terms, and may have been, as I was, equally struck with their number and variety.

The next day we took the train to Johore. Here is the great Mosque visited by so many travellers; here are also the gambling-dens frequented by the Chinese and quite a sprinkling of the white population. An account of the games of chance practised would require an article at least, if not a volume, of considerable length.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

From the primitive little station of Woodlands we boarded the ferry which takes one across the narrow strait dividing Singapore from the Malay peninsula. Enthusiastic sportsmen will tell you that tigers have been known to swim this strait and land on the island, thus becoming a mark for their unerring guns. Be that as it may, I preferred to take their word for the presence of the tiger and the invincibility of our doughty sportsmen. I found my present experiences varied enough. As we approached the verandah of the Mosque a thrill of anticipation set my nerves tingling, and this was intensified later by the ceremony which must inevitably follow before permission is granted to tread those sacred floors.

"Remove your shoes," whispered my companion to me. And as I stopped to perform this act of homage the thrill that had struck through my being mounted until it pervaded my senses, filling me for a space with a strange sensation as of mental detachment. My bared feet touched the cold marble of the floors and a shiver ran through me. For a brief moment my thoughts turned longingly to the brilliant sunshine outside those walls, the blue of the skies and the free air. Then I recovered myself and marched forward at the bidding of the priest.

It was wonderful, of course, but it was also wonderfully disappointing. The effect of our surroundings was partially lost; the almost superstitious awe that seized us upon entering was fast evaporating; even the kneeling figures of the devotees praying to their Allah lost something of their impressiveness before a feeling of helpless weariness that now cooled our once ardent expectation. We glanced with something akin to despair at the tawdry decoration of the building, the tinsel, the cut-glass chandelier—imported from either Birmingham or Germany—clashing, how vividly, with the Oriental splendour of other portions of the Mosque interior.

An inquisitive inspection of the altar and incense-burners was not permitted, for the priest hurried us up the modern spiral stairway to the parapet of the roof above. From the dome of the building we caught a magnificent bird's-eye view of the surrounding country, including the Straits and Singapore. Here we also had a good sight of the Sultan's palace, and in the distance the Union Jack flying over the Residency was plainly visible. Just for a moment I fancied myself back in the old country again; a longing for England and home possessed me. Then a word recalled me to the present; slowly we made our way down the staircase again, donned our shoes, and entered the white, sun-baked streets once more.

Whilst sitting on the verandah of the hotel, before taking the ferry back to Singapore, we witnessed another interesting spectacle. A magnificent Mercédès car proclaimed the presence of the Sultan himself. The Sultan of Johore is a familiar figure, well known both East and West; as a man as well as a potentate he is a fine specimen of his race and worthy of notice.

But sight-seeing for the time being had nearly come to an end. Hot, infinitely weary, yet with a pleased sense of many pleasant memories stored for future sifting and appraising, I took farewell of those friends I had made on the island. The following morning, before re-embarkation, I devoted to shopping in the more civilised part of the town, and very good shops are to be found in Singapore. With renewed interest I marked the progress of the Chinaman at this great Doorway of the East, a progress as steady as it is unquestioned.

There is little doubt that had the Chinese been allowed to settle on the Rand, and had they been given equal liberty there, as in Singapore, they would have done in the Transvaal what they have done in this place—they would have crowded out the native in business as in labour, and, stepping over the heads of the white and black man alike, they would have acquired for themselves the monopoly in matters commercial. For Singapore is essentially a Chinese town to day; theirs is the capital and the labour, and Europeans do no fail to recognise this fact.

"Would you like to stay in Singapore?" some one asked me as I was leaving to join the boat en route for Hong Kong.

"Does any one ever like to stay in the East?" I asked. "Do they not come here to make money; to do the work of the moment, then return home to live and die?"

As I spoke I cast a last look round the old town, its white streets and uneven bizarre-looking buildings, picturesque even in unloveliness; its dark-skinned, gaily-clothed native population; its white-robed, white-skinned men and women. . . . "How tired one must get of white in Singapore—sometimes!" I thought. And at length I turned my gaze seaward. "Singapura," I murmured, "great City of the Lion"—for that, I believe, is the meaning of its ancient name"—"her gates are always open. Hers are the gates of the Far East, stretched wide to speed the parting guest, ever open to receive him when he comes back again, as assuredly he must one day."

For we all come back to Singapore, sooner or later.

FRENCH REVIEWS

"Le Mercure de France"

There is an abundance of good reading in the two April numbers of this well-written and enterprising review. Already in September last it printed many previously unpublished letters from Mérimée to his English friend Sutton Sharpe, and the issue for April 1st contains a further large batch of this vivacious correspondence which brings Mérimée so vividly before us. It shows him under all sorts of aspects—ordering English works on Architecture, setting out on one or another journey as Inspector-General of Historical Monuments, arranging dinner-parties with celebrities of all kinds, airing his dislike of Thiers, whose "History of the Consulate and the Empire" he declares to be so much "humbug" (sic), and in almost the same breath commenting on the policy of Earl Grey and Lord Althorpe and opening a secret credit of £20 on behalf of a feminine friend, in order that Sutton Sharpe may buy her a mantle and some stockings! We notice, by the way, that the name "Hawhins" frequently appears in these letters; we have not been able to identify the person referred to, but "Hawhins" must surely be a misprint for Hawkins, and the error should be rectified if the correspondence is reprinted in a volume.

Among the many able papers in this same number of Le Mercure is one by M. Serval appealing to all students of Balzac. It is the fruit of much investigation into the latter's novel, "La Rabouilleuse," most of the persons and places mentioned in which it identifies, thus showing how largely Balzac drew from the life. In the "Revue de la Quinzaine" there are several amusing anecdotes of Renan, of which here is a brief specimen: When Eugène Manuel was a candidate for the French Academy his worthy spouse made the usual visits to solicit the support of the members. "It will kill him if he is not elected," said she to Renan, who thereupon charitably promised her his vote. Manuel was not elected, however, and directly a fresh vacancy occurred his wife again called upon the Academicians. "Excuse me, madam," said Renan, rubbing his eyes when he saw her; "but I could have sworn that Monsieur Manuel was dead."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In Le Mercure for April 16th M. H. D. Davray, its reviewer of English literature, takes occasion to say some very kind things of THE ACADEMY, and to praise the independence of its literary criticism; in which connection M. Davray advises all his French confrères to read Mr. Cecil Cowper's recent "judicious and witty article" on Mr. Phillips Oppenheim, "whom people have tried to present to us in France as an interesting author." We will not quote M. Davray's own opinion of Mr. Oppenheim; our readers will find it for themselves in Le Mercure. To the same number of the review M. Paul Louis, who has long made the economic side of Roman history his special study, contributes an important article on "Le double Prolétariat antique," while other interesting papers are M. Borély's "Visite à J. H. Fabre"—the great but long unrecognised master of entomological science—and M. Marcel Fosseyeux's account of Abbé Blache, the priest whose name occurs so often in connection with the poisoning plots of the reign of Louis XIV.

"LA REVUE BLEUE"

In the issue of this popular periodical for April 1st M. Jacques Lux gives his readers a skilful précis of the interesting article on Olive Schreiner and her work which Mr. Frank Harris lately contributed to THE ACADEMY; and M. F. Caussy resumes the publication (begun last December) of Voltaire's letters to members of the Florian family, with which the great writer became connected by the marriage of one of his nieces. Although Voltaire describes himself in several of these epistles as a poor, bedridden old man suffering from fever, gout, and a convulsive cough, they abound in sprightly touches, showing that his wit remained as vivacious as ever, in spite of his increasing infirmities. "The English do not compose as many songs as we do," he writes on one occasion, "but they do their business a great deal better. The King of Prussia (Frederick the Great) does his better still." At another time he says, "There has been a 'revolution' in Luchet's fortune. . . . I am waiting for the 'revolution' at Paris. . . . A dog belonging to a Genevese has come and killed fifteen turkey cocks and six fat pullets in my farmyard. Those are the 'revolutions' which one experiences in the country." We should like to quote a good deal more, but have not space to do so. Still we will add that these letters abound in materials for a study of the real Voltaire such as no scholar has yet given us.

In La Revue Bleue for April 8th, M. Paul Louis, to one of whose contributions to Le Mercure de France we have already referred, supplies an illuminating sketch of class struggles in republican and imperial Rome; while the number for April 15th contains the first part of a recent lecture by M. Raymond Poincaré, of the French Academy, in which he rightly rehabilitates the formerly contemned Jules Ferry, who was really one of the ablest statesmen the Third Republic has possessed. In the same Revue Bleue M. Paul Matter, who has undertaken the attractive task of showing how much many great men have owed to their mothers, gives a delightful account of Adèle de Sellon, who became the mother of Cavour. It is certain that she greatly influenced him for good in the crisis of his early manhood. She roused him from the despair into which he was plunged by an unhappy infatuation, and weaned him from an inordinate passion for gambling; and his letters show that, in after-life, when he was accomplishing great things for his country, he attributed to her affection, influence, and teaching all that was best and worthiest in him. Happy the mothers with such sons, and the sons with such mothers!

E. A. V.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

THE EMPIRE AND WORLD POLITICS

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

ATTENTION has recently been drawn to the need for a free interchange of ideas with our Dominions beyond the seas, aimed at shaping what is termed an Imperial Foreign Policy, and the Government have been urged to give full facilities for a discussion on the subject at the coming Conference. It is suggested that some concrete scheme should be prepared which would enable Colonial Governments to keep constantly in touch with the Foreign Office. Proceeding even farther, Mr. Guinness, during the debate in the House of Commons, boldly advocated the creation of a portfolio of Imperial Affairs. The Government believe that the subject will arise naturally in the course of the debate on the question of Imperial Defence, and they have given a promise that no useful information shall be withheld from the Conference. It is obvious that a discussion of this kind must be conducted under the cloak of secrecy. Therefore, to a large extent, the assurances of the Government that the matter will be adequately dealt with must be accepted. Unless, however, a permanent plan be devised for the admission of our Colonies to the confidential deliberations of Downing Street, then the forthcoming Conference will have failed in its most important duty.

At the same time it must be confessed that the obstacles to be met with in the elaboration of an Imperial foreign policy are more formidable than would appear to be the case at first glance. The gathering of Premiers at intervals of four years in the capital of the Empire would not in itself seem to provide the ideal medium for an exchange of views on high policy. To all who are acquainted with the sensitiveness of diplomacy it is clear that extreme care must be exercised in devising a means of discussing this supremely important subject over so wide a sphere as the Empire. Among the various solutions suggested has been the raising of the status of the Agents-General to something like that possessed by Ambassadors or Ministers Plenipotentiary. At present their mission, which is to promote commerce between the Mother Country and her colonies, is not without its less tangible, though equally important, objects, and their zealous services are undeniably of great value to the cause of Imperial unity. But we may with reason doubt whether our international relations would benefit by the presence in the capital of a sort of Advisory Council of Colonial Diplomatic Representatives such as that which is proposed in some quarters. It is not so much any antagonism that may exist in the minds of our official class in regard to so startling an innovation into diplomatic procedure as the possible effect it might be calculated to exercise upon our relations with other countries that must be carefully weighed.

A wise and accepted rule of statecraft decrees that nothing shall be done to impair the authority of the Minister of the Crown who is responsible for the conduct of foreign affairs. Other countries realise that in negotiating with Sir Edward Grey, or whoever may occupy his office at the moment, they are dealing with a single individual in whose personality is reposed the interests of the British Empire, and whose word is that of the British Empire. Moreover, they communicate to him information on the understanding and with the knowledge that it shall not pass outside the portals of Downing Street. The Foreign Secretary has, of course, a staff of departmental advisers—men possessing expert knowledge of the problems of different parts of the world—and to this staff it might prove distinctly advantageous to add a number of permanent Colonial advisers. But it is beyond question that the raising of Agents-General to the diplomatic status would be looked upon abroad with something akin to dismay. Similar objections are to be urged against the creation of a Minister for Imperial Affairs, whose principal task, it is understood, would be to act as a medium for bringing foreign policy into line with Colonial sentiment. The functions of such an office could not fail to clash with that paramount authority which must be secured to the Foreign Secretary if, as representing the British Empire, he is to pursue a safe and, at the same time, a consistent course of action. Yet there is urgent need that something be done to serve the aims of Imperial unity by devising a method of giving effect to an Imperial foreign policy. The utterance of the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who stated that "one did not want to say beforehand what would be of interest and what would not, but one could imagine that South Africa was not particularly interested in Servia or Montenegro," does not disclose a remarkably enthusiastic attitude towards the coming Conference. Were Great Britain to become involved in complications over the Near East, then it is sincerely to be hoped that South Africa would be very much interested in that part of the world. No greater disservice could be rendered to the cause of patriotism than to preach the doctrine of "water-tight compartments" as applied to Imperial interests. Were this principle to guide the administration of our over-sea Dominions each Colony would be for itself, and the dismemberment of the Empire would become imminent.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is the maintenance and the development of the true Imperial idea, the interdependence of Great Britain and the Colonies, that should be advocated. The British Government must recognise that the Colonies have a stake in our foreign policy, and are anxious to be given an opportunity of taking their part in its fulfilment. If their wishes in this respect are met, then they will realise that the heart of the British Empire, of which they are the limbs, lies in Europe, and their views will broaden so as to enable them to show a lively interest in the affairs of Europe—affairs which directly affect themselves because they are of concern to England—the headquarters of Empire. Nor, with a more intimate exchange of opinions, will it be possible for Downing Street to overlook the trend of Colonial policy. There is, unfortunately, abundant evidence that at present our conduct of foreign relations is utterly at cross-purposes with Colonial legislation. Speaking at Toronto in 1907, Sir Wilfrid Laurier declared that—"Our diplomatic relations carried on by the British Government have not been so successful as we could have wished them to be. If we take the record of diplomacy of Great Britain, so far as Canada is concerned, it has been a sacrifice of Canadian interests." As the aspect of the question to which Sir Wilfrid Laurier alludes is of supreme importance, and, owing to the limitations of space, cannot be satisfactorily dealt with here, I will return to the subject next week.

FEZ—AND AFTER.

Anarchy once more reigns in Morocco. A French flying column is marching on besieged Fez, where, anxiously awaiting relief, there are a number of foreigners, including several English ladies. The German Press has seized upon the occasion to indulge in captious criticism of French policy. Happily, however, the German Government takes the sane view that, where foreign lives are imperilled, military measures, within the provisions of the Act of Algeciras, are fully justified. France has been expressly invited by Mulai Hafid to take action. Having once entered the field on his behalf, it will not be easy to restrict the sphere of operations. To restore anything like a state of widespread and abiding tranquillity such as to render the Sultan's throne secure would be a long, hazardous, and expensive undertaking. The French forces will, of course, relieve Fez in a few days, but the question may well be asked: "After Fez, what then?" The German attitude is that of "waiting to see."

DAVID RICARDO*

Professor Hollander's monograph is in many ways a valuable contribution to a better understanding of a remarkable worker in a science little known to the world in his time. It specially emphasises the notable fact, with many admirable instances, that the output of David Ricardo's labours in economic research was drawn from the actualities which crowded round him in his capacity of financier and business-man. This point is the more important to remember in these days, as the tendency of many a party-ridden controversialist is to stigmatise—even as it was in the time of the Father of the Deductive Method—any chamber-philosopher, however accurate his conclusions may be or however closely his reasoning may be corroborated by the observations and records of the workers in the fields of industry and commerce. The author has done well, in view of the wrong impression which has so long prevailed concerning Ricardo's mental equipment, method, and attitude, to divide his book into three distinct yet illuminatingly interlinked sections—the life, the work, the influence of the great thinker. Each of these essays is indispensable for a just and correct interpretation of the man, of the writer in some degree, or at any rate of what should be the world's estimate of his labours.

Nevertheless it should be borne in mind that Professor Hollander, though a careful and conscientious critic, is in some sense the intellectual victim of the very mistaken conclusions of the teacher he so eloquently upholds. That Ricardo thought soundly and clearly on most points any one with an unfettered conception of the economic laws and their subtle workings would unstintingly admit. It must not be overlooked or ignored, however, that Ricardo, like many another valiant searcher after truth of his own and other times, suffered under the domination of the Currency Theories, even as many economists, in other respects sound, suffer to-day. Professor Hollander, though in the course of his work he is not slow to point out one or two minor mistakes committed by Adam Smith, fails to draw attention to the one fatal, though forgivable, fallacy for which that great master of the science was responsible—namely, the statement that the prosperity of a country depends on the circulation of the "currency" or money, a statement which has led to endless confusion and paved the way to the retrogression from which we suffer to-day. Of course, had Adam Smith lived in these days he would probably have never allowed himself to be sponsor to such a palpable error, for he would have seen that "currency" or "money" plays the least significant part in the workings of financial, commercial, and industrial activity, and that it would play even a paltrier part in relation to credit—that most potent instrument of production—if the arbitrary State prohibitions and restrictions in all civilised communities regarding credit and banking were removed. It is natural enough, in the first instance, that such a fallacy should have been committed and, to a certain extent, pardonable that it should have been perpetuated. But are we to be ever the slaves of authority-worship and to allow ourselves to endorse the mistakes of our greatest men because of their infallibility in other respects? The time has surely come when such an error should be expunged for ever from the text-books, and the general bewilderment it has engendered set at rest.

* David Ricardo: a Centenary Estimate. By Jacob H. Hollander, Professor of Political Economy in the Johns Hopkins University. (The Johns Hopkins Press, Baltimore. $1.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Had Professor Hollander broken away from this dominating error in economics, he would have saved himself much trouble and his readers greater puzzlement in facing the long drawn-out and meticulous arguments on a variety of subjects running through his book—a work which is characterised by a sound spirit of research, a thorough mastery of a mass of data, and, wherever dubious points are avoided, written throughout with a praiseworthy clearness.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

THE account which has just ended has not been altogether pleasant. Indeed it has brought many disappointments. We cannot always go on buying shares and never paying for them; sooner or later the money-lender steps in. As a result some of those whose credit was weak have been squeezed out. In many stocks the fall has been serious. It is quite possible that we may see the liquidation continued through another account. Yet everybody is confident that the set-back is only temporary.

The Morocco question has cropped up again, and assumes, as usual, that mysterious air which is so inseparable from Eastern diplomacy. It is difficult to get at the exact truth, but it is quite clear from the tone of the German papers that the despatch of French troops will be made the excuse to extort favours from the Quai D'Orsay. Although nothing serious is either expected or intended, the incident is disquieting. It has had the effect of causing nervous people on the Continent to sell Consols, and it has also created a bear account in our premier security.

The Supreme Court again declined to give any decision in the Trust cases, and this kept the Yankee market dull and lifeless. Americans do not now influence the City, but there is usually some business doing, and this has quite faded away. The Rubber Sales added to the depression, and the bears seized the opportunity to hammer the leading shares, without gaining very much by their courage.

There has been a variety of new companies put before us. The much-talked-of Porcupine issue has been made. The policy of giving no details in the prospectus and relying upon the prestige of the promoters and those associated with them may prove profitable, and we are told that very wonderful news is ready to be published as soon as the allotment is made. This is a curious method; we shall watch the effect with some interest. The British Empire Trust have brought out their Lumber Company, and, as Sir William MacKenzie is on the board, it will probably go; but the security is vague, and no one can say that a debenture is the proper name to apply to such stock. Messrs. Chaplin, Milne, Grenfell and Company have given us the Cotton Merger, in which Dominion Textile plays a leading part. These people are clever, and will probably make Canadian cotton go. The Papua Produce Company was an absurd concern, over which we need waste no words. It had not one good point to recommend it.

There are a few companies being prepared, but they do not require any mention. The Cessnock Collieries failed to meet with any favour, and the Grahame White Bleriot Aeroplane Company also returned its money. Whilst on the subject of aeroplanes I may mention a private company in which the Marquess of Tullibardine, Earl Fitzwilliam, the Duke of Westminster, Mr. Leopold de Rothschild, Colonel Capper, and others are interested. These subscribers found money for Mr. Dunne to build an "automatic stability" aeroplane, which was tried before Orville Wright and Griffith Brewer and secured a testimonial from them. It is claimed that this machine remains stable in the air, and that the stability depends not upon levers, but upon the geometrical shape. The members of the syndicate now propose to increase their capital and build machines. The public are not, however, invited to assist; but I mention the company because, perhaps, some day the Dunne Aeroplane may be heard of, and because the names of the subscribers are not people usually associated with company matters.

MONEY is now becoming much easier, and as soon as the Government releases the public funds we may expect to see a long period of cheap money. This will have a great effect upon the Stock Exchange, and prices of all securities will rise. Consols have been kept down through the fancied trouble in Morocco, but when that cloud has passed they will go up.

FOREIGNERS, at any rate as far as the London Stock Exchange is concerned, have been without movement. There have been a few bargains done in Perus, but nothing else. Russians are quite lifeless. Japanese Stocks were moved up a shade on the settlement, but it was not a concerted move, merely the automatic adjustment of the account.

GUAYAQUIL AND QUITO.—The excitement in these bonds culminated in a big rise. Mr. Cooper has come home from New York and has brought good news. He will now have the backing of a strong American banker, and behind this banker will stand the American Government. The bondholders in this railway have suffered many disappointments, but they now look as though they had got upon firm ground.

MEXICAN RAILS have been sold and bought just as the news from Mexico is good or bad. But the fluctuations show that holders are very nervous, and as there is a great deal of stock pawned with the banks a fall seems to me much more certain than a rise. People buy Mexican Rails as a gamble, and they therefore desire to take a profit sooner or later. As a rule such gamblers all try to get out at the same moment.

HOME RAILS.—The bull account here is still much too large, and the dealers have been busy shaking out the weak bulls. Brighton A, which is of course a great gambling counter, has suffered severely, and there has been a heavy fall. But all Railway Stocks have been weak the whole of the account. Dealers have been short, and they have again and again bought back. This has kept the market much firmer than it would otherwise have been had not a professional bear account existed side by side with a huge public bull account. I do not think that the fall has ended yet. Intrinsically all our leading Home Railways are sound investments, but intrinsic merits have nothing to do with the fluctuations of the market. Those who wish to secure sound 4 per cent. gilt-edged investments—such as London and North Western, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire—must wait a few weeks, when they will be able to buy at some points lower down than if they bought to-day.

YANKEES are flat, stale, and unprofitable. The big houses are now saying that they think the time has come to buy. But I do not think that there is any hurry. The news from New York is not reassuring. There is plenty of money for sound securities, but none for speculation. The trade in the West is not good, and although many people are talking big, they are only the notorious optimists who always "talk good." The wise and cautious are not so confident. The Missouri Pacific fiasco has done much to destroy confidence. Kuhn Loeb and Co. are a house of the highest standing. They have been treated with great discourtesy, to put it mildly. I cannot help thinking that they will one day take their revenge. Steels are dull because people have got it into their heads that New York has unloaded on Europe. But probably most of the stock is only pawned, and will go back to Wall Street when required. It is hardly likely that such a huge transference could have taken place as that which appears on the books.

RUBBERS have been as dull as ditch-water, and so dull did they appear on Tuesday that the bear brigade banged the market as hard as they could. This brought in Mincing Lane, and the result was a small battle, in which the Lane won. But prices in the rubber market are still a few shillings too high. The reports as they appear each day are good, but not brilliant, and the public is beginning to see that those who talked of working costs being got down to 6d. and 9d. were talking without knowing what they said. The Consolidated Malay report showed that costs are going up, not down. As labour becomes scarcer, so will costs rise. There is a huge labour supply in the East, but wages for efficient men have a tendency to rise all the time. However, the time is coming when the rubber market should be watched. It will soon be the time to buy.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Oil.—The Oil people have been busy. The account shows a bull account, but this will not stop the oil gamblers, and prices are very steady. But they cannot push Black Sea Oilfields over 35s., and probably Tweedy is placing shares at this price. His company is one of the best on the Maikop field, and now that he has the chance of getting as much money as he wants he will be able to make the Black Sea Oilfields the premier producer. It has good wells, and should have good management, for Tweedy knows oil from A to Z. Great care should be used in buying Maikop shares, and I do not like to advise any but Black Sea, Maikop Pipes, and Maikop Spies. I should also add that purchases to-day on the top of a bull market are likely to show a loss.

Kaffirs are very tired, and holders do not care to average. There have been many heavy losses both here and in France. But the weak bulls have been shaken out, and if the magnates could only combine we might see a rise. But I am always saying this. The reports as they arrive are not bad. I wish I could be more enthusiastic, but I cannot. The Knight Central has had a shortage of labour, but if it can get hands it may do better this year than last. The shares are cheap, the life of the mine is long, and as a lock-up Knights Central has attractions.

Rhodesians have been banged by the market upon every occasion, and there is not a dealer who is not short. For this reason I fancy we may see a rise. First, Lonely was put up on good news coming upon the top of a short supply of shares. Then we get good news from Shamva, which was considered a low-grade mine, and has now one-ounce stuff. The Rho X circular was also reassuring. Jumbos are also cheap at 10s. This mine will soon be out of its poor zone and into the rich ore. The Rhodesian Market may amuse us one day by a big jump.

Miscellaneous.—It looks very much as though the bottom were out of the Omnibus boom. The settlement between L.G.O. and Vanguard has been agreed upon, and this gives no one anything to go for now. Therefore the bulls want to get out as quick as they can. Cements have also been weak. But here the market is in such strong hands that another rise may be engineered.

Raymond Radclyffe.

CORRESPONDENCE

THE POWER OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—Attention has lately been called in several cases to the despotic action of Government Departments. It has been the comfortable belief that Departments worked by permanent officials would be sufficiently independent not to be materially affected by the political opinions of their temporary Ministerial chief; and, with the difficulty at the present time of getting attention given to detail, Acts are passed giving wide powers to Departments in the pious hope that judicial discretion would be exercised in their practice.

Apart from Ministerial influence, there is a dangerous growth within Departments in their attitude to the public. The Departments should exist for the service of the community; but now a Department considers it exists for itself and the community is subject to it. The same spirit that caused Empson and Dudley to be execrated in the time of Henry VII. (and brought them to the block in his successor's reign) exists now in our Inland Revenue; but the axe is put away in the Tower. The Commissioners' attitude is that they exist to collect taxes, but they do not in the least care to what expense, worry, and trouble people are put to in the collection. Yet they yield when pressure is strong enough. (As an instance take the facilities given to the Stock Exchange for stamping documents compared with the powers available to other persons.)

A new danger arises out of the provisions relating to super-tax. The Act gives power to the Commissioners to require every person to make a return of the whole of his income from all sources. In the debate it was stated that the clause was not intended to be for inquisitorial purposes, that persons enjoying £5,000 a year were pretty well known, and returns would only be required of these. But the Act does not say so; and the Commissioners this second year are now feeling their way, not for the purpose of levying super-tax, but for the compilation of a great Domesday Book of personal estate. Such a record would be too vast a matter to do all at once. A beginning was made in 1907, as usual insidiously, in the guise of a benefit to people earning income. Before that time a man made a return of his earned income, but the revenue had no record whatever of his income from investments taxed at their source. The Revenue wanted this; so when there was a chance of reducing income-tax from the war-rate the reduction was confined to earned income on the condition that the whole income was under £2,000, which involved the disclosure of the amount of income from investments. Now the Revenue Commissioners are beginning to use the super-tax powers to force disclosure by persons who either do not earn income or otherwise do not avail themselves of a claim to the rebate. It is rather significant that they are starting with old people. In my own limited circle there have been three cases—two widows and a man, all over seventy years, living retired lives, comfortably, but very quietly. Any inquiry would have dissipated the idea of these old people having £5,000 a year. Yet each has received a registered letter requiring a return to be made, and their attention drawn that a penalty of £50 a day may be imposed, and that a misstatement is punishable by imprisonment without the option of a fine. These good people were at first fairly frightened until relatives took their returns in hand.

The object of the Revenue is clear. High death-duties tempt old people to make gifts—the Commissioners mean to know what the income now is. Therefore, to guard against a possibility of there arising an intention of evasion—not an actual evasion—they worry old people, and put them to expense besides, in compiling a statement of their income under different heads. The authorities will have all the matter of the official form. No declaration of total income will do, no offer of examination of account-books or bank-books is tolerated.

It will probably be said that details of investments will not be required, only the total sums of income received under various heads. This is so—at present; but the Commissioners expressly reserve the right to have details. To demand everything at once would clearly cause too great an outcry, and the Commissioners can only gradually increase their staff. But it will come in time, and meanwhile the total sums under different heads are serviceable for worrying executors with inquisitions.

So far complaint has only here been made on the ground of expense, trouble, and dislike to inquisition. But there is politically a great danger ahead. Tyrannies are always vindictive, whether tyrannies of kings, oligarchies, or democracies. We have seen how the brewery trade, because they became too identified as supporters of one political party, were marked down for excessive and punitive taxation by the other; so with landlords. When the Domesday Personal Property Book is compiled, it will be open to any Chancellor of the Exchequer to see how the well-known wealthy supporters of the other side have invested their wealth. Is it fanciful to fear that where there are large holdings so held in any industry these will also be marked for taxation? To confiscate the investment of an opponent is no new maxim to an autocrat. The President of the Board of Trade has already proclaimed his ideal is to know how a man's wealth is acquired.

We are comfortably assured of oaths of secrecy, and no general disregard thereof is here imputed. But apart from the genial, unconscious gossip, and that other man vain in the possession of accurate information, and loving truth too dearly to let misstatement pass, the chances of leakage are not few. It is not the case of one office where really confidential papers come before the heads alone. Every Surveyor of Taxes has his staff, and these are loose units held together by no bond. But it is these thousands of clerks all over the kingdom, as well as at headquarters, before whom come the confidential papers of income-tax returns. Familiarity always produces indifference, and what is in the daily round seems trivial and of no importance, yet vital to the individual. However honourable the body as a whole, it is contrary to human experience to expect that none will be found wanting, whether from carelessness, forgetfulness, or pressure, or merely just to oblige.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The crude attempt to destroy by legislation that which has grown and become regarded politically as an evil often results in concentrating the evil. The avowed aim now is to disperse "capital;" but, granted that a trust by its wealth, influence, and skilled agents can get information as to private resources, what a strengthened position it would hold in a fight for a trade monopoly against individual traders in any district. To know what the other side has in reserve by way of private investments beyond ostensible trade capital would be the key of the problem of attack, and such a key would be forged by the new Domesday Book of Personalty.

It would be of interest to know what directions have been given as to persons to be required to make a return, or whether the Super-tax Commissioners are their own rule-makers.—Yours obediently,

W. E. Tyer.

5, Brunswick Gardens, London, W., April 21st, 1911.

A QUERY.

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—At the suggestion of Mr. Campbell, a brother of the preacher in the City Temple, London, I venture to write you to make inquiry whether or not an old book in my possession would have special value as an old work in the London market.

It is a commentary of Martin Luther on the Epistle to the Galatians. Enclosed you will please find a type-written copy of the title-page. On another sheet are the size of the end and side of the book. It is in its original binding—tanned leather. The letters of the title-page are ordinary English, but the book is in Old English letters. Evidently it has not been used much; it is perfect, not damaged in any way.

I have knowledge of another book, A.D. 1564. Its side size and title-page you will find enclosed. It is a little thicker than Luther's book, and is bound in vellum, binding and text good. It seems in no way damaged.

I shall count it a great favour if you will indicate the value of each of these books as old works in the London market.—Very truly yours,

E. M. Saunders.

Halifax, Nova Scotia, Canada, April 8th, 1911.

A COMMEN

TARIE OF M. DOCTOR

Martin Lvther vpon the Epistle.

of St. Paul to the Galathians, first collected and gathered word by word out of his preaching, and now out of Latine faithfully translated into English for the vlearned.

Wherein is set forth most excellently the glorious riches of Gods grace, and the power of the Gospell, with the difference betweene the Law and the Gospell, and strength of Faith declared; to the joyful comfort and conformation of all true Christian beleeurs, especially such as inwardly being afflicted and grieved in conscience, do hunger and thirst for instification in Christ Iesu. For whose cause most chiefly this booke is translated and printed, and dedicated to the same.

"My power is made perfect through weakness." 2 Cor. 12. 9.

London,
Imprinted by Richard Field dwelling in the Blacke-
Friers by Ludgate,
1603.

"MARRIAGE AND COMMON SENSE."

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—The Academy's reputation for the excellence and fairness of its reviews is so universally recognised that any exception to the rule calls for some comment. I venture, with all due deference to the ability of your reviewer of Mr. Cecil Chapman's book, "Marriage and Divorce," to suggest that his strong and wholesale condemnation of the book in question is both uncalled for and unfair. I pass by the personal references to the writer, such as "he talks freely of immorality as if he knew what it meant," and "Who is Mr. Chapman to dismiss Islam and China and Japan as nests of immorality? One may strain the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Magistrate too far"—only remarking that it is, I am glad to say, the exception rather than the rule for a reviewer to enter into personalities. Mr. Chapman makes reference to the fact that amongst the Jews of Bombay there is absolute freedom of divorce by consent for both sexes, and its effect upon conduct is such that divorce never, in fact, takes place. Your reviewer calls in question Mr. Chapman's conclusion that because such freedom exists amongst the Jews of Bombay divorce amongst them is practically unknown, and summarily dismisses such reasoning as a reductio ad absurdum. He seems to me, however, entirely to fail in establishing the logic of his own reasoning. I venture to believe that the majority of your readers will be disposed to give colour to Mr. Chapman's argument, certainly without the merest attempt at calling it "extremely vicious." I do not hesitate to say, too, that Mr. Chapman's further suggestion that "greater individual freedom invariably creates a greater sense of individual responsibility," which your reviewer characterises as equally ridiculous, is an established fact which is generally recognised by all who rightly understand the meaning of both freedom and responsibility respectively. Even in the case of the most unlettered one constantly sees how, given individual freedom, there almost always is discernible in the possessor of it a simultaneous recognition of the personal responsibility which it involves.

I must not encroach further upon your valuable space, and I do not attempt to touch upon the pros and cons put forth for establishing greater facilities for divorce. My one object in writing was to take exception to your reviewer's criticisms, which liberty I presume you would allow to any reader, and to say that I do not consider any other reader of the book in question would arrive at the same conclusions, and so summarily dismiss the author's arguments as being devoid of the first principles of common logic.—Yours, &c.,

R. W.-S.

Royal Societies Club, April 24th.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Land of Promises. By Stanley Portal Hyatt. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.

The King Over the Water; or, The Marriage of Mr. Melancholy. By Justin Huntly McCarthy. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.

The Bread Upon the Waters. By Georgette Agnew. Wm. Heinemann. 6s.

Two Girls and a Mannikin. By Wilkinson Sherren. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

Justus Wise. By Alfred Wilson-Barrett. Frontispiece. Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.

Oh! for an Angel. By Marguerite Curtis. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

The Green Wave of Destiny. By Philippa Bridges. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

A Charity Girl. By Effie A. Rowlands. Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.

The Price of Empire. By E. Hobart-Hampden. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

Bushland Stories. By Amy E. Mack. With Coloured Illustrations. Angus and Robertson, Sydney, N.S.W.; and Australian Book Co., London. 3s. 6d.

The Last Galley: Impressions and Tales. By A. Conan Doyle. Illustrated. Smith, Elder, and Co. 6s.

Mon Oncle Benjamin. By C. Tillier. Coloured Frontispiece. T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.

Paul et Virginie. By Bernardin de Saint-Pierre. Coloured Frontispiece. T. Nelson and Sons. 1s. net.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

What Matters. By Mercedes Macandrew. Chapman and Hall. 6s.

The One Way Trail. By Ridgwell Cullum. Chapman and Hall. 6s.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

A General Sketch of Political History from the Earliest Times. By Arthur D. Innes. Rivingtons. 6s.

George Bernard Shaw: his Life and Works. A Critical Biography. (Authorised.) By Archibald Henderson, M.A., Ph.D. Illustrated. Hurst and Blackett. 21s. net.

Irish Affairs and the Home Rule Question. A Comparison of the Attitude of Political Parties towards Irish Problems. By Philip G. Cambray. With an Introduction by the Marquess of Londonderry, K.G. John Murray. 3s. 6d. net.

John Burns: the Rise and Progress of a Right Honourable. By Joseph Burgess. With Portraits. Reformers' Bookstall, Glasgow.

Histoire Critique de la Grande Entreprise de Christophe Colomb. By Henry Vignaud. Vol. I., 1476-1490. Vol. II.,1491-1493. H. Welter, Paris. 30fr. the 2 volumes.

A Woman of the Revolution: Théroigne de Méricourt. By Frank Hamel. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 16s. net.

Nouveaux Récits des Temps Révolutionnaires d'après des Documents Inédits. By Ernest Daudet. Hachette and Co. 3fr. 50c.

English Elements in Jonson's Early Comedy. By Charles Read Baskervill. Published by the University of Texas, Austin, Texas, U.S.A.

Karl Lebrecht Immermann: a Study in German Romanticism. By Allen Wilson Porterfield, Ph.D. Columbia University Press, N.Y.

The Shakespeare Revival and the Stratford-upon-Avon Movement. By Reginald R. Buckley, &c. Illustrated. George Allen and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

The Amazing Emperor Heliogabalus. By J. Stuart Hay. With an Introduction by Professor J. B. Bury, Litt.D. Illustrated. Macmillan and Co. 8s. 6d. net.

Ruskin: a Study in Personality. By A. C. Benson. Smith, Elder, and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

The Life of George Joachim Goschen, First Viscount Goschen, 1831-1907. By the Hon. Arthur D. Elliot. 2 Vols. With Portraits. Longmans, Green, and Co. 25s. net.

A Popular Story of the Church of England. By G. H. F. Nye. George Allen and Sons. 1d.

The Life, Trial, and Death of Francisco Ferrer. By William Archer. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.

EDUCATIONAL

La Jacquerie. By Prosper Mérimée. With Notes, &c. (Siepmann's French Series.) Macmillan and Co. 1s.

Le Tailleur de Pierres de Saint-Pont. By Alphonse de Lamartine. With Notes, &c. (Siepmann's French Series.) Macmillan and Co. 1s.

A School Algebra. Part II. With Answers. By H. S. Hall, M.A. Macmillan and Co. 1s. 6d.

Modern Commercial Practice, with Correspondence. Part II.—The Export and Import Trade. By F. Heelis. Macmillan and Co. 2s. 6d.

MISCELLANEOUS

An Eastern Miscellany. By the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P. Wm. Blackwood and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.

Prosperous Agriculture and Home Life: What it Means to the Nation. By F. W. Wateridge. Illustrated. Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 2s. 6d. net

Triumphs and Wonders of Modern Chemistry. A Popular Treatise on Modern Chemistry and its Marvels, written in Non-Technical Language for General Readers and Students. By Geoffrey Martin, B.Sc. Illustrated. Sampson Low and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

Some Supposed Shakespeare Forgeries. An Examination into the Authenticity of certain Documents affecting the Dates of Composition of Several of the Plays. By Ernest Law, B.A., F.S.A. With Facsimiles of Documents. G. Bell and Sons. 3s. 6d. net.

Éléments de Phonétique Générale. By Léonce Roudet. Illustrated. H. Welter, Paris. 10f.

Chrysanthemums. By Richard Dean, V.M.H. Illustrated. London Agricultural and Horticultural Association. 1d.

The Common Sense of Home Rule. A Reply to Lord Hugh Cecil by John M. Robertson, M.P. P. S. King and Son. 6d. net.

The Pocket Gladstone. Selections from his Writings and Speeches compiled by J. Aubrey Rees. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. Sir Algernon West, P.C. Mills and Boon. 1s. net.

The Master's Advent. A Prologue by Everard Wyrall. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

My Favourite Books. By Robert Blatchford. Clarion Press. 7d.

THEOLOGY

The Life of Christ. By the Very Rev. Alexander Stewart, D.D. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6d. net.

St. John and his Work. By the Rev. Canon Benham, D.D. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6d. net.

Connection between Old and New Testaments. By the Rev. G. Milne Rae, D.D. J. M. Dent and Sons. 6d.

VERSE

Contemporary Belgian Poetry. Selected and Translated by Jethro Bithell. Walter Scott Publishing Co. 1s.

The Gardens of Gray's Inn, and Other Verses. By Christian Tearle. Longmans, Green and Co. 5s. net.

PERIODICALS

Atlantic Monthly; Indian Review; United Empire; Mind; Smith's Magazine; American Journal of Mathematics; The Literary Digest; Ainslee's Magazine; Cambridge University Reporter; Bookseller; Publishers' Circular; Revue Bleue; Edinburgh Review; Journal of the Anthropological Society of Bombay; Book Buyer.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
. . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)
Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.
For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——
• • •
For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

Now Ready. Price 6d. The April
BOOK MONTHLY.

Contents:

PERSONAL AND PARTICULAR. The Swing of the Pendulum in the World of Letters.

DICKENS'S LOVE STORY. Full News of the Letters to his Friend, Henry Kolle.—By B. W. Matz.

A LONDON LETTER. On Topics Concerning Current English Books and Authorship.

APRIL ALL SORTS. The Plots and People of Six Recent Stories.

A TWO-FOLD BIOGRAPHY. Charming Mrs. Craigie and Gifted John Oliver Hobbes.

THE BIBLE TERCENTENARY. The Moving Story of the Book of English Books.

THE BOOK NEWSMAN. Current Events and Comments Possessing a Literary Interest.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY. Particulars of Interesting Volumes Likely to be Published this Month.

BOOKS OF THE MONTH. A Chronicle of the Noteworthy Publications of March, with a Reviewing Commentary.

THE PERIODICALS. Contents of some April Reviews and Magazines.

Illustrated Supplement: BOOKS OF THE DAY IN PORTRAIT AND PICTURE.

Note the Dickens Article, and do not fail to get the APRIL BOOK MONTHLY, which is published by Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.
(Royal Charter dated 1839.)
Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—
ARGENTINA & BRAZIL
via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.
WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.
From LONDON to—
MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,
EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)
For further particulars apply to
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY
18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

No. 2035 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MAY 6, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY, THE PA. STATE COLLEGE, STATE COLLEGE, PA

THE ECONOMICAL

AN EXAMPLE.

Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Sheffield Simplex

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—

"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.

"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.

TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.

SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE Co., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGES ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.

Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.

Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest Referenees. Telephone: 82 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

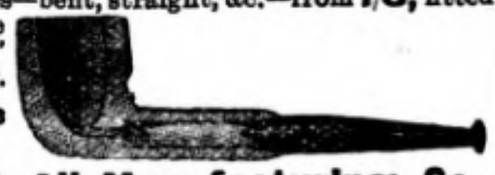
MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.



Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific MSS. carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science). Translations from French and German.

GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

YOUNG AUTHORS.—Success in journalism. Full criticism and advice for publication given by literary and journalistic experts. Full particulars, write J. Murray, Leylands, Wells, Norfolk.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

HOW TO WRITE FOR THE PRESS OR TO BECOME AN AUTHOR.

Interesting and useful Booklet free.

"H," LITERARY CORRESPONDENCE COLLEGE,
9, Arundel Street, W.C.

The best Writing Ink for modern office use.
Ask your stationer for it.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

EDWARD WHISTLER,
11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.
HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

GEORGE ODELL,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

OPHTHALMIC AND MATHEMATICAL OPTICIAN
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.
BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

THE ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	539
Lisabetta	540
Retrenchment and Reform	540
Bavai	541
Reviews :—
The Life of Lord Goschen	542
Poetry and Verse—II.	544
Everyman's Philosophy	545
Mr. Yeats' New Book	547
Monsieur Bergerat and Paris	548
Scottish History	548
Sentimental Biography	549
Napoleon and St. Helena	550
Siberia	550
The Missionary in Brazil	551
Reviews (continued)—
Asia in a Nutshell	552
Shorter Reviews	552
Fiction	554
The Royal Academy—I.	556
The Theatre	557
George Borrow—II.	559
The Poet's Holiday—IX.	560
The Magazines	561
Music	562
My Dictionary	563
Foreign Affairs	564
In the Temple of Mammon	566
Correspondence	567
Books Received	567

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

The Academy is published by Messrs. Odhams, Limited, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

The inauguration of the Anglo-German Friendship Society, which took place at an influential meeting held at the Mansion House last Monday, may be regarded as a great step forward in the policy of promoting cordial relations between the two countries, which we have consistently advocated in these columns. Nearly three months ago we wrote upon this subject: "There is no inherent antagonism between the German and English natures," and the speakers at Monday's gathering realised this fact; their tone was characterised by sound common sense. The Duke of Argyll, President of the Society, spoke some timely words of warning with regard to the scaremongers, who are to be found both in Germany and in England, and observed that no hostility to any third country need be implied in thus seeking peaceful relations with another Power. Sir Frank Lascelles emphasised the necessity for more frequent opportunities of intercourse between the people themselves as a factor in lessening the suspicion which still, to a certain extent, exists; and Lord Avebury referred to the commercial aspect of the matter—Germany being almost our best customer, it was quite unreasonable not to be on friendly terms with her. Fine speeches, it may be said, are of little avail; but in this case the words will echo through Germany, and do much to convince the doubtful ones that rivalry does not necessarily mean enmity. The Council of the Anglo-German Friendship Society, consisting of 600 distinguished men and women, will be a potent force on the side of peace. Peace is in the air just now, and although we by no means hold with the "peace-at-any-price" theorists, the maintenance and encouragement of harmonious intercourse between two Powers who have so much in common, so many sympathetic and interdependent interests, as England and Germany seems to us a very desirable task indeed.

In another column of the present issue we comment upon the enormous number of paid appointments created by the present Government, in obedience to the Socialistic ideal that no service to the State can be worth having, or can be of any account, unless the person who renders it be remunerated with a comfortable salary. We are sorry to note that the Government, and the various sections upon which they rely for their majority, have had this pet theory so rudely overset by the answer which Mr. Winston Churchill found himself compelled to give to a question put by Mr. Watt in the House of Commons on Tuesday last. Mr. Watt inquired "whether the Commission set up to investigate the statements of the London police in a recent trial was remunerated for its services," also if the Taxicab Commission was to be recompensed. Mr. Churchill bore high testimony, in the following words, to the manner in which Mr. Cave had conducted the inquiry referred to:—"The hon. and learned Member for Kingston, who was good enough to hold the inquiry into statements of certain police witnesses at the trial of Morrison, has not received any remuneration for his valuable and laborious service to the public. The members of the committee on London taximeter-cabs are also giving their time and labour gratuitously." In these days when members of Parliament are to be paid, and Radical aspirants for the distinction of Justice of the Peace are showing a somewhat suspicious anxiety to be elevated to a position at present unsalaried, it is well to remember that certain services, believed to be of excellent value, rendered freely to the State in times gone by, have recently been found in the murky glow of Socialistic enlightenment to be worth nothing at all.

The announcement that Mr. Pierpont Morgan has acquired the only perfect copy known to exist of Sir Thomas Malory's "Morte d'Arthur," printed by Caxton, and that he has given £8,560 for it, will make all collectors of rare editions, accustomed as they are to hear of large payments by devotees, open their eyes in astonishment. It also emphasises the point that there are several ways of collecting books. One man desires old-fashioned, exquisite bindings, and will handle a volume lovingly for the sake of its "feel" and its chaste appearance, hardly daring to let it pass for more than a moment into the hands of admiring friends; another cares only for first or special editions, and scorns the upstart moderns with their innumerable and distracting issues. A third is unmoved by beautiful bindings or historic publishers, and gathers together the works of a few favourite authors. To him the book is a thing to be read, not to be looked at, and possibly his is the purest joy of all; for in his travels he has many pleasant surprises. He "picks up" a worn copy of Meredith on some tiny bookstall at a wayside station, and is suffused with quiet happiness; he has glorious "finds" at country villages and gloomy curio-shops. But if he should by chance light upon a Caxton (not that such an event is possible in these days) he probably would not know its value—which is where the acute collector of rarities scores heavily. The expert is aware that there are volumes in the world worth thousands, and is on the alert when he hears of their disposal. Whether it is wise to make literature a field for financial speculation is questionable; it means the running up of prices, and the creation of fictitious values, and such processes make the onlooker wonder what will happen when Mr. Pierpont Morgan's sixty-three Caxtons come into the open market—if they ever do.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

LISABETTA

Coil of wintry thoughts had I,
But they all are done;
Spring has caught them on the sly
Since—an hour agone—
Lisabetta wandered by,
Singing in the sun.

Loose and all unbonneted
Shone her burnished hair,
And behind her shapely head
Gleaming aureoles, where
Amber fleecy cloudlets sped,
Emphasised her fair.

Daintily her tripping feet
Pressed the daisies down,
That a tyranny so sweet
Were full fain to own;
Fluttered in the breeze her neat
Hyacinthine gown.

In her rounded arms she bore
Largess of the Spring—
Daffodils—perhaps a score—
Of her pillaging;
At her slender throat she wore
Violets clustering.

With her pure, adoring face
Upturned to the blue,
Sang she with a simple grace
All the joy she knew,
While a lark remote in space
Joined the anthem too.

So she passed, nor e'er divined
Where I stood apart
Brooding in my anxious mind
On a bitter smart,
But in passing left behind
Spring within my heart!

PHIL. J. FISHER.

RETRENCHMENT AND REFORM.

IT is scarcely possible to avoid the conclusion that the Government, conscious of impending doom, are deliberately riding for a fall. They are ostentatiously flouting every time-honoured Liberal principle. Retrenchment, Reform, Open Competition—the knell of nepotism—all—all have gone. Retrenchment is a byword, economy is non-existent, sound financial policy is unknown. The education of the community in the principles of Socialism has struck a deadly blow at the most cherished tenets of Liberal policy. Political jobbery has reached a climax. Not only have an army of officials been appointed at vast expense to the taxpayer, but they have been appointed without examination or assured proof of their fitness for the duties cast upon them. When it is added that the legislation which has necessitated the appointment of these officials is condemned by at least one-half of the free and independent electors of the country the cup is seen to be full and the measure running over.

The Socialist ideal of a State run solely by paid officials, snug berths for all and sundry, irrespective of capability or character, is on the high road to realisation. Its consummation must of course be accompanied by the municipal and national appropriation of the land and industrial concerns and the exercise of the unlimited taxing powers of the State. We are not stating a fanciful proposition, we are quoting from the text-book—"The Socialists' Budget."

Mr. Lloyd George, if he returns to the House of Commons, will have an opportunity of fulfilling a task which in retirement he declares will be a congenial one. It will be open to him to explain the advantage which has accrued and which is likely to accrue to the State as an equivalent for the increase in the expenditure on the public services from £47,300,000 in 1905-6 to £71,800,000 at present. We shall be surprised if he can explain the fact otherwise than as the price paid for excursions into Socialistic legislation, tempered with the inevitable concomitant, expensive provision for wounded or recalcitrant members of the Liberal family-party in the sanctuary of the Civil Service.

The practical Socialism of the Chancellor is, however, rather too perfervid even for the official professors of the creed. Mr. Philip Snowden, an avowed Socialist of the dogged Yorkshire type, cannot assimilate the appointment of Sir Ernest Soares to the post of Assistant-Comptroller of the National Debt Office. The only points in connection with the appointment which are clear are that Sir E. Soares, being admittedly innocent of actuarial knowledge and the qualifications for appointment, was forthwith installed over the heads of the officials who devoted their lifetime to the work of the Department. These officials were publicly declared by the Chancellor's locum tenens to be incapable of filling the position; hence Sir E. Soares was the last resort of a harassed Minister.

Mr. Snowden has another explanation of the appointment, and it is that it is an insult to the whole of the permanent Civil Service and a gross instance of favouritism and nepotism, and he is further of opinion that it is a disgrace to Liberalism that it is silent whilst its party is guilty of such abuse of patronage. When log-rollers fall out, what sort of men, we wonder, will come to their own.

Other appointments, it is said, will receive examination in the House of Commons, and we would urge Mr. Snowden to reserve a portion of his forcible vocabulary, because we think he will need it.

It is understood that the reply of the Government of sea-green incorruptibles will assume the familiar form of tu-quoque, a form, we submit, which is scarcely fitting for use by men of all the virtues. We pity Ministers—the Lord Chancellor excepted—that their defence habitually assumes the form that the prisoner in the dock is at least equally rascally as they are. The standard of ethics is so high; the acknowledgment of calculated lapse under temptations so unabashed. We pass with a sense of relief from a sordid chapter—a chapter unhappily which may with time be developed into a Pentateuch.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The main point we wish to enforce on an electorate largely inoculated with the virus of laissez-aller is that they are paying a heavy price for results such as we have glanced at. We give the net total from a list compiled by Mr. Douglas Hall, which is not now nearly complete, of new appointments made—the usual Civil Service examination being dispensed with—by the Government since 1906. The Government, it may be said, refused a return, but Mr. Hall succeeded in obtaining reliable information. The number of new appointments without any safeguards as to efficiency number 873, with total salaries of £239,775.

Next, please, payment of the members who have been parties to these proceedings, and the creation of battalions of stipendiary magistrates to replace the unpaid, who do their work at least as well.

Is the Income-tax payer still slumbering?

His back is nearly broken.

The rude awakening of the future will be for a different class of taxpayer—the dupe who now shakes hands with himself in the fond belief of his own perpetual immunity.

We have left no space to deal with the Government in the aspect of reform, but none is needed, because reform is not concerned with destruction only, but demands capacity for construction.

BAVAI

By H. Belloc

The memories of the Roman Empire and the material relics of the first four centuries strike the mind, wherever the traveller may come across them, with something of the same impression. It is as though he had chanced upon a great figure which looked at him in silence, standing immovable as he passed: a figure quite real and yet not of this world, and greater in stature than are living men.

Everywhere, I say, this impression that one is watched by an old power is the impression of Rome, whether it comes upon us in the African uplands or on the moors of Northumberland, or in the heart of great cities, as in the gates of Treves or Rheims.

Whether the place is completely lonely like the wall above Corbridge or the mighty Prætorium of Lambèse in Numidia, whether it is frequented like Arles or Nimes, there is the same sensation of aloofness and of silence. I am not sure that this feeling of a gulf—a curious cross-feeling of a gulf of time with no gulf of space to correspond with it—is not strongest in the towns that are still towns, but are dwindled and no longer capitals or great. In these the magnitude of Rome is felt more subtly than in the deserts, and is yet revealed more fully than in the great cities; and in their homely market-places one seems to look across the centuries and to see them bridged with an unbroken though a declining tradition. Of this sort is Autun, though it is still rather large; of this sort is Chichester; but most typical of all, I think, Bavai.

Bavai was once the capital of the Nervii. In some way of which no record remains it grew to be a centre of government apparently, and of communication certainly, in north-eastern Gaul. Why such a site should so have reached Imperial importance we cannot judge. The town stood, and still stands, diminished, upon a bare enough upland. The fields slope up towards it very easily from the north, somewhat more steeply from the south; but it is not a town upon a hill. It has nothing of natural fortification about it. Its site is no more than a roll or rise of land. No considerable river is in its neighbourhood. The Scheldt is far to the north, the Sambre some miles to the south. No stream runs within the walls nor even close outside them; in the shallow valley below an insignificant brook trickles northward. Round the place in a sort of ring, beyond its wide, empty fields lie the great forests. Notably the thick wood of Mormal cutting off the whole of that country-side from the pleasanter and warmer country of Avesnes, and the high road from Paris to the Netherlands. Perhaps it was something sacred about the place, no strategical or commercial advantage, but mere religion, which first founded this capital of a great tribe. Certainly it was so with Chartres: it may have been so with Bavai. Perhaps some great chief died here, or loved the place because it was his birthplace or his inheritance.

At any rate Bavai became that great thing of the Empire, a nucleus for the marching roads and a market for all the east and the north. It held this high and regal place century after century. It saw the coming both of the barbarians and of the Faith. It dominated the transition between the full civilisation of Rome and the dark ages. . . . And then, unexplainedly, it very slowly indeed declined.

That decline is the mystery of the town. By an accident we happen to have no history of Bavai, nor, I think, any historic allusion to the stronghold. Had something come down to us, written, which could tell us of the city's greatness, Bavai would be to-day among the famous little towns of Europe. But there is no document; only the map with its great star of roads, the fragment of a temple, and great blocks of Roman wall, decayed, witness to what the place was. No one visits it. You find its name in no book, and the very people of the place are astonished if a chance traveller comes in to peer about him.

There is no high place left in Bavai, but from one or two roofs, and best of all from the tower of the church, near the bells, you can look round on every side over the hedgeless fields and see the seven great roads, each darting out mile after mile towards the boundaries of the Empire on the one side, and the inward parts of Gaul upon the other.

That straight line which goes diminishing and unswerving dead north-east runs to Utrecht; ad trajectum, the last crossing of the Rhine. That other, next to it, more easterly, points to Cologne; beyond it, a third, dead east, leads to Treves.

Southward two others run spread out like two stretched strings; the easterly one darts for the crossing of the Sambre for Vervins, for Rheims, and for the Catalanian plains, and so south onward for the Morvan, for the schools of Autun, for Lyons, for Rome. It was the high road of all. The westerly one strikes for the Ile de France, and branched upon the Oise (or rather in its valley) to Noyon, to Compiègne, to Paris, to Rouen. A fifth road ran and runs south of west for Amiens; a sixth, just north of west, makes for Arras for Boulogne, and for the crossing of the sea. The seventh is the northly great street, which sprang for Tournai, for Courtrai, for the Batavian Island, and the mouths of the Rhine and Meuse.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

They say it was the lieutenant of Augustus who, twenty years before our Lord was born, traced out these strict lines for their miles and miles of going. For 1,800 years there stood in the market-place of Bavai a milliary—a stone which set forth the nature of these great roads and their direction. Weather and time turned it into something blackened and formless enough; but it grew to be worshipped, and great stories gathered about it.

The people came to say that this stone had been set up by a King who desired to govern the whole earth, and so had driven to the very ends of it these seven great roads. The story went on to tell that this King put the roads under the protection of the Seven Planets, and under seven tutelary gods, three good, four malign; that, in pursuance of this plan, he paved these roads three in white marble and four in black, and that by their magic he had power over all countries. So much did those roads weigh upon the minds of men that the fantastic tale arose just as I have written it, and was enshrined on the dark stone.

The armies of the Revolution who, to the right and left of this town, fought their enormous fights at Wattignes, at Tourcoing, at Fleurus, at Jemappes, detesting ancient symbols, threw the stone down. The Restoration set up another stone. Thirty-nine years ago that second pillar was restored and the names of the towns to which the Seven Roads drive were inscribed upon its seven sides; on the summit of the pillar there was put (then or earlier) a statue of the Frankish Queen who in her time restored and maintained these Roman ways.

The whole thing is very typical of Gaul. Chartres has just the same succession of a monument incredibly old, overthrown in the violence of '93, set up again in our time.

That pillar is the only little boast that Bavai makes, and it is made so low and so humbly that no one hears it. There are people not forty miles from Bavai who have never heard of Bavai. Yet every time I look at the map of that region for one purpose or another—for the story of a battle or for the planning of a holiday—the seven great lines, streaming out like lines of force from this citadel of Roman power, stand out from the sheet, as it were, and have a meaning separate from everything else that is printed upon it.

It seems impossible that they should be empty and that no files should march along them any more.

They run, now a paved high road, now a footpath, now a narrow alley through a wood, then lost in the undergrowth, then suddenly a paved high road again, they run so unceasingly their stage after stage of marching days, and they have silent experience of the past, especially of battles.

One in particular—the great road to Cologne—is crammed with such memories, and if you will follow it through its changes, pierce the woods with it, try to discover it where it is lost at river crossings, piece it together from stretch to stretch—if you will so recover it, I say, starting from Germany and making for Bavai as you go, you will have on either side the names of innumerable fights—Landen and Neerwinden, Fleurus, Ligny, and Quatre-Bras and Waterloo, and lastly, just as you enter the fields of Bavai, a hamlet off your road is Malplaquet.

REVIEWS

THE LIFE OF LORD GOSCHEN

The Life of George Joachim Goschen, First Viscount Goschen, 1831 to 1907. By the Hon. Arthur D. Elliot. With Portraits. In Two Volumes. (Longmans, Green and Co. 1911. 25s. net).

By Sir William Bull

[First Notice.]

Barely four years have passed since Lord Goschen died, and yet we recognise sadly that most of us require reminding of his great services to the Empire, so fast does the world live to-day.

We happened to be colleague with Mr. Elliot during the last six years of his Parliamentary career, and, having known him slightly, we cannot help feeling that there is a good deal of Mr. Elliot in the book We do not mean to imply for one moment that he has obtruded his personality unduly into the biography. No author who had taken an active part in the movements in which his subject was involved could have shown more self-effacement; but it is inevitable that, having known him, we should feel his powerful but quiet personality all through the book.

The book might have been called "The Penultimate Whig by the last of them," whilst the second volume could have had as a useful sub-title, "The History of the Liberal, Unionist Party."

It has been compiled with painstaking care. The author has entered into the spirit and views of Goschen when, as a young man, he was an advanced Liberal, when he became a Minister in Liberal Governments, and when he became a member of the Liberal-Unionist party after the great split. His views and actions on Home Rule and Free Trade are admirably pourtrayed; at the same time, we feel that Goschen's character itself is a somewhat faint etching. Judging from what we read and know, it must have been a character rich in colours, and yet we never seem to get to know the man. We can judge of his strength of character, his firmness, his courage, his self-denial and devotion to duty; but there is no light and shade, there are no contrasts, no weaknesses, and no mistakes. We are never intimate with him. Without undue eulogy, he is always on a pedestal or at a distance. However, let us deal with the book as we find it, for with the above reservation it throws a great deal of light on a character that is little known.

Many persons who ought to know better would say, "Oh, Goschen—he was a German Jew, was he not?" As a matter of fact, we find the family was Lutheran, and could trace its pedigree back to a "worthy parish clergyman" in Saxony, who was living in the year 1609. For one hundred years the family followed the learned professions and then engaged in mercantile pursuits.

It is probable that Lord Goschen's Life of his Grandfather will live after the statesman's memory has faded, for it was a labour of love which gave genuine delight to so able a critic as Lord Morley.

As a publisher in Leipzig—

> He published the first collection of Goethe's scattered writings; he was for a time the housemate of Schiller; he was the bosom friend of Wieland, once the patriarch of the German world of letters; he was in constant correspondence with many other stars in the brilliant Weimar constellation and with the famous scholars of the University of Jena. Gifted with a striking and often picturesque pen, his letters throw interesting sidelights on the celebrated personalities with whom he came in contact, not only as a writer but as a man.

It was the publisher's third son, William Henry, who came to England "in the year of peace and Waverley"—1814—to settle, where he married an English wife and founded the English branch of the family.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

He came into contact with a Bremen merchant named Frühling, and together they founded the great banking house of Frühling and Goschen, which soon became a power in City financial circles :—

> My father [wrote Lord Goschen] had prospered in London by means of intense industry, great commercial insight, and corresponding thought—but no bread-winning labour, however intense, diminished the brightness of his intellectual powers or blurred his vision of all the wider aspects of the world.

It is clear that in this frugal semi-German household young Goschen was trained most carefully from his earliest years. He had a German governess, who gave him a careful grounding under the evident superintendence of his parents. He then went to the Blackheath Preparatory School at nine, and from thence to Germany at eleven, with the idea of following a mercantile career; and Lord Goschen seems to have thought that he was handicapped by the three years he spent in Germany when he was subsequently sent to an English Public School and University. We venture to doubt this, for it is clear that when he was at Meiningen the boy's exceptional powers of mind were developed, and "a solid foundation of mental material had been laid," although it may be true that he was ill-equipped for the special style of classical work in English schools.

The father of the Reviewer was slightly Goschen's senior at Rugby, and we remember his describing Goschen as a quiet, shy boy, who did not mix much with his schoolfellows for the first two or three years. Goschen says: "My father's ambition for me at all times was indeed almost a passion. He staked an infinite and pathetic amount of happiness on my success." His father seems to have made up his mind from the first that Goschen was a boy of exceptional ability; he trained him like a racehorse for the highest stakes. He never seems to have doubted, from the time he sent him to Rugby at the age of fourteen, that he would become a leading figure in the world, and the boy responded to the call with all the force of his keen and industrious nature. In this part of the book there is no mention of his brothers and sisters, both parents appearing to have concentrated their attention on George.

The next few pages are one long catalogue of his success at Rugby and Oxford. He became Cock of the school. Dr. Tait wrote:—"He is one of the best heads of the school that I have known during my Headmastership." "Goschen made a very eloquent and brilliant speech," wrote Jex-Blake, "about the Papal Aggression in the Oxford Union the other day, and on the right side too. He is far the most eloquent person I ever heard anywhere." As a young man he had a curious love of analysis; he was always pulling his own mind and his own opinion to pieces. Both sides of every question were usually very clear to him, and the reasons pro and con ranged in well-ordered regiments on either side. This habit of his went far, and it is obvious from Mr. Elliot's description that it continued with him throughout life. His conclusions were not determined till after he had very carefully pondered and weighed them. In later years and in matters of administrative detail he often surprised his friends by postponing till the last moment a final decision. Yet in matters of political principle, and as regards broad lines of action, no statesman was ever less vacillating or more firmly consistent

This trait is skilfully pourtrayed throughout the book. The Queen; Lord Granville in foreign affairs; his colleagues during the Home Rule troubles; Lord Salisbury during his career as Chancellor; the great financiers during the Baring crisis, and his followers during the Tariff Reform agitation, all turned to him for advice, and he never failed them. His advice was always clear and to the point, and those who sought it felt that it was the result of much clear thinking. All through his long life he gave his country of his best.

After taking a Double First at Oxford he went into his father's firm, where he took an active part, throwing his whole soul into the business. "In business he was never an amateur"; his father dubbed him "the driving-wheel of the machine."

In 1854 he fell in love with the lady he subsequently married, and his father, not altogether approving of the match, shipped him off to New Granada, where the firm had business interests. It was a strange life in a primitive country for the Oxford Double First, for whom every one had predicted a brilliant public career; but young Goschen never complained—he obeyed his father until the elder Goschen saw plainly that the marriage was inevitable. In the year 1856 he returned to England; he married a year later at the age of twenty-six, and no husband and wife were ever better suited. For forty years she rendered him the greatest assistance in various ways, and gave him the happiest of homes.

At twenty-seven he became a Director of the Bank of England, and in 1861 he wrote the "Theory of the Foreign Exchange," which in a very few years ran into many editions and gave him at once a wide fame.

In those days the City of London was distinctly Liberal, and in 1863 Goschen was invited to stand, on the death of Mr. Western Wood. His views were considered advanced. He entered the House of Commons pledged to Parliamentary Reform, the Ballot, abolition of Church rates, and the removal of religious disabilities. Mr. Goschen soon made his mark with such excellent qualities, and he was withal so painstaking that he was bound to come to the front. He spoke on "the abolition of Tests for Academical Degrees at the Universities," and gave an interesting account of an interview he had with Palmerston, who had selected him to second the Address in 1864. The old man instructed him very fully as to what to say about foreign policy, and when Goschen asked him with becoming indifference about domestic affairs and legislation, "Oh," he gaily replied, rubbing his hands with comfortable satisfaction, "there is really nothing to be done. We cannot go on adding to the Statute-book ad infinitum. Perhaps we may have a little law reform or bankruptcy reform, but we cannot go on legislating for ever!"

A correspondence next took place between Cobden and the young Parliamentarian, in which he warns Goschen against an independent attitude and many-sided criticism. He avers that, in the long run it leads to isolation in which no man can accomplish any important object.

On certain subjects Goschen sympathised with advanced Liberalism, but he was ready from the very first to cross swords with the Manchester School, and their attempts to set class against class.

His next step upwards was his acceptance of the offer of the Vice-Presidency of the Board of Trade, and here his father wisely decreed that his work was finished for Frühling and Göschen. "Henceforward he must work for the nation." He became President of the Poor-law Board, and then First Lord of the Admiralty in Gladstone's great Ministry of 1868, and from that time was always a first-rate Minister to whatever Government he became attached.

Whilst in opposition he was commissioned by the Council of Foreign Bondholders in London to protect English interests in Egypt, a position which he accepted on condition that it should be "entirely honorary," and which he carried out to the entire satisfaction of all parties.

When Gladstone came back to power in 1880 Goschen opposed the extension of the county franchise, which made it impossible for him to join the Cabinet, but Gladstone was so eager to employ him that he offered him the Viceroyalty of India, which for private reasons he felt compelled to decline. His next work was to be in the Near East, where trouble was brewing over the Turkish-Greek Frontier Question. Goschen became Ambassador to Constantinople. It was while occupying this position he met Bismarck, who said to him, "I rather envy you English statesmen the excitement of the House of Commons. You have the pleasure of being able to call a man a damned infernal scoundrel. Now I cannot do that in diplomacy." This part of the biography is admirably told. What struck Goschen most about Bismarck's methods was the degree of absolute independence with which he did his work. No obligation to communicate with a single colleague; no desire for a moment's quiet reflection. In the presence of the British Ambassador he dictated straight off an important circular to the German Ambassadors at Foreign Courts.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

How he satisfactorily carried out his difficult task of preserving the peace of Europe is fully described.

Mr. Goschen, curiously enough, was generally outside all the difficulties and questions which troubled Gladstone's Government of 1880—Majuba, Bradlaugh, and the Land League.

On the retirement of Speaker Brand Mr. Gladstone offered him the Speakership, which he declined on the score of his failing eyesight. The first volume ends with the premonitions of Home Rule and "the Hawarden Kite" on the subject which Herbert Gladstone caused to be inserted in the Leeds Mercury. The important part which Goschen was to play in the momentous events which followed we must leave to our review of the second volume. Never was a man of the temperament and training of Goschen more needed in the crisis that followed. His clear-headedness, his patriotism, and the way he influenced his colleagues is described in a masterly way.

POETRY AND VERSE—II.

The Moonlight Sonata. By M. A. B. Evans. (G. P. Putnam's Sons. 5s. net.)

The Unfading Light. By Caroline Davenport Swan. (Sherman, French and Co., Boston, Mass. $1.25.)

Dartmoor Mist. By A. Bruen Corkran. (Elliot Stock. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Naiad, and other Poems. By A. D. H. Allan, M.A. (John Ouseley, Ltd. 2s. 6d. net.)

The Gardens of Gray's Inn, and other Verses. By Christian Tearle. (Longmans, Green and Co. 5s. net.)

Medea and Circe, and other Poems. By Arthur K. Sabin. (Temple-Sheen Press. 4s. net.)

The scheme of embodying in rhyme a series of pictures suggested by Beethoven's "Moonlight Sonata" is quite pretty, but is hardly justified by its results in the case of Mr. M. A. B. Evans; the moods of the music, calm and storm, hope and despair, are suggested, but without much strength or command of language. Most of the lyrics and irregular poems which follow are open to the same criticism; but when the reader comes to the last fifty pages, which are devoted to the French verse-forms, a pleasant surprise is in store for him. The author is at his best when forced to concentrate his thought within the rigid boundaries of the ballade and the rondeau. Only once do we rebel at a rather pronounced punning refrain on p. 149; but immediately opposite this rondeau is an excellent specimen, in which the opening phrase—"Would Fancy thee direct, what bliss were thine"—is carried to its ingenious conclusion most happily:

> Her face and figure naught amiss:
> She'd sing and play, past scorn or hiss,—
> Bright, cheerful, wise, and never tart,
> A paragon! Nay, do not start—
> Art thou quite sure a maid like this > Would fancy thee?

In the various ballades the author is quite at home; the "Ballade of Fashions," with its refrain, "Where are the styles of long ago?" and the "Ballade of the Eighteenth Century" are quite on the classic models. In fact these fifty pages of clever rhyming, often on charmingly conceived themes, more than compensate for the disappointing quality of the previous portion.

Devout and sincere as the sonnets and lyrics of Miss Swan undoubtedly are, they sound one note so persistently that the reader will be apt to find them monotonous. The devotional mood is unfortunately not conducive, as a rule, to good poetry, and, from a literary point of view, the two or three stanzas in which the writer sings of earthly beauties without moralising or obtaining a hymn-like effect are much to be preferred.

In spite of his rhyming "draw" with "more," "palms" with "arms," "back in" with "lacking," and (a triumph indeed!) "Himalayas" with "prayers," Mr. Corkran has much that is pleasant in his collected verses. He smites the reviewer neatly between the joints of the harness by a stanza of his "Envoi," which we quote:—

> Some sneering critic comes to scoff
> At what we think we've done so well;
> And puts the True Believer off
> The wares we want so much to sell.

We do not blench at this onslaught, for Mr. Corkran forgets—if he ever knew—that the true critic praises when he can, and finds fault when necessary; but never "sneers," though it is permitted him on occasion to be judiciously ironic. The best verses in this volume are the simplest, as when the author addresses the "Jolly little English boy playing on the sands," or sings quaintly of the adage, "Two's Company, Three's None," or writes of "Polly and the Pixies," a pretty little rhyme of the heathery moorland.

Mr. Allan seems to be an eminently "safe" writer of verse—he can be depended upon to rhyme "maiden fair" with "golden hair," to talk pleasantly of "Autumn's golden fruit" and the "virgin snow-clad peak;" his very "safeness" renders some of his stanzas ordinary which with a little courage in seeking and using a less trite adjective or phrase would have crossed that difficult boundary-line between mere versification and poetry. Even as it is he has given us some delicate and arresting lines—such as the opening of the sonnet entitled "The Countess":—

> Frail as a wind-flower in the beechen shade
> Within the church she knelt. . . .

A curious instance of how carelessness may spoil an otherwise really good poem occurs in "The Lover's Seat." The two middle verses we quote:—

> A glimpse away to the heathland of the East;
> And the bracken is rustling in the breeze!
> 'Tis good to be here, in the haunt of bird and beast,
> Where squirrel, jay, and stoat do as they please.
>
> A glimpse away to the blue haze in the South;
> And a salt wind comes blowing over-seas!
> Far off, a murmuring in the Channel's mouth,
> Hard by, a droning of the honey-bees.

Here the terrible fourth line and the very weak third completely ruin a set of verses which might have brought a breath of summer from a Cornish headland to the least poetic soul. Some excellent translations are included which do something towards compensating for our disappointment in many of the preceding efforts.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

We have had occasion before to comment favourably on the work of Mr. Christian Tearle, and in this volume of capital ballads and rhymes very few flaws can be found. One of the best things in the book is a little poem entitled "My tears would have their way;" it is simple, strong, and very near to human nature. "The Rochester Coach," a rollicking song of the old days, pleases us with its infectious gaiety and its galloping lilt:—

Well on our way in the fresh of the morn,
Over Blackheath and in sight of the corn;
Peter the guard gives a rouse on his horn—
Peter is stalwart and merry!
Breasting the hill, with a pause at the top;
Dashing to Welling with never a stop,
Stretching away from the land of the hop,
White with the bloom of the cherry.

Easy enough to write, perhaps, but not easily kept up for several verses with such a fine swing and genial, open-air, rousing effect as is obtained by Mr. Tearle. His clever elegy on a poor starved cat which sought shelter and found a home in Gray's Inn is a very pretty achievement in mingled pathos and humour, and the lyrics and ballads of olden days contain many stanzas which we would willingly quote for our readers' pleasure had we space. Altogether Mr. Tearle's "Verses" are exhilarating, and a splendid antidote to a melancholy mood.

"Medea and Circe," a blank-verse poem of six hundred lines, deals with the visit of Medea to her sister-enchantress on the far-famed isle of the Grecian Sea. It shows a notable mastery of words, but we can hardly go so far as to say that "the poet has mastered the grand style of epic poetry," as does the writer of the introduction. One passage, descriptive of the landing of Medea, will illustrate the style:—

Meantime Medea from the yellow strand,
Pearl-scattered, slowly passed; and took her way
Beneath a mighty-towering forest's gloom,
So dim that Slumber there her ancient reign
Held lonely, scarce disturbed by any song
Of deep-voiced bird: and never was there known
The wild wind's riot; but low-bubbling rills
Adrowse crept on; and through the perfumed air
Stole murmurs of the ever-moving main.

The glamour of Mr. Stephen Phillips seems to pervade this; we remember a certain "odorous, amorous isle of violets," and "poplars shivering in a silver dream." A sonnet of which we give the sestet will show the author in his weakest, most sugary mood:—

Thou dost lean o'er me, singing through the night.
Wild is thy song, Beloved, wild thine eyes;
And lo! the witchery of thy moon-kissed hair
Falls round me with its nameless, shadowy light.
O Love-born miracle sublime and rare! . . .
We hand-in-hand move on through Paradise.

They will do it, these gay dogs of poets. We wonder why? How many wild-haired and wild-eyed youngsters who imagined themselves in love have gone into the moon-kissed-hair business, and walked hand-in-hand with Her through Paradise? Let us have Meredith's Marian, for a change:—

She is steadfast as a star
And yet the maddest maiden;
She can wage a gallant war
And give the peace of Eden.

And she is a great deal more to our taste than the lady who leans over people and sings a wild song all night. Some of Mr. Sabin's poems come perilously near the definition of "nothing prettily said;" per contra, we have a perfectly charming "Ballade of Poesy," and some pleasant lyrics. A little less sweetness, a little more energy, would improve Mr Sabin's work, and that we consider him to be worth improving may be taken for granted by the amount of space we have given him. It is rather a pity, by the way, that in so neat a volume the misspellings "wierdly" on page 15, and "beseiged" on page 28, should have been omitted from the list of errata.

EVERYMAN'S PHILOSOPHY

Creative Evolution. By HENRI BERGSON. Authorised Translation by ARTHUR MITCHELL, Ph.D. (Macmillan and Co. 10s. net.)

Matter and Memory. By HENRI BERGSON. Authorised Translation by NANCY MARGARET PAUL and W. SCOTT PALMER. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

TRUE genius is the ability to exploit the simple things of life; it is the deification of the commonplace. Surely the genius of the inventor of the fountain-pen is on a higher and a truer plane than that of the chemist who discovers a new element. The latter, like the searcher after hidden treasure, digs and quarries into the recesses of his own little world and perchance discovers a new series of compounds which will be a worry to future generations of students; the former, ignorant of scientific method, but possessing that inexplicable instinct of the dowser, has unconsciously developed far greater powers of observation—he has the ability to see what is to be seen. Can we hand down to our successors a story, whether true or untrue, with a more glorious moral than the story of the youthful James Watt? The youth who, sitting at his father's hearth, saw visions of a steam-engine in the cloud of condensing water vapour which was emitted from the spout of a two-shilling kettle, possessed a genius which has made almost as great an impression on modern civilisation as all the teachers of the Christian era. To a great extent social reform, the elevation and education of the masses, can be traced to the invention of the steam-engine. As in the world of work so in the world of play; the great billiard-players are great because they are so elementary; the young amateur is amateur because he is so complex. We are reminded of the explanation of choking by a writer whom every one must quote now that he has been recently rediscovered. The process of swallowing as performed by the human being is so natural, is such a part of the organism, and therefore so little understood, that the slightest deviation from the ordinary leads to disastrous consequences. Samuel Butler, in "Life and Habit," says:—

> The new-born child cannot eat, and cannot drink, but he can swallow as soon as he is born; and swallowing appears to have been an earlier faculty of animal life than that of eating with teeth. The ease and unconsciousness with which we eat and drink is clearly attributable to practice; but a very little practice seems to go a long way—a suspiciously small amount of practice—as though somewhere or at some other time there must have been more practice than we can account for. We can very readily stop eating and drinking, and we can follow our own action without difficulty in either process; but as regards swallowing, which is the earlier habit, we have less power of self-analysis and control; when we have once committed ourselves beyond a certain point to swallowing we must finish doing so. . . , And if we get into a difficulty we choke, and are more at a loss how to become introspective than we are about eating and drinking.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In Professor Henri Bergson's "L'Evolution Créatrice" we have the philosophy of the common man; in contradistinction from the complexities and abstractions of the so-called simplications known as philosophical systems we have a logos with its foundations on man himself. The English-speaking race, as well as Professor Bergson, owe a debt of gratitude to Dr. Mitchell for his translation, which preserves the charm and spirit of the original, and can only be the work of a sympathetic and believing disciple. The philosopher who makes bricks without straw will not readily find a place for "Creative Evolution;" but the man who lives will live again and again in the pages of this wonderful work. And why do we say wonderful? Because here is no closed system of thought; nowhere is humanity depicted as the solution of a mathematical equation; the recognition of the complex nature of organised matter seems so simple that we wonder why we have had to wait until the twentieth century for it. If Professor Bergson is most daringly original, if the prevalent ideas of science and philosophy are ruthlessly thrust aside, if we undergo a "mental catastrophe," so much the better for us. We are brought back to the heart of things.

In another way we must frankly praise Professor Bergson. The human organism is very frequently led away from itself because of its complexity; the mind describes a circle round itself; like the pseudopodia of the amœba, the off-shoots of the mind are so varied and so numerous that any excessive development of one of these tendencies produces a serious twisting of the integrated outlook. It is like the motion of a body in a non-resisting medium; it goes on for ever unless killed by its own conceit. Take the political analogy. One section of the political wire-pullers tells us to shout for Free Trade, but has that cured all our ills? Another set of prophets whispers "Tariff Reform is the only panacea;" the Socialist says "Vote for Me and the Millennium;" another calls for a Business Government. These all represent tendencies. The great statesman, who lives for his country and not for his party, will be he who chooses most wisely the good things from each of these sections. Great men are springing up, and they are endeavouring to place for us various antitheses in the correct relations to each other Sir William Crookes has tried to show us where physical science and psychical science are dependent upon each other, and also where they are independent. It is useless attempting to make either of these the basis of the other; but it is possible to outline a via media wherefrom the fringes where the two meet can be the better distinguished. Is not this preferable to the old idea that belief in one of these signified the negation of the other? Similarly Sir Oliver Lodge has attempted to reconcile a basis of religious faith with the teachings of pure science.

And now Professor Bergson essays to place philosophy and science upon correct terms with each other. He attacks the vendors of abstract ideas, who deal in logical systems of thought or in materialistic laws. He sees life as it is; the old philosophers lost the thread of life in the intricacies of their mental machinery:—

> The history of the evolution of life . . . shows us in the faculty of understanding an appendage of the faculty of acting. . . . Hence should result this consequence, that our intellect, in the narrow sense of the word, is intended to secure the perfect fitting of our body to its environment, to represent the relations of external things among themselves—in short, to think matter. . . . Our concepts have been formed on the model of solids; our logic is, pre-eminently, the logic of solids.

If this is true, what is the use of going further? It follows that our thought is not capable of realising the full nature of life; created by life for the definite purpose referred to in the quotation, how can it be applied to life itself? Professor Bergson points out that "the evolution that ends in man is not the only one." There are other forms of consciousness, though not so self-contained as the human intellect, which, nevertheless, also express something of importance to the evolutionary movement. Each individual is a manifestation of the original impulse, and therefore contains within him the whole secret of life. The intellect, with its geometrical and utilitarian training, cannot solve this riddle. It must look deeper—to intuition, to instinct":—

> Together they may solve by a method more sure, brought nearer to experience, the great problems that philosophy poses. For, if they should succeed in their common enterprise, they would show us the formation of the intellect, and thereby the genesis of that matter of which our intellect traces the general configuration. They would dig to the very root of nature and of mind. They would substitute for the false evolutionism of Spencer—which consists in cutting up present reality, already evolved, into little bits no less evolved, and then recomposing it with these fragments, thus positing in advance everything that is to be explained—a true evolutionism, in which reality would be followed in its generation and its growth.

Professor Bergson does not give us a completed philosophy; he defines the method, and allows us a glimpse of the possibilities of its application. He shows us that the solutions of the intellect—mechanism and finality—both miss the true conception of time, "the stuff the psychical life is made of." Unlike the philosophical systems, this task is not for one man. Such a philosophy will not be made in a day; it will require generations.

Dr. Mitchell was fortunate in receiving the friendly interest of the late Professor William James, who had intended to introduce the work to English readers in a prefatory note. Bergson's philosophy has much in common with pragmatism, so much so that some one has called Bergson the true father of the pragmatists.

"Creative Evolution" is a theory of life and intellect with a charming simplicity of style and wealth of illustration that make the reader forget that he studies deep philosophical problems. The author's previous work, "Matière et Mémoire," which is now translated by Miss Paul and Mr. Scott Palmer, deals with a specific problem, and is more technical. Here again Bergson discovers a sort of via media between idealism and realism; he puts us at a point where idealism and realism become partial aspects of a greater truth. He affirms the reality of spirit and the reality of matter, and strives to determine their mutual relations by the study of memory. Once more he realises the dualistic tendencies of the common man:—

> Matter, in our view, is an aggregate of "images." And by "image" we mean a certain existence which is more than that which the idealist calls a representation, but less than that which the realist calls a thing—an existence placed half-way between the "thing" and the "representation." . . . For common sense the object exists in itself, and, on the other hand, the object is, in itself, pictorial, as we perceive it: image it is, but a self-existing image.

The translation of "Matter and Memory" is a masterly one, and includes an introduction specially written for the English translation by Professor Bergson. We heartily recommend these two works to all with introspective inclinations; they will fill many an aching void of the intellect; they preach a living philosophy; and is not a living philosophy life itself?

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MR. YEATS' NEW BOOK

The Green Helmet and other Poems. By WILLIAM BUTLER YEATS. (The Cuala Press, Dumdrum, Ireland. 10s. 6d. net.)

WE have here but a slim volume, a matter of some thirty-three pages only, printed and bound in the chaste fashion which the Cuala Press is like to make famous; yet it arouses many strange and various thoughts. There is a quality in Mr. Yeats' work that has made the matter of his progress of considerable interest. In his prose he has avowed the belief that poetry should exist merely for its own ends; that it should spurn moral ends, and should exist for the sole purpose of exhibiting a high and chastened beauty. Precisely what this means it is difficult to see, though it is sufficiently obvious what it is meant to convey. It is as though one should say that religion should exist for its own ends merely, and abjure moralities. If we are to understand that poetry, in becoming didactic, steps off its lustrous throne, then that is, or should be, a self-evident thing. But that is not to say that pure poetry disavows morality or that high poetry is unmoral.

Mr. Yeats' intellectual ancestry, in fact, dates from a school that received its impact of inspiration from Walter Pater. But Pater himself did not maintain the attitude suggested by certain passages of his "Renaissance." He progressed from that vision, and enriched his work immeasurably thereby. Therefore Mr. Yeats aroused interest. Hitherto he has clung to his attitude, an attitude that would judge beauty to be an entity rather than an attribute. Yet the volume of his work hitherto achieved has caused many to wonder what his next move would be, for it seemed to suggest that it had sung to its finish. It is impossible to make many volumes of "The Wind Among the Reeds."

In this present volume, however, there is a poem that suggests this mood of his. It runs:—

> All things can tempt me from this craft of verse,
> One time it was a woman's face, or worse,
> The seeming needs of my fool-driven land;
> Now nothing but comes readier to the hand
> Than this accustomed toil. When I was young
> I had not given a penny for a song.
> Did not the poet sing it with such airs
> That one believed he had a sword upstairs,
> Yet would be now, could I but have my wish,
> Colder and dumber and deafer than a fish.

It is better to let a poet explain himself by apt quotation and collation than to throw a mist of words about his meaning. Therefore against the poem already quoted let this other be set, and let them rub a light between them:—

> The fascination of what's difficult
> Has dried the sap out of my veins, and rent
> Spontaneous joy and natural content
> Out of my heart. There's something ails our colt
> That must, as if it had not holy blood,
> Nor on an Olympus leaped from cloud to cloud,
> Shiver under the lash, strain, sweat, and jolt
> As though it dragged road metal. My curse on plays
> That have to be set up in fifty ways,
> On the days' war with every knave and dolt,
> Theatre business, management of men.
> I swear before the dawn comes round again
> I'll find the stable and draw out the bolt.

Between these two poems his present mood is easily discoverable. He who once would "not have given a penny for a song" (did not the poet imply that he had immediate business on hand of earnest purpose, "a sword upstairs"?) and who turned away scornfully from so empirical a muse, is now finding two things assail him. One is, that the difficult thing becomes more and more attenuate, and that the fascination of its pursuit is drying the sap out of his veins. The other is, that the old empiric business of the world is assailing him. "Theatre business, management of men." Between one and the other his muse is losing fire; it must now needs "shiver under the lash, strain, sweat and jolt." He swears he will flee it all.

He is right: his muse is losing fire. There was a music that sung through "The Wind Among the Reeds" that is missed among these lyrics. They are often of a dry quality, lacking the sap that made his earlier poems of such haunting significance. They are no less difficult to attach definite meanings to, but are now brittle, losing that winsome charm that sang their younger fellows to affectionate memory. Sometimes their meaning is bare and hard. Sometimes they are couched in a simplicity that defeats itself, being pellucid truly enough as to speech, but very elliptical, either in syntax or idea. Not only as to women, but no less as to verse, he is a lover of that > beauty like a tightened bow, a kind

> That is not natural in an age like this,
> Being high and solitary and most stern.

The drama that gives its title to this volume is a versified form of "Golden Helmet." Plot and incident are the same in both; and a careful collation of them furnishes a light interesting enough as to Mr. Yeats' method of work. Compare, for example, the following speech in one and the other! It is Leagaire who speaks; and he speaks of Cuchulain:—

> I wish he would come for all that, and put quiet and respect for those that are more than she is into that young wife of his. Only this very night your wife and my wife had to forbid her to go into the dining-hall before them. She is young, and she is Cuchulain's wife, and so she must spread her tail like a peacock.

In the present form it runs:—

> I would he'd come for all that, and make his young wife know
> That though she may be his wife, she has no right to go
> Before your wife and my wife, as she would have done last night
> Had they not caught at her dress, and pulled her as was right;
> And she makes light of us though our wives do all they can.
> She spreads her tail like a peacock and praises none but her man.

Sometimes the correspondence is closer, sometimes looser. But it is always interesting. It is Mr. Yeats' curious method of work to pass a poetic drama through an initial prose stage; and here we see the process in achievement. As to the verse form, it might perhaps be called a free alexandrine—free in the sense that a disyllabic often becomes a trisyllabic foot. It cannot be called a success, however, though it is an interesting experiment. For this is a drama that is full of action, while an alexandrine, by its very length, forswears action. Its nature demands a slow chant, and consequently a heavy movement. A matter and a manner that war with each other at the threshold of workmanship spell doom to beauty of achievement.

There are some who thought that this next book of Mr. Yeats' would be full of interest. It is; yet not quite the interest that one had thought to find. That is put at a yet further remove. Nevertheless, there is interest here, deep interest; there is beauty here, and there are thoughts that rove through the whole business of Art.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

MONSIEUR BERGERAT AND PARIS

Souvenirs d'un Enfant de Paris—Les Années de Bohème. By Émile Bergerat. (Fasquelle, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

This is not the Monsieur Bergeret who came to Paris late in life, when the iron of a French provincial town, tempered by conjugal infidelity, had entered into his soul. It is "Mayer mit a," as they say in Bavaria, not "Meyer mit e." For one thing, M. Bergeret at Paris is an accident; the unheroic hero of the "Histoire Contemporaine" loses a great part of his interest in leaving his sorrows and annoyances behind him and in coming to Paris. M. Émile Bergerat, on the other hand, belongs to Paris—he connotes Paris. He has no need of the "spirit of adoption" as so many other Parisians. He has lived in Paris all his life, not in the bare literal sense of renting a flat somewhere inside the fortifications, but in the sense that he has known and loved all that was best in the "Ville Lumière" during the last fifty years of its history. We trust we shall not be putting ourselves outside the pale when we say that we prefer M. Bergerat to M. Bergeret—"à Paris." And we prefer him to M. Arthur Meyer, whose recently published "Ce Que Mes Yeux Ont Vu" is yet of most poignant interest. "La Bohème" has more to do with literature than has the Bourse or even the Palais Bourbon. And the "Bohème" of these recollections is not that of Murger; it is a sane practical existence of looking the world in the face, and of trying to better it, or at least to keep the best of it alive—which is, after all, the wiser part—and of never forgetting that the first duty of a Frenchman is to be gay.

From the opening chapter, headed "Mon V. H.," and opening with the significant words, "V. H., c'est Victor Hugo," to the closing scene, where Théophile Gautier takes his cat upon his lap, bids a silent farewell to his daughter and to his new son-in-law, M. Émile Bergerat, and flies for consolation to the country of dreams, there is not a page that we could have spared. It is journalism, perhaps, but inspired journalism. "Souvenirs d'un Enfant de Paris" is as much a work of art and fancy as an autobiography; it is from this standpoint that we have ventured to compare it favourably with "M. Bergeret à Paris." Being an autobiography, chronology naturally presides over its arrangement, but without excluding a very clear and symmetrical division of the materials. Part I. begins, as we have already mentioned, with Victor Hugo, whom the author brings on the stage in characteristic fashion. The prophet of Liberal Romanticism was finishing his term of exile in Guernsey; his adorer was prosecuting his studies at the Lycée Charlemagne. Hugoism and Liberalism were part of the air they breathed at this establishment; in their play the boys represented Camille Desmoulins at the Café Foy. The young poet was inspired to address an ode to the banished seer; Hugo's letter acknowledging this effusion became the object of a lottery. It was only six years later that M. Bergerat learned from the best possible authority that the coveted treasure was not written by Hugo at all. The winner of the lottery had started on a career of autograph-collecting on the strength of his prize, and he was charitably allowed to keep his illusion, with the gem of his collection.

Coquelin and M. Paul Déroulède are among the intimates of the early period. The juxtaposition of these two names gives point to a charming and fantastic anecdote about the latter. Hearing that Emile Deschanel was about to deliver a lecture, containing a certain amount of unfavourable criticism, on de Musset, he took two of his friends, one of them M. Bergerat, to the lecture-room, and awaited developments. The moment the lecturer passed from the chapter of merits to that of defects, M. Déroulède was on his feet—"Non, Monsieur, Alfred de Musset n'a pas de défaillances. Il est impeccable et parfait." After a short exchange of repartee the professor had to abandon the lecture. We are not so sure that the true principles of literary criticism were not present beneath these unorthodox-looking methods. We cannot refrain from quoting a story about Coquelin Cadet before his adoption of the actor's profession. Having served a term in England as drawing-master at a girls' school, without knowing either English or drawing, he was asked how he had managed to escape exposure. He explained that he used to pause thoughtfully before the sketch of each of his pupils, take up a pencil, hold it before him for a moment, with one eye closed, say "Wery well," and pass on.

Of Part II. we cannot speak, though it contains some of the best pages. It is the story of the Année Terrible, the defeats, the siege, and the Commune. We see how against the arrows of adversity there is no weapon of defence like the laughter of brave men. It is a new reading of Horace's

Si fractus illabatur orbis,
Impavidum ferient ruinae

M. Bergerat regretfully emits the opinion that the disasters of that time have left a permanent mark on the French character in diminishing the national fund of gaiety, and in inculcating a belief in "the power of gravity."

Part III. is concerned almost entirely with Théophile Gautier—no new subject, of course, for his nephew, "Caliban." We have abundant confirmation here of the fact that he who was called "the faultless poet," in the same way that Andrea del Sarto was called "the faultless painter," was the most lovable of men. The story of his declining years is a most wholesome and refreshing chapter, in modern literary history. His acts are as much works of art as his poems; the "geste" of a good Frenchman is always there to season a noble action. Paris is about to be besieged; old and infirm Gautier speeds thither—"On bat maman, j'accours." But perhaps the gem of his "gestes" is this: to show his esteem for his old friend and frequent hostess, Princess Mathilde, he had been in the habit of making for her, each time he was invited to Saint-Gratien, one of his jewel-like poems. As a supreme homage he had a single copy of these collected poems printed and bound with elaborate care, and then had the type broken up. Thus he was able, usurping the painter's privilege, to offer the gift of a work of genius that had no double or counterfeit on this earth.

SCOTTISH HISTORY

Annals of the Reigns of Malcolm and William, Kings of Scotland, A.D. 1153-1214. Collected, with Notes and an Index, by Sir Archibald Campbell Lawrie, LL.D. (James MacLehose and Sons, Glasgow. 10s. net.)

The talented author of "Early Scottish Charters Prior to A.D. 1153" continues his valuable work in this important collection of the Annals of Scottish History during a troubled period. The relations of the Kings of England and Scotland were complicated by the feudal obligation of homage, which, as Bishop Stubbs pointed out, "was one of those diplomatic knots which are kept unsolved by mutual reservations until the time comes when they must be cut by the sword." Malcolm was compelled to do homage; and during the long reign of Henry II. William the Lion was practically his vassal, and had to submit to the most abject terms when he was defeated and captured after the Earls' rebellion. Anent this capture, Sir Archibald Lawrie gives a graphic picture of the news reaching Henry in a passage cited from Jordan Fantosme. The Chamberlain at first refused to allow the King to be disturbed. But the messenger's persistence

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

roused the King, who, overjoyed, woke up his barons, saying—

The King of Scotland is taken, so it has been told me for truth,
Just now the news came to me, when I ought to have been in bed. . . .
This night seemed very fine to King Henry.

Although Richard, in the general sale of offices to raise money for the Crusades, released William from the obligation of fealty for 10,000 marks, King John enforced personal homage, and eventually at the Treaty of Norham in 1209 exacted a fine of 15,000 marks, and carried off William's two daughters as hostages. So William had to borrow money, and a memorandum states:—"The total of the debts owing by William, King of Scotland, to Aaron, the Jew of Lincoln, by ten charters, £2,776; for which Earl David made himself surety by holding an agreement regarding the charters."

But besides the affairs of the Kings and matters political there are a great number of incidental facts of interest in these annals. We may read of the founding of Abbeys, such as Glenluce and Dryburgh; of the tithes of fishing and of mills; of the land-tax, Hydagium; of the custom on weighing goods, Pessagium; and of the refusal of the Bishops, Earls, and Barons of Scotland to give a tenth of rents and movables for the crusade preached by Archbishop Baldwin and Gilbert, Bishop of Rochester, to Henry II.'s Council at Geddington in 1188. The importance of the Prince Palatine Bishops of Durham appears in the wars and struggles of the marches, and the sieges and surrender of their great castles. In section lxvii. an account is given from the Annals of Ulster of an unsuccessful attempt to reunite Iona to the Irish Church (A.D. 1164). The name of MacFoircellaigh, chief of the Culdees, is "the sole mention of a Keledean institution in Iona," Sir Archibald Lawrie says in his note in loc.

He might, however, have added that "in Iona, in a valley between Dunü and Dunbhurg, are the foundations of a cell measuring about 16ft. by 14ft., called the Culdees' Cell," as pointed out by Dr. J. T. Fowler. In section cxli. we have the charter of King Richard granting the King of Scots escort to and from the English Court, and fixing his daily allowance, inter alia the exact amount of candles, pepper, and wine. This charter is witnessed by the Archbishop of Canterbury, eight other Bishops, several Earls, "et multis aliis;" while just twenty years afterwards we read "how King John permits King William to buy fifty or sixty lampreys on January 1st, 1214. There are, as might be expected, innumerable references to Church affairs, letters and bulls of Popes to Bishops and Abbeys, questions of vacancies and appointments; and during the interdict in England in 1208, it is interesting to notice that the Bishops of Salisbury and Rochester went to Scotland and were maintained by King William, who assigned them "octoginta celdras frumenti, et sexaginta sex celdras de brasio et octaginta de avena."

Sir Archibald Lawrie has made his selection with careful discrimination: throughout the book he gives most useful and scholarly notes, and there is a capital and exhaustive Index. The student of history will find in these annals a copious and interesting work of reference. There ought to be a tabulated list of the original sources, and a longer and more complete historical introduction would have added to the value of this work.

SENTIMENTAL BIOGRAPHY

The Gay King—Charles II.: His Court and Times. By Dorothy Senior. (Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

"The Gay King," as applied to King Charles II., is somewhat of a misnomer—at least with respect to our modern meaning of the word "gay." "The Philosophical King" would perhaps describe more accurately the person and character of the third Stuart King of Great Britain and Ireland. He was a man with many sides to his character, who made the best possible use he could of his opportunities, and never grumbled. He was neither a bigot nor a hypocrite, but he adapted himself to his varying circumstances with admirable equanimity. He was sincere and open-hearted, and admired goodness quite as much as beauty. He was just the sort of man to be misunderstood and misrepresented.

Miss Senior, in her preface, has succinctly summed up the character of her "Gay King" in four words: "he had no illusions." She brings out, in this handsome volume, very pleasantly and readably the story of the saddest and merriest monarch in the long line of our kings. Perhaps the author has cut and carved a little too arrogantly the stirring and affecting incidents in the King's life and times; doubtless she had in her mind her special public—many of us Paul Prys and Diderots. "I like," said the latter, "to see nudities well enough, but I do not like any one to show them me!" Perhaps De Grammont's causeries are nearer the mark than Dorothy Senior's carefully sifted gossip. Anyhow she has a very pretty way of making the best of a compromising situation, and so her book need not bring a blush to the over-prudish.

The best chapters in "The Gay King" are "The House of Bondage" and "Ladies More Fair Than Wise"—these were the limits of Charles' sadness and his happiness. "How hard he is!" some said, speaking of his exile; "How weak he is!" others replied, criticising his amours. Buoyant, amorous, and good-looking, Charles was every woman's sweetheart—they all made love to him. Cupid's fetters were more to his liking than the conventions of the Covenant; but when Royal Princesses looked askance he consoled himself with beauty on the spot. Our author has told us guardedly the loves of Charles, at least some of them, but she names, and hardly more, Catherine Pegge, Elizabeth Killigrew, and Eleanor Needham, "the King's seventeenth mistress abroad," as Pepys calls her.

The difficulties the exiled King met with in his matrimonial proposals put off his marriage for many years, and then one of the most insipid and most ill-favoured of Princesses—Catherine of Braganza—accepted the rôle of Consort. Her persistence in wearing unsightly Portuguese costumes displeased Charles; her toilet offended his sense of beauty. The ladies of the Court boycotted the poor Queen. "Fair Barbara" was the worst, for she insisted upon making a third party whenever the King and Queen were together. But then Cleveland had her match in Portsmouth, and these two redoubtable Duchesses fought out to a finish the position of maîtresse-en-titre. Barbara was Charles' "Minera," Louise his "Flora," but both paled before the effulgence of an orange-girl, Nell Gwyn, "the indiscreetest and coldest creature that ever was at Court," as Burnet dubbed her.

Staider citizens were shocked at the carryings-on—"Women painted, spotted, and masked skylarking with the smarts." Still, the Court and times of Charles II. were the natural corrective of the hypocrisies of the Commonwealth, and men and women, unprejudiced, do not hold up Charles to scorn and ignominy. Dorothy Senior's story is one of those books which make the reader want to know more not only of the times and people described, but also of her own handiwork. Sentimental biography is a deal cleaner and sweeter than sensual fiction. The illustrations in "The Gay King" are very interesting, and the volume is well printed and well got up. It should meet with a ready sale.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

NAPOLEON AND ST. HELENA

The Tragedy of St. Helena. By Sir Walter Runciman, Bart. (T. Fisher Unwin. 10s. 6d. net.)

When Lord Rosebery, in the Preface of his "Last Phase of Napoleon," asked, "Will there ever be an adequate Life of Napoleon?" he propounded a question of which there will never be a final solution. The "Bible" of Napoleon is already as big as, if not bigger than, that of any other man—divine, mythological, or human.

Sir Walter Runciman—than whom no writer was more adequately equipped by enthusiasm, erudition, and endeavour to tell us facts concerning the "man of mystery"—has, in his tersely composed volume, "The Tragedy of St. Helena," stated the case for our hero quite emphatically and convincingly. Certainly he has travelled on the lines of Lord Rosebery, and their two compilations exhaust all that can be said about the prison and the prisoner of St. Helena. This is a plain, unvarnished story, written by a level-headed, warm-hearted sea-dog and land-hog, and yet he has succumbed to the worship of his hero, in that he regards him as "a wonderful being," and "the ideal of human greatness."

What a tremendous contrast is this consensus of Rosebery and Runciman to the words of Lord Wolseley, whose sentimental papers in the Pall-Mall Gazette caused searchings of heart! The Field-Marshal has hardly a good word for the greatest ruler of men the world has ever seen—the greatest commander of all time. It may be a truism "Never get a man to write about an associate greater than himself;" but, alas! Wolseley's harsh judgments have had a baneful sequence. However, "no impartial student of the part played by Napoleon," writes Sir Walter, "during twenty years of warfare will deny that the institutions he founded, the laws that he made, and his mode of Government wherever established were beneficial. . . . His dictatorship was wielded with a wholesome discipline . . . he distinguished between eternal justice and tyranny. . . ."

Speaking of his defeat at Waterloo, Napoleon was accustomed to say, "It must have been fate, for I ought to have succeeded: one must never ask of fortune more than she can grant." This is where Napoleon erred. In one of his day-dreams at St. Helena he exclaimed, "Ah! if I could have governed France for forty years I would have made her the most splendid empire that ever existed." This is where Napoleon failed. Such errors and such "failures" are of the essence of fame and success. But we have to do specially, in Sir Walter Runciman's goodly volume, with the "last age which ends this eventful history," "the abode of darkness" as he calls it. The fallen Emperor's last abode on earth was his "Inferno." Lord Bathurst was the diabolus ex machina, and his congenial spirits were Liverpool, Eldon, Castlereagh, and Sidmouth, not one of whom added any lustre to the "Story of the Nation." They were a sordid crew, ever stifling the more generous instincts of the Crown and people. Hudson Lowe did their dirty work. Of him Wellington said, "He is totally unfit to take charge of Buonaparte." These men murdered Napoleon in cold blood—a drawn-out tragedy. By an inversion of the truth Napoleon came to be regarded as the "bogey" with which to frighten babies.

Napoleon was not a "good" man; neither was he a bigot nor a hypocrite. He was not mad either; he was a genius so much above the ordinary ruck of men that ordinary magnanimity could not reach his level. Hence came the pettifogging tyrannies of Longwood—unsanitary quarters, unwholesome food, unsympathetic supervision, shabby clothes, restricted relaxations, &c. In short, everything was meted out to the "Ruler of Europe" with miserable parsimony on purpose to hasten his death and relieve his unworthy gaolers of their embarrassments.

The chapters of Sir Walter's book entitled "The Man of the Revolution" and "The Oligarchy," are excellent reading, and he gives a succinct Bibliography and a good Chronology. We very cordially recommend this addition to the Napoleon "Bible" to the attentive consideration of impartial readers. Extremists, too, may benefit by its perusal.

SIBERIA

Siberia: a Record of Travel, Climbing, and Exploration. By Samuel Turner, F.R.G.S. With an Introduction by Baron Hey King, and Forty-six Illustrations from Photographs by the Author. (T. Fisher Unwin. 5s.)

In the stricter meaning of the word education is a very rare thing. In a day of rapid and vapid journalism it is becoming impossible to discover the actual state of affairs with regard either to public event or notorious happening. It is so with regard to events in England; how much more must it be so with regard to matters outside England! A strike will occur that bids fair to paralyse commerce, and the zealous student of the daily press will find his paper full of street affrays and police-court happenings, but no word or hint as to the cause of the trouble. Even the very desire to learn is being sapped out of the average man—which is the most terrible thing of all.

Such reflections are stirred in one by reading this book of Mr. Turner's. For Siberia is a land much in the thought of people; and that thought is generally occupied with convict-settlements and snow blood-stained from the knouts of Cossack convict-drivers. It is a habit of thought not alone common to the vulgar: it rules with more than sufficient power in circles that would protest their culture with considerable indignation. Yet how remote from truth this habit of thought is let Mr. Turner's book declare. Not that we altogether adopt his urbane acceptation of a smiling exterior. It is sufficient to say that the exterior is indeed smiling, and not malign, whatever abnormalities proceed beneath the smile.

While he calls his book a record of travel, climbing, and exploration, it is worthy of note that Mr. Turner's primary reason in visiting Siberia was business. He went as the representative of a British firm of provision importers to search out the possibilities of future business, and to open out business where convenient. This being so, we expect to find him with a keen eye to the business potentialities of the country. Nor are we disappointed in such a prognosis, for the second chapter in his book is given up to the dairy industry of Siberia.

He goes into the question with considerable detail, and it is obviously out of the field of a review such as this to dwell on the subject. But the fact itself is more than ordinarily interesting. In the first place, the mind refuses at first to associate Siberia with the succulent matter of dairy-produce. And that the mind is not to be censured for this aversion is obvious from the fact that settlers in Siberia never thought of this possible connection till the early nineties. Even then it was left to an Englishwoman to conceive the idea and to put it into execution. Since then the notion has spread; and Mr. Turner's statistics and subsequent facts are evidence of the degree to which it has become almost a staple industry of the country. To such an extent, indeed, is it practised that in the furthest and most remote regions it forms the centre of activity. Another industry that one would be little inclined to associate with the country, but which prevails nevertheless, is agriculture.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

While Mr. Turner speaks of his book as being occupied with Siberia, it is perhaps necessary to point out that it does not treat this wide country in any sense of completeness. Probably one of the first towns a fairly well-informed reader would expect to have treated in detail would be Irkutsk. Its festive life has made it the subject of peculiar attraction to readers of Siberian life. But he does not even mention it, and for the exceedingly simple reason that his business purposes did not take him so far. In other words, his book is an account of Siberia within the limits of the business requirements of a few months' visit.

There is, however, one qualification to the last sentence, and this qualification is not unimportant since it accounts for the centre and apex of this book. That is to say, having arrived at Byok, the utmost limit of his business necessity, he proceeded with laudable purpose to ascend "Belukha," the highest known mountain in Siberia. It is in his account of this that he achieves a special zest of interest; and incidentally tells us of the people and of the country that do not lie within the scope of the general run of books on Siberia. It is of course impossible to treat of his climb in detail, though every paragraph of his account is vital with interest, particularly to any who have any experience of "peak-bagging," but his mention of the Kalmurks—the aboriginals of that part—quickens a peculiar interest. Anything to do with any part of that very extraordinary race that inhabits the centre plateau has an absorbing interest. The following account of a Russian bath, too, given on his passage south, is of more than passing interest. He says:—

> It was along this road that I made my first inspection of a Russian bath. This was a small hut, erected at some distance from the dwelling-house. It contained a roughly-constructed stove, in which wood is burnt until the stones of which it is composed are nearly red-hot. Water is then thrown on the stones, the steam thus generated filling the room. In some baths a raised platform is erected, which is reached by a series of steps, and is flanked by wooden benches. This is called the "polka," and, owing to the superheated steam ascending to the top of the room, is a very hot corner. The method of using the bath is to raise some soap-suds in a bucket of hot water. A bundle of birch-twigs with the leaves still on it, called a "veynik," is dipped in the hot soap and water, and the body soundly thrashed with it. The heat of the "polka" is so intense that the Russian peasant frequently thinks nothing of coming outside in nudibus, and rolling in the snow."

Within its limits "Siberia" is an admirable book, and more than well worth reading. Its illustrations are not the least part of its excellence.

THE MISSIONARY IN BRAZIL

Through the Wildernesses of Brazil by Horse, Canoe, and Float. By William Azel Cook. Illustrated. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

Of late an unusual number of missionaries have taken the public into their confidence to the extent of publishing the accounts of their journeys in various lands. The majority of these have been commendable for their restraint and for the modest veiling of their author's personality behind the scenes of native life and landscape with which the volumes dealt. A North American missionary, Mr. Cook, now adds his contribution to this pile of valuable literature. His production cannot claim the unqualified approval with which the rest have met. It resembles the famous egg of the curate. In parts it is excellent; in others unduly militant, in spite of the earnest spirit displayed. The book, in fact, may be divided into two sections, the one descriptive of Indian adventure, the other of wordy warfare with the Brazilian priests and others whom the author very frankly terms idolators. In his dealings with these two subjects the author displays a dual personality. His descriptions of the savage aboriginal life are sympathetic and of intense interest; his account of what he suffered at the hands of white and coffee-coloured wearers of trousers and the general garb of civilisation is instructive in another fashion, but is decidedly not sympathetic. So widely does the tone of the two phases differ that it is difficult to believe that the book is the work of one man.

Mr. Cook started out from Rio de Janeiro filled with good intentions and loaded with many Bibles and a cornet. Let it be clearly understood that we wish to criticise the methods of this itinerent enthusiast in no spirit of irreverence. The American missionary was the agent of a good work, and undoubtedly acted up to the dictates of a rigid conscience. He was a bold man, moreover, as indeed he must be, who, endowed with a revivalist spirit and with a strong fear concerning the damnation of his theological opponents, parades through the priest-governed villages of rural Brazil. Apparently the author had never before come into contact with the cruder forms of Roman Catholicism, and that which he saw and heard roused him to the keenest fighting pitch. There was reason for his disgust. We know well enough that the majority of Brazilian rural priests are soiled signposts to a voluptuous heaven of their own creation. We have met with many who were notably lacking both in spiritual and personal cleanliness. Yet we should be loth to brand the entire priesthood of the country as servants of the devil and trebly damned. Mr. Cook, however, appeared to hold no uncertain views on the point. The result materialised in conflicts between the outspoken minister and the jealous, unwashed priests—collisions that were renewed with the regularity of clockwork in each village at which he made a halt.

It was magnificent—but it was war! What else could have been engendered from such an overflow of mutual pity! The courageous author passed from village to village through the flames of battle, armed, as he says, with the "sword of the Spirit." All the way he distributed tracts, sold "fine large Bibles," and sounded his cornet with a triumphal note that was not to be marred even by the physical attacks fomented by those "moral lepers" the priests. His progress was pacific alone through those regions devoid of local spiritual advisers, and here, at least, he came into contact with a certain number of "devout heathen," as he terms the more pious Roman Catholics. The fact that the personality of the author enters so largely into the interesting narrative must excuse the personalities indulged in by the reviewer. Mr. Cook, as a matter of fact, represents a type. His character, as revealed by his book, is exactly akin to that of so many other earnest and unbending North Americans, who are now, for the first time, taking an interest in Central and South America.

It is a rather curious fact, and one that may not be without its future political significance, that the human temperaments of no two continents are farther apart than those of the Northern and Southern halves of the Americas. The methodical and direct curtness of the North American is admirable in its way; the grave and stately Iberian courtesy is equally to be commended in its own place. These characteristics, naturally, are universal in neither continent, yet they form a very weighty element in both. When the owners of these respective temperaments are brought into contact acute antagonism by no means follows; but an astonishingly complete want of mutual understanding is inevitable. Mr. Cook is very honest. He blows his cornet, distributes his sheaves of tracts, and says (not in the book, by the way):—"There is only one path to heaven, and I have got the map of the route—right here!" The North American politician is not equally honest—since all the world over that which is a virtue in a missionary is a vice in a politician. Yet he surveys the great Southern continent in a sufficiently straightforward fashion, and expresses himself with a conviction that equals that of the missionary. There is only one safeguard for the Republics of the South, he explains, and that is the Monroe Doctrine with which he has already endowed them. The attitudes of both Mr. Cook and his Government towards the Brazilians are in many respects identical. They are both assured that they know exactly that which the country requires. It is probable that their views are perfectly correct—up to a certain point. But whether they will succeed in instilling a corresponding belief into the South Americans is quite another matter. As it is, the South American shrugs his shoulders, and accepts both doctrines—so far as it suits him to do so. The extent to which he will go beyond his own inclinations still remains to be put to the test. When the moment arrives it cannot fail to be instructive.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mr. Cook's journey is typical of much that may happen on a larger scale. His staunchness and resolution do not appear to have failed him in the most trying circumstances. Crediting the coffee-coloured mulatto of the interior with the temperament of the New England schoolboy, he wielded his spiritual club with sincerity and fervour. Yet, knowing the inhabitants, we cannot refrain from the belief that he would have achieved more by the tickling force of a feather and a smile! It was in the theologically virgin field of the Indian tribes that the author undoubtedly felt most at home. Here the missionary made light of very real hardships and perils, and mingled with the hordes of naked savages as easily as a duck takes to water. It is a feather in his cap, moreover, that the aborigines apparently returned his regard. The pages that deal with these portions of his travels are by far the most interesting in the book. Reading them, one is tempted to hope that Mr. Cook's next journey will be effected from the United States direct to the remote swamps of Indians—say by aeroplane!

ASIA IN A NUTSHELL

Eastern Asia: a History. By Ian C. Hannah, M.A. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

In the preface to his "Eastern Asia" Mr. Hannah takes the reader into his confidence with much frankness. He confesses that the criticism that most impressed him of the original edition from which the present volume has been evolved was to the effect that it contained too many facts to the square inch. For this later and more important volume he claims a nicer adjustment of matter. Nevertheless, were facts packed more closely together than they are even here the reader might well run the risk of becoming a little giddy from the force of the tremendously rapid procession of events.

However, it would be an ungracious thing to grumble at a full quiver of fact, even if it be rendered in a somewhat potted form. From a chronological point of view the tendency errs on the safer side. This particular form of treatment, moreover, could scarcely have been avoided in the space allowed, when the history of Asia, from the earliest known dawn to the present day, is compressed within three hundred pages. The result is a conscientious catalogue of reigns and wars, rises and falls, rather than an introduction to the more intimate points of cause and effect that stamp the long history of the great continent. The pages of the volume are curiously innocent of that glamour of the East that is part and parcel of so many similar works. Indeed, for the author's purpose there is no need of any romance of the kind. The book is invaluable in its own way. As an historical survey of Eastern Asia, simply and clearly written, it is of serious practical utility, and must prove of considerable service to those desirous of following the threads of dynasty, religion, and progress, more especially in China, Japan, and India.

In the course of such comment as he allows himself the author, very rightly, demonstrates a strong sympathy with Eastern ideals. Like the majority of such enthusiasts, he is bitter in his condemnation of the unscrupulous European aggressions that have gone so far to upset the ancient philosophy of the continent. His charges are occasionally a little too sweeping. The Portuguese, for instance, scarcely merit the full blame that he throws upon their early rule in India. Although the results of the reckless intermarriage were lamentable enough, the procedure was only in accordance with the general Portuguese policy throughout the world, that had for its aim the blending together of races by ties of blood. The fanatical cruelties of the priests, moreover, must be clearly dissociated from the actions of such efficient and benign rulers as Albuquerque, to whom, as a matter of fact, Mr. Hannah pays a just tribute.

The opinions of the author are expressed at greater length towards the end of the book when dealing with the present involved situation in China. In common with many other authorities, he is loth to believe that the yellow peril will assume a military form. It would, indeed, be strange were the deep-seated philosophy of ages shattered in the course of a couple of generations from the mere force of the introduction of modern arms.

SHORTER REVIEWS

From Hausaland to Egypt, through the Soudan. By H. Karl W. Kumm, Ph.D. Illustrated. (Constable and Co. 16s. net.)

The expedition across Africa of which Dr. Kumm furnishes an account was performed by him during 1908 and 1909. He was no novice in African exploration. As long ago as 1899 he visited the southern oases of the Lybian desert. Two years later he was in Nubia. In 1904 he went southwards from Tripoli. Later in the same year he penetrated Northern Nigeria and formed the Soudan United Mission. Finally, on October 10th, 1908, Dr. Kumm set out on the expedition of which the present volume is one of the results. His principal business was connected with the work of the Soudan United Mission; but when he had completed it he struck due east, and, after many adventures, arrived at Khartoum on December 3rd, 1909. Dr. Kumm has been successful in constructing an interesting narrative of his venturesome journey. As a gift-book the attractiveness of the volume is much increased by the very numerous illustrations with which its pages are embellished. Interspersed amidst an interestingly written narrative of his journey across the African Continent are to be found many items of far more than mere popular interest. Thus turning the pages over casually one finds this character-sketch of one of the great natural leaders of the Africans:—

> The inky black eyes of the great chief (Sinussi), when turned on some of my headmen and personal boys, looked > as if they might drill holes through them. A lord and leader of men, I could see, sat by my side, who, during the last twelve years in devastating the regions surrounding his territory, has shown that the lives of men and women are to him but as dust under the soles of his feet, to be trodden down or scattered at will. He is about fifty-five years old, and seems to be implicitly obeyed by his people.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The contents of the volume are, however, very varied. On another page we learn of tame crocodiles, the least expected of domestic pets. So tame are they that the women of the village wash and disport themselves in the pond in close proximity to these dreadful denizens of the water.

There is an immense amount of miscellaneous information to be found in the appendices to the book, although but a portion of it can be considered of general or even of particular interest. The Beri-beri proverbs are interesting, but there are very few of them. The vocabularies of Bagirmi and Sara are very lengthy, but are not likely to be consulted by any of Dr. Kumm's readers. The next appendix contains a number of meteorologieal observations. Then follows a list of zoological specimens collected by the explorer, and finally he furnishes a detailed statement of the outfit with which he undertook his journey. The volume may not be one displaying great learning, but to the general reader, and especially to those who take an interest in African exploration, it should prove attractive. It is to be hoped that the reading public will not be deterred by its abnormal (avoirdupois) heaviness.

The Lord Chancellors of Scotland from the Institution of the Office to the Treaty of Union. By SAMUEL COWAN, J.P. Two Volumes. Illustrated. (W. and A. K. Johnston. 21s. net.)

IN the present work Mr. Cowan, a well-known writer on Scottish history, has essayed to deal with a phase of it in the form of a series of biographies. This method often has its disadvantages, especially when the biographies are bald, brief, and disconnected. To the specialist in Scottish history, however, this work should prove invaluable, for Mr. Cowan has collected into one book all the known but disseminated extant information on his subject. The first of the Scottish Chancellors the author traces in John, Bishop of Glasgow, who was appointed by David I. in 1124. The records of these early years are exceptionally meagre in parts, and in consequence Mr. Cowan underwent considerable difficulty in constructing even brief biographies of the early Chancellors. The second Chancellor, "Herbert the Chancellor," the author identifies with Herbert Maxwell, an ancestor of Sir Herbert Maxwell, the well-known contemporary writer and ex-M.P.

Mr. Cowan prefaces his biographies, which, he is careful to point out, are not intended to be more than outlines of the official careers of their subjects, with, first, a Kalendar of the Lord Chancellors of Scotland, and, secondly, an introductory chapter in which the immediate objects of the book are introduced. Previous to the Reformation the holders of the office were without exception High Church dignitaries. With that epoch, however, came a change; the place of the clerics was taken by laymen. In this later period the Chancellors presided as a rule at the Scottish Parliament, the General Assembly, the Courts of Justice, and the Court of High Commission. Interpolated in the introductory chapter is a dissertation on the Lord Chancellorship of England, with especial reference to Thomas à Becket and Queen Eleanor. The latter, we are reminded, was Lady Chancellor, that is to say fulfilled all the functions of Lord Chancellor. When her husband was abroad in Gascony the Great Seal was left in her charge. She sat as Judge in the Aula Regius, and when the City authorities were remiss in paying to her what she considered her dues she did not hesitate to commit the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs to prison. Queen Eleanor was by no means a popular favourite, and in the end she had to take refuge from the hostility of the citizens. The two volumes are illustrated with a number of excellent portraits.

Cloud-rifts over Cottonopolis: A Series of Sketches. By AN OBSERVER. (Sherratt and Hughes. 1s. net.)

BY means of some pithy dialogues carried on during a series of visits to the mean streets of Manchester, the author of this volume manages to impart to his readers in pleasant form a clear notion of the problems which are inseparable from every crowded working-class population; he also tells of the work which is being done by various devoted persons with the object of increasing the happiness—in some cases we might rather say lessening the misery—of these dark places. Hopeless enough such work may seem, but if it is to succeed at all the characters of this book are setting about it in the right way; the "goody-goody" element is scorned, and the methods adopted are those of practical, hard-headed men, not those of the ubiquitous and loquacious "social reformer" whose "reform" too often induces restiveness and social upheavals. The opening study, "A Sunday Evening in the City," contains a very neat presentation of a typical North-country man, who was "guiltless of using trouser-stretchers, while his office manner was so blunt that persons calling for subscriptions grew nervous as they climbed his stairs," but who was a real good fellow. Among the conversations many shrewd remarks are to be found. Says Rentoul, who believes that the Churches have never frankly faced the problem of amusement:—

> "We have lost the art of cathedral-building, and it seems to me that we are also losing conviction and fervour and reverence."
>
> "I cannot agree," said Barlow; "no doubt there is some trouble and confusion in the process of transition, and the tenderer souls receive some shocks. . . . Conviction, in the sense of absolute certainty about a dogma, may be less common, but happily so is cant. Words count less and realities more. If external reverence is on the wane, there is a growth of respect for things that really matter. If God is less often discerned by an odd prophet here and there to be present in a burning bush, He is more adequately realised by the man in the street to be immanent in human life."

The hard common sense and relentless logic of the non-churchgoing artisan are amusingly exhibited in many wordy encounters; in fact, the whole book is full of keen humour and cogent argument, and will open the eyes of many to the possibilities latent in our immense and crowded provincial population.

Bushland Stories. By AMY E. MACK. Illustrated. (Angus and Robertson, Sydney.)

IT is not often that we have the pleasure to welcome from Australia a book of so many charming short stories as are contained in the volume before us. Miss Mack has evidently a great appreciation of nature and her charms, and cares more for the flowers that grow "in the bush by the creek" than for any of the choicer blooms of hothouse growth. She appears to be thoroughly acquainted with all the haunts and habits of the birds and fishes of Australia, and weaves around many of them a dainty and prettily-told story, at the same time not forgetting to point, although in no laboured or objectionable way, to the moral of it all, which consists in many cases of advice to cultivate the spirit of content. "Bushland Stories" should be a somewhat original and welcome addition to the large and excellent assortment of children's books which already exist in vast and ever-growing numbers, and it will also possibly be enjoyed by many who can no longer claim to be children with regard to years.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Cyclist's Touring Club British Road Book. New Series. Vol. VI. North-West England. Edited by T. B. SANDFORD, M.A. Maps. (T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. 6d. net.)

UNDER the auspices of the Cyclist's Touring Club Messrs. Nelson and Sons have now issued Vol. VI. of the "British Road Book," which deals with the North-west England District. Mr. L. B. Sandford, in his editorial note, is very apologetic about the wares he has to offer. But we do not think from a cursory glance through its pages that he need have any fear with regard to the value and utility of the book. Each route is well and clearly defined, the names are boldly marked, and the hills and valleys indicated. By the side of each route is a short description of the places of interest which the cyclist will pass on his journey. There are in all 110 maps, not including those in a rather lengthy Appendix. In dealing with the villages, the editor reminds his readers that the church is usually the most interesting object to be found there; but we are not sure that all tourists will appreciate his advice when he tells them that before leaving they should make it a practice to "look for some almsbox."

FICTION

The Patrician. By JOHN GALSWORTHY. (Wm. Heinemann. 6s.)

MR. ARNOLD BENNETT once said, in a series of ACADEMY articles, since re-bound under the title "The Truth about an Author," after referring to the utter worthlessness of the mass of novels, "there remains the work of the true artist, the work the reviewer himself admires and enjoys: say one book in fifty, or one in a hundred. The reviewer reads that through." Such a book is "The Patrician," the work of a true artist, the book we certainly read through with admiration and enjoyment.

It is a distinguished book, by reason of its style and because of the exactness and perfection with which the portraits of the characters are worked in upon the brain until the reader is confident that not merely would he know them if he met them in the street, but would recognise them by their voices in another room. Lord Miltoun, the eldest son of the Earl of Valleys, en route to the House of Lords, proposes to pause until that time comes in the House of Commons, where it is rightly expected that his marked abilities and family influence will give him both place and authority. He is of the highest personal character, a High Churchman, an instinctive aristocrat, who takes to politics naturally and seriously. But this is not a political novel, though working itself out in a political atmosphere. There is a woman in the case, and therein lies the human interest.

Down in the country, within his father's sphere of territorial influence, a by-election is taking place, and although Lord Miltoun's supporters regard his chances of success as practically assured, every vote is wanted. The rumour gets abroad that Lord Miltoun is attached, in some way better not described, to a lady living down there in a separateness understood to have been obtained in the Divorce Court. An assault is made one night upon one of Lord Miltoun's opponents, Charles Courtier, and Lord Miltoun emerges with Mrs. Audrey Noel from her little house to his rescue. The fat promptly blazes in the fire. Courtier is her great friend, and regards her with the tender and protecting interest of a brother. But Lord Miltoun is deeply in love with her. "He had reached the age of thirty without ever having been in love, leading a life of almost savage purity, with one solitary breakdown. Women were afraid of him. And he was perhaps a little afraid of women. She was in theory too lovely and desirable—the half-moon in a summer sky; in practice too cloying or too harsh." Theirs was a chance meeting, due to an accident to the little boy of a tenant he was visiting. Audrey Noel was carrying the child home. He found out her name. "Some days later, passing by the village green, he saw her entering a garden-gate. On this occasion he had asked her whether she would like her cottage re-thatched; an inspection of the roof had followed; he had stayed talking a long time. . . . Thus from a chance seed had blossomed swiftly one of those rare friendships between lonely people which can in a short time fill great spaces of two lives." The Vicar informed him that she had been the innocent party in the divorce suit. He decides to marry her, goes to London to inform his father, who is naturally not too enthusiastic, travels back through the night, and, without considering for a second the relation of the hour to the task, arrives so early that she greets him, "So you have come to breakfast. How nice of you!"

. . . . .

He neither sat down nor suffered her to sit, but stood looking intently into her face, and said:

"I love you."

. . . . .

And suddenly, panic-stricken, lest he should take back those words, she put her hand up to his breast and said:

"And I love you."

. . . . .

"When will you marry me?"

She hands him a paper containing this paragraph:

"Apropos of the outrage on Mr. Courtier, we are requested to state that the lady who accompanied Lord Miltoun to the rescue of that gentleman was Mrs. Lees Noel, wife of the Rev. Stephen Lees Noel, Vicar of Clathampton, Warwickshire."

When he had read the little paragraph there followed one of those eternities which last perhaps two minutes.

He said then:

"It's true, I suppose?" And, at her silence, added "I am sorry."

. . . . .

At last he spoke:

"I have made a foolish mistake, it seems. I believed you were free."

Her lips just moved for the words to pass. "I thought you knew. I never dreamed you would want to marry me."

"Is there no release?"

"None. We have neither of us done wrong; besides with him marriage is—for ever."

The story of that crisis is told in chapter xv., one of the most wonderful chapters in this memorable book. We shall pursue the story no further; we leave our readers to perform that joyous service for themselves. We have said enough to indicate our opinion that they will be richly rewarded.

The Unknown Lady. By JUSTUS MILES FORMAN. (Ward Lock and Co. 6s.)

To a large extent Du Maurier has rendered the Latin Quarter and the art students of Paris peculiarly his own—

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Trilby, Peter Ibbetson, and the Martian have "made a corner" in student life. On picking up "The Unknown Lady" and finding that Mr. Forman deals also with the painters of pictures in the Quarter, we felt that he was a trespasser, a poacher even, and we were consequently prepared to treat him with scant politeness. Dodor, Zouzon and Gecko joined with Little Billee, Trilby and the others in frowning upon us for entering Julian's in the escort of strangers, "nouveaux." Gogo and Mimsey looked their reproach and whispered to each other in Frank-Ingle. Barty Jocelyn and Bob deliberately turned their backs and went off in indignant silence. But, after expressing our profound apologies to all these old friends, we read on in the intruder. Little by little, however, as we progressed the newcomers made themselves so charming and delightful that the angry looks of the old favourites disappeared, giving place to smiles of welcome, until finally they were all sworn friends for life. Nothing could have been more to our liking. "The Unknown Lady" occupies as warm a corner in our heart as Trilby, Mary, Duchess of Towers, and Martia.

It is certain that Mr. Forman owes much to Du Maurier. The whole essence of his book is Mauresque, though "The Unknown Lady" is by no means an imitation of any of her three forerunners. The delightful chapters of the childhood of Bill Castle and Henry Trent in their New England home, their little adventures and, later on, their life in Paris, accompanied by the bursts of French throughout the book, are all reminiscent of the three Du Maurier novels. Even the haunted Henry who dreams as a child of the little girl "Grey Eyes," and who grows up with this dream companion, strong in the conviction that somewhere in the world she is waiting for him to come to her—even that bears a shadowy resemblance to Peter Ibbetson, and his beautiful intercourse with Mary, Duchess of Towers. There is a delightful intimacy and breezy self-criticism in the book which sweeps away prejudice and makes for instant friendliness. Bill Castle is one of the very best, while the Bart, Laplace, and even little Mennier are all delightful companions. For Henry Trent it is impossible to feel the same degree of feeling. He is somehow outside our friendship. He stands alone, with L'Introuvable in the background, demanding only our sympathy and, if possible, help. We admire him both for his dogged and incessant pluck and his charming character, but we never really know him to the same degree as Bill Castle, jovial, Bohemian, good-hearted Bill Castle. Little Lady Mary finds her way instantly to our heart from the moment that she holds up her face to be kissed, and remains there ever afterward, however she may coquette and tarry. Poor Naila, the voiceless nightingale, filled with silent love and broken ambitions, makes us feel like a Sir Galahad, big with chivalry and the protective instinct. The life in the studio in the Rue d'Assas, with the sad little incident of the poor old lady and her doll, with the occasional jaunts to Scotland and Grez-sur-Loing, are full of sunshine and delightful camaraderie. In a word we offer our sincere thanks to Mr. Forman for his addition to our library.

A Man with a Past. By A. St. John Adcock. (Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.)

Crime and criminals bulk somewhat largely in Mr. St. John Adcock's new novel, but it is not a tale of horrors, nor does the work of the inevitable detective provide the main interest in the book. The story begins by telling how a certain swindler—one Austin Leroy—was forced to make a hasty escape from justice on the day of his marriage. Later, he returns to blackmail his bride and her two aunts, time-worn old creatures, who are much more human characters than we expect to find in books of this sort. In spite of their memories of past glory, their black bonnets, and their rheumatism, they have much more in them than the common and conventional old maid of fiction. It is, indeed, when the author gets away from the atmosphere of the Newgate Calendar that he shows us his best work, and his best is well above the average. When the elder and more feeble of the aunts decides to save her niece by poisoning her persecutor it looks as if the desire for a dramatic situation had overcome all the laws of likelihood, but the flight of the terrified and remorseful old woman is well pictured, and we soon learn that the blackmailer has survived, gaining yet another advantage over his victims. Perhaps it is rather difficult to bring such a story to a convincing conclusion, but it counts for much that a true note should have been struck in many of the chapters. Pathos and burlesque are often to be found on the same page, and this combination of sentiment and humour is made with a skill which suggests that the author has learnt some lessons from Dickens and his novels. It is only the better part of the book which is needed to condemn the weaker and more melodramatic portions. Should any reader happen to possess the name of the villain or one of his accomplices, he will find both apology and excuse in an amusing preface which Mr. St. John Adcock has deemed it a wise precaution to insert. Copyright in names is a distinct hardship for novelists.

The Laws of Lefflo. By the Author of "Miss Molly." (John Ouseley. 2s. net.)

Lefflo is described as a colony in Africa, the founders of which left England, "settled there, made their own laws, and then pulled down a curtain between themselves and the rest of the world." John Durnford and his sister Agatha chance upon this quiet and peaceful region one day after they had journeyed for days through a forest and had completely lost their bearings. They are both at the last stage of exhaustion—John in fact being in a state of utter collapse—when help is brought to them by their native guide in the person of Hildegarde, a nurse, who lives with her brother Paul, a doctor to the inhabitants of the strange colony. John recovers his health; he and Agatha are both kindly treated and remain a year with the doctor and his sister, during which time they learn a great deal about the laws of Lefflo, which were compiled by their founder to bring peace and happiness to his followers, and, like many other laws, achieve very little of their original intention. On reaching the age of eighteen every person has a choice of marrying and becoming a good citizen; no one has any money, and if any one rebels and refuses to be a good citizen he is outlawed and lives in a house apart. Murder and adultery are punishable by death. The disturbing element in the community is caused by Tristram, who refuses to be a citizen, in Lefflo's acceptance of the term, and essays to be an artist, and Serena, who poses for Tristram's pictures and ends by loving him with the passion of her life. The story is very well told, and many of the characters, when not too good, are quite human and interesting. The idea is quaint and the tragic note is forcibly struck at the conclusion by the self-sacrifice of Hildegarde, who, according to the Book of Lefflo, is able to give her life to save the guilty couple.

The City of Shadows. By Charles Beadle. (Everett and Co. 6s.)

Mr. Charles Beadle has written a well-constructed and highly readable tale of rebellion and political intrigue in Morocco. The hero, Paul Towers, joins a Baron de Bouche, of uncertain nationality, in a scheme to supply the Pretender with arms and ammunition and money in return for concessions of land in the South, where the Baron dreams of making himself a monarch on his own account. The arms are landed by an American yacht in the charge of some typical novelistic specimens of the "yew"-ing, "guess"-ing, and "anyway"-ing Yankee. The fortunes of the Pretender are neatly woven in with those of the individual characters. There is plenty of vivid description, including a forcible sketch of a Moroccan prison, into which Paul is thrown by the machinations of the Baron, who proves rather a tough customer when Paul has the misfortune to quarrel with him. Paul meanwhile has fallen in love with a Moorish girl, the occasion of several pretty scenes, and in the end he rides off with her, snapping his fingers at ambition. The Moors are all well done, particularly the Pretender, and a certain handyman of Paul's, who talks a weird and slangy English, and is altogether quite amusing. We feel compelled to utter a word of protest against the portrait of the Moorish girl on the cover of the book; despite a properly Oriental background, it contains rather too much suggestion of a prize-costume at a servants' fancy-dress ball.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Young Life. By JESSIE LECKIE HERBERTSON. (Wm. Heinemann. 4s. 6d. net.)

MISS HERBERTSON'S straightforward love-story of character introduces us to some well-defined and interesting people. We meet a musician, an artist, a literary man, two business men of different types, a cold woman, who somewhat suddenly develops a tender maternal instinct, and a natural little heroine, half-child, half-woman, innocent without ignorance, and pure without iciness. From the first it is easy to foresee her inevitable mate.

There is a growing tendency to marry heroines to men old enough to be their fathers. A slight disparity of age perhaps makes for happiness, since there is commonly an uneven development between men and women of the same age. Twenty-six years, however, is too great a leap; especially as Stephen Garfield is represented as having felt an admiration half filial, half passionate, for Hester Stanton's grandmother!

The artist of this story is the least successful of the male characters, although it is evident that the authoress has taken more trouble with him than with the others. He is the repellent, irresistibly attractive type, full of potential wickedness and undeveloped good, who is so common in fiction and so rare in real life. Jane Eyre's Mr. Rochester is the grandfather of this type—if imagination does not boggle at the thought of Mr. Rochester as a grandfather—and he has, at this day, a great multitude of lineal descendants.

Nina. By ROSALINE MASSON. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

"NINA" is a story of that gentle, domestic type whose events seem to have a precise relation to the blooming times of flowers. Nina is the child of a union which, at first deemed an immoral one, proves in the end, not unexpectedly, to be legal. She is brought up by a "pawky" Scotch spinster, and, after a career as a dazzling housekeeper's niece, with charms and manners above her station, she turns out to be a lost heiress, and comes to her aristocratic own. We do not think that we do the author any injustice in divulging this consummation, as every reader worth his salt will guess it at once. Nina becomes unwillingly engaged to a horribly blameless curate, who shows the latent inhumanity of his character by trying to school her out of all the pretty ways that caused him to fall in love with her. The engagement is broken off in the end, Fate having other plans for Nina. Two of the chief characters of the story are a dour Scotchwoman of a sort one does not mind in fiction, but could not for a moment tolerate in real life, and a most lovable Dean, who sheds all about him the fragrance of noble churches and old-world courtesy. Miss Masson writes more than nicely, and we do not at all resent the lack of anything new in her story, either of plot or manner. Half a century ago, in the hands of a fine writer, such a tale might have been almost a classic; but in this age of vexed problems it can only be a pleasant diversion.

The Glad Heart. By E. MARIA ALBANESI. (Methuen and Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

"THE GLAD HEART" is a pleasant, sentimental story, with somewhat lovable characters, bright and lively conversations, and a happy ending—a type that lies by hundreds upon the small drawing-room tables of the feminine supporters of the subscription libraries.

We suspect that Madame Albanesi wrote it because she prefers cream-cakes to bread and butter for tea, with other things in proportion, and finds the writing of dainty novels an agreeable method of compassing this end. The book has really no other justification for existence, unless it be the inclusion among the characters of two or three natural and delightful children.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—I.

PAST banks of white flowers that gleamed and swayed in the shadows, through an atmosphere warm and heavy with many perfumes, the crowd made its slow progress into the halls sacred in theory to the cause of Art. "Private View Day" retains, and probably always will retain, its distinction as a Society function, a pleasant ceremonial neither too solemn nor too frivolous; where conversation, light badinage, and comments critical or uncritical may be exchanged, and where the goddess of fashion may flaunt her colours and her charms in the pale, sculptured faces and the still, passionless portraits which surround but cannot overwhelm her. It is not a day, therefore, to exercise the ability of the art-critic too severely; rather is it a day for the student of human nature to move amid the gay throng, noting here and there a familiar face, here and there upon the packed walls a blaze of wild crimson or dazzling blue or unrestrained green, musing in the rare moments of pause before some canvas, less imposing than those which attract their admiring circles, that may give him a glimpse into realms far away from this Babel-land of delicate voices.

Sauntering, hesitating, threading our way with many a moment of terror at the threatened dresses of some brilliant cordon of dames and damsels—for, alas! trains are coming into mode again—we selected an occasional picture for preliminary comment—a task difficult enough at any time, since every critic who ever wrote has railed at the methods of hanging the accepted work. But what are the authorities to do, with nearly two thousand items to show? Relentless limitation of their favours would seem to be the only solution of the ever-present hanging problem, and that would make for the extinction of the great, clever "unknown," who even now are wellnigh in despair.

What impressive canvas, we wonder, will the daily papers seize upon and announce as "the Picture of the Year," for the benefit chiefly of our country cousins from Phrygia and

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Pamphylia and the parts about Cyrene? "Impressive," we say, meaning in respect of superficial area—since never was any small picture, as far as we are aware, however true to art and irresistible to the skilled observer, chosen for that questionable distinction. The huge study of a lady on horseback in Gallery II., entitled "The Amazon," by Mr. John Lavery, may gain the notoriety; if so it will, in our opinion, be more justifiably selected than were the "problem-pictures" which seem going out of fashion. The lady carries a spear upright, and thus daringly divides the picture into two halves, yet not unpleasingly. Mr. J. J. Shannon is represented in this room by a notable portrait of "Sholto and Angus, sons of Douglas Vickers, Esq;" there is also an "Interior: Carmichael, Lanarkshire," by Mr. Patrick W. Adam, which exhibits delightful qualities of perspective and quiet colour.

Mr. Arthur Hacker's impression of "A Wet Night at Piccadilly Circus," in Gallery I., received considerable attention. Its suffusion of yellow light gives it a Turneresque effect, and we may emphasise the comparison by stating that it is one of those pictures which need contemplation before they surrender their full value to the onlooker. A glance, and it is negligible; five minutes' study, and it becomes wonderful. Next to this London study, in one of those tremendous contrasts which the Hanging Committee bring about with diabolical joy, is a purely beautiful landscape in dark, subdued tones—the "Moonrise, Pas-de-Calais," by Mr. Hughes Stanton. Two portraits in this room—one of General Sir Neville Lyttelton, the other of Bernard John Seymour, second Baron Coleridge, hung just where the eye is obliged to see both at the same time, clash rather badly by reason of their differing tones of red. On the whole, Burlington House hardly shines for its portraiture this season. Sir Hubert Herkomer's portrait of Admiral Lord Fisher is one of the most natural—the likeness is caught admirably, and there is little suggestion of the pose about it. We may be pardoned, too, if we remark that Mr. Sargent's "Waterfall" (Gallery II.) is a more important work than any of his other three contributions. Landscapes, on the other hand, excel in this year's collection. In Gallery VI. is a very beautiful picture by Mr. George Harcourt, which deserves more attention than it seems likely to receive, entitled "An Evening in June." In a little wood are several children hanging Chinese lanterns on the trees, and the face of a woman, pale, exquisitely calm and pure and happy, as she holds a lit lantern and turns as though called by one of us who look on, is the making of the picture. The golden light just outlines her throat and chin, and against the gloom of the leaves the effect is altogether charming. Akin to this in spirit, and full of poetry (though the upper portion of the picture is somewhat hard) is a classical treatment of "Dawn," in Gallery IV., by Mr. Frederick G. Swaish—a fantasy which gave us quite a poetic thrill; the contrast between the brilliance of the sunlight above and the departing figures of mist and shade below is most effective.

In the general confused patchwork of colour one is in danger of missing individual impressions, and we recommend a search for No. 478, "Twilight at Dordrecht," by Ethel Kirkpatrick—an unobtrusive study of Dutch fishing-boats creeping up harbour with the tide; it is full of calm poetry and evening softness. Mr. John R. Reid's "Haven under the Hill," Gallery XI., has Polperro for its original, if we mistake not, and expresses the quaint appeal of the Cornish village admirably.

The Black-and-White Room is an oasis of calm on Private View Day, but we cannot now do more than mention a few of its many items—some of which might have been omitted with no risk to the name of Art. Mr. J. Seymour Lucas, who exhibits some fine portrait studies, may regard praise as superfluous, and the names of Frank Short, Mortimer Menpes, Sir Laurence Alma-Tadema, and Sir E. J. Poynter need only allusion. Among less famous contributors Miss M. K. Hughes has a neat etching of the "Old Houses of Parliament, Dublin," which is worth examining carefully for its line and fine drawing, and Mr. A. Hugh Fisher's "Hong-Kong Harbour" is notable for a certain clean and spacious effect which comes from the clever elimination of superfluous detail—a factor of success which too many exhibitors of etchings forget.

For a future article we must reserve all comment on the Lecture-room and its sculpture, and a further consideration of some other noteworthy pictures among the crowded galleries.

THE THEATRE

"THE MASTER OF MRS. CHILVERS" AT THE ROYALTY

Vedrenne and Eadie, as they have asked to be called, have commenced operations at a theatre quite unrecognisable. The dingy little Royalty, begrimed with dust and recently in the hands of one whose ideas did not assimilate with public taste, is now pure white and a richly blushing red—perhaps a trifle too red. All that portion of London which finds a certain amount of excitement in being present at first nights crowded into unsavoury Dean Street to see what Mr. Jerome K. Jerome had prepared for them, and whether his latest play would be likely to attract the so-called fickle public to a little theatre long out of popular favour. Curiosity was the one all-pervading feeling, although it may be said that perhaps only 5 per cent. of the audience believed that any play, however brilliant, would draw people away from the circle of lights into the heart of the French slum district. Critics rubbed shoulders with actors, and actors jostled with that easily recognisable body which drops down upon a reopened theatre like a crow. There was one representative of Society present wearing a curiously self-conscious smile, and trying not to look patronising.

The proceedings began as they used to begin at the Court Theatre in the old glad days. A sort of orchestra played very classical and very untuneful pieces. A very pleasant note of originality was then struck by the playing of the National Anthem, which brought a surprised and somewhat annoyed audience to its feet. Finally the curtain rose, and disclosed a very charming room, duly Adamised, at 81, Russell-square, on April 10th, at 3 p.m. We gathered that it was Lady Mogton's house, who was evidently the widow of a Liberal Knight and President of the Women's Parliamentary Franchise League. The room was more than occupied by a Miss Elizabeth Spender, also obviously a Liberal, and appropriately dressed in green—a curious tight-fitting woman who walked with a suggestion of a Hampstead Heath swing, and who shot cynical glances here and there and rapped out enigmatical sentences from time to time. She was the very embodiment of a sneer in a tight collar, and we expected her to draw a knife from some secret pocket and bury it in the bosom of a rival. She was joined at once by Miss Phoebe Mogton, a rather flamboyant girl, who, although Organising Secretary of the W.P.F.L., and a past mistress in the art of making stale jokes about men, was palpably dressed by Lucile and hatted by Zyrot. Then came an earnest-looking girl, attired in the South Kensington Artful manner, called Janet Blake and, although still in her teens, the Joint-Organising-Secretary of the W.P.F.L. Much enthusiastic ribaldry and Suffragist badinage followed. Whereupon Lady Mogton herself appeared, a woman of great decision and some business faculty. She at once gave us a more serious interest and respect for the W.P.F.L., which up to her entrance we had regarded, naturally enough, as the pastime of schoolgirls. The important meeting was not yet, however, complete, the Vice-President and the Honorary Secretary not having arrived. In course of time they put in an appearance.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The former, a Mrs. Mountcalm-Villiers, was a suburban person of doubtful summers, who had evidently spent a series of fortnights as near Paris as Le Touquet; and the latter, the Mrs. Chilvers of the title, was a rather nice, rather vague, rather affected, rather incoherent woman who had cultivated the curious trick of giving you the impression that she walked in her sleep. The ardent women, ruled over and kept to the point by the silver spoon waved by Lady Mogton, then listened to the pleasant gabble of a smarmy-headed young man in the right sort of clothes, who, as Honorary Secretary to the Men's League for Extension of Franchise to Women (hereafter called the M.L.E.F.W.), had come to put them up to what he called a "very corkin' sort of gibe," or words to that effect. A lunatic had been allowed to vote. Now, as women in the eyes of the law had been classed as lunatics, not without immense justice, here was the chance for fun, advertisement, and possibly police-scrums for eager suffragists. We fail to see why or how, but when it was said that a by-election was to be fought in the East of London, the ladies seemed to think that they could run one of their members, and chose Mrs. Chilvers. Was this play to be a bright satirical comedy on Gilbertian lines then? Evidently. Enter Chilvers, a nice-looking, perfectly composed, youngish man, with no sense of humour. He was one of the numerous members of Parliament for whom a grateful Cabinet created a lucrative post at the ratepayers' expense, and his acceptance of it necessitated, according to Mr. Jerome, a new fight for his seat. Once more the touch of Gilbert, but very amusing and harmless, all leading up to a situation of an affectionate husband putting up against a loving wife. The first curtain fell upon a good Act, giving promise of much excellent fun and whimsicality. Everything pointed to the fact that we were not requested to take the plot, the people, or the idea seriously, and we were all quite glad.

A curious feeling of growing disappointment crept over the house, however, from almost the rise of the curtain on Act II. The play took on a seriousness which was altogether out of keeping with its inaccuracy to life. The whole of Act II. was laid in the Liberal Committee-room, East India Dock Road, and after a fine, broad comedy scene between a billposter and a girl called "Ginger," who came from nowhere, settled into discussions in newspaper English, the reception of an inadvertently comic deputation, and a quarrel between the rival candidates—husband and wife. Act III. fell away from comedy to an even greater extent, and became almost hopelessly absurd. The picture of the Town Hall on the night of the counting of votes was wholly out of drawing. All the characters behaved like lunatics. Act IV. was lifted into a sort of dignity and value from the fact that it contained a very beautiful and moving scene between Chilvers, the defeated candidate, and an old woman. The play ended with a touching reconciliation between Chilvers and Mrs. Chilvers, and the whole argument of the play ended where it had begun.

Mr. Jerome had, it was found, chosen a subject unattractive for stage purposes, and, having chosen it, had treated it without the requisite knowledge of detail or the courage of conviction. Put on admirably, and played for the most part to admiration, it may achieve a certain measure of success. The odds are, however, very greatly against it. This is all the more to be deplored because managerial new blood is needed desperately at this time. It is to be hoped that the next Vadrenne-Eadie venture will contain greater elements of attraction. The success of the evening was made by Miss Sydney Farebrother, whose sketch of the old woman was perfectly exquisite. Mr. Edmund Gwenn as the billposter was a joy. Of Mr. Eadie and Miss Lena Ashwell we are only able to say that they repeated performances often seen before in their characteristic manner. Miss Ashwell, as usual, was often quite indistinct.

PEER GYNT" AT THE REHEARSAL THEATRE

THE version of "Peer Gynt" which was presented by members of the energetic Ibsen Club on Sunday evening last—the second performance of the play in England—might not meet with the unqualified approval of the purist, but it must be remembered that Ibsen's lyric drama has difficulties of production enough to disturb the equanimity of the most philosophical stage-manager. These difficulties were cleverly overcome by Miss Catherine Lewis, who arranged and produced the play in a manner which calls for high praise. True, the "scenery" was elementary—or rudimentary; canvas curtains, unpainted, and the essential chair, tree-trunk, and bed were practically all the accessories. But what of that? For once there were no distractions. "The play's the thing," and eye and ear worked in harmony; the beauty of the lines was unsullied, the general scheme evolved itself unspoiled by lengthy intervals or mysterious rumblings; the actors held the field.

Honours must go to Miss Pax Robertson for her splendid interpretation of the arduous part which makes or mars the play. With the utmost verve and energy she carried it through from beginning to end; her address to Solveig in the Third Act was delivered with a manifest appreciation of the poetry of the lines, and the mystical moments at the death-bed of Ase were full of power. It is impossible to mention all the members of a lengthy cast by name, but Mr. Maurice Elvey (who appeared by permission of Miss Julia Neilson and Mr. Fred Terry) scored a great success as the "Lean Person," bringing out the humorous aspect of his part wisely and not too waggishly. Mr. Townley Searle, as the "Button-Moulder" and as "Aslak, the Smith," made good use of his sonorous voice, while Solveig and Solveig's Mother found capable interpreters in Miss Peek and Miss Brazalgette. The action of the stage-crowds when the village festivities were in progress was excellent.

During the intervals Miss Ethel Rayson, A.R.C.M., gave pianoforte solos from Greig's "Peer Gynt" suite; especially fine was her rendering of the "Death of Ase," upon a piano which was not ideally responsive to her skill.

The whole performance emphasised the fact that it is possible to convey to an audience the true spirit and poetry of a certain type of piece without elaborate and luxurious scenery. The most beautiful and altogether satisfying presentation of one of Shakespeare's plays which the writer ever witnessed took place en plein air, in the private grounds of a Midland residence. It is true that there was scenery of a sort—perhaps the best sort—trees, grass, and a deep twilit sky; but the note of artificiality which comes in when the attempt is made to transfer these "woodland effects" to an indoor stage was pleasantly missing. In "Peer Gynt" never for a moment did we need to be reminded that we were "On the Road to Hegstad" or "Up in the Mountains." Imagination did its work secretly and well, and went hand in hand with the true poetic feeling of the artistes to achieve a success upon which the Ibsen Club is to be congratulated.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

GEORGE BORROW—II.

BORROW's most marked fault as a literary craftsman is unevenness. This is to be particularly noted in "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye." In "The Bible in Spain" the inequalities occur principally when he recollects that he is distributing Bibles, but, luckily for the charm of the book, these recollections are of short duration. He is very soon moralising, in his epic prose, on "flinty, indomitable Spain; land emblematic of your fathers," or reproducing the semi-Moorish atmosphere of Seville. In "Lavengro," and more particularly in "The Romany Rye," however, there are some very tedious chapters, and others that begin well and end badly, or end well after a bad start. Then, again, he makes almost too frequent use of apostrophe, magnificent though some of it be, and he is not altogether innocent of giving utterance to platitudes. On other occasions there are distinct traces of a slovenliness and makeshift which suggest that the labourer's task, known to have been protracted, was continued after the fire of his imagination had burnt low. Perhaps these were moments when he tried to harness a too impossible fancy to an improbable fact.

For "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye" are autobiographical fiction. They are the offspring of the marriage of Truth and Fancy. Efforts have been made to unravel the fact from the fiction, but the weaving is too cunning. Such efforts, too, are as purposeless as the Schoolmen's dissertation on the angels crowding a needle's point. The reader is led through strange adventures which take place, quite credibly, amid the most emphatic evidences of convention and civilisation. The whole fabric of society totters as Borrow ploughs his way through mid-June, dewy meadows, or as he drops down into Mumpers Dell to drink tea with Isopel. He is saturated with the Ishmaelitish instinct, and if after these incursions into odd corners where life is a hundred years behind the times, and where, left to itself, it has developed along quite original lines, the reader does not long to sleep out of doors and get wet through, he is no true Borrovian.

Borrow draws chiefly on life's underwash for his pictures, or rather vignettes, of life. He is familiar with those remnants of races which, in spite of petticoats and trousers, still recollect a life beneath the sun and stars, and still find a charm in the blue smoke and crimson flame of a wood fire on the purple heath. The men who pass in dramatic procession across these pages are those who, shunning the stress of existence, turn their energies to some single purpose, or those who feed under certain conditions the criminal classes. Borrow is versed in obscure literatures, tinctured with folk-lore and strange superstitions, relics perhaps of bygone, primeval beliefs. Laggards in the race of life; mystic turning in bitterness from the "light half-believers in their casual creeds;" the vagabond, the outlaw, and the rebel—all have place in this amazing shadow-show. Borrow is never happier than when he is among men and women whose education has been necessity, and whose conception of ancestry and posterity is bounded with their grandparents and their grandchildren.

Among these strange and interesting types stand two supreme characters—Jasper Petulengro and Isopel Berners. Fiction contains no more mysterious man than the former, and no more romantic woman than the latter. Both characters convey the same impression, but in different ways. They both compel the conclusion that civilisation is a shell; that underneath it rushes life's crude and wholesome materialism; that man and mud are one ancestry, both descendants of the great god Pan. Mr. Petulengro is as human as any poet; he pushes his hand against the wall of Death, and turns from it to find consolation "in the sun and the stars, brother," and in "the wind on the heath, brother." Such transcendent philosophy needs no creed. The heart leaps as the head thinks of the swart gipsy's joy when he feels his horse's flanks between his knees.

Isopel brings home the evidences of the natural life rather differently. She is an Eve-like woman, the proper mate for Adam. She can strike a blow for him, and rear a "lusty progeny." All men of normal feeling must read her story with amazement. If she is real, how could Borrow have let her go? If she is a creation, how could he have made her go? The question will remain unanswered to the end. Even Mr. Petulengro was puzzled.

The prevailing atmosphere of these two books is a wide-awake consciousness of life; a sense of thorns amid the roses; of firm, serviceable flesh beneath the filaments of fancy; of hills amid the mists, and good gold gravel beneath the changing surface of the stream. The books are as bracing as sea-spray to inland folk; they stir the mind and set the blood flowing; the tedious nervousness of life vanishes before the apostrophe to the Bruisers of England, or the description of the Flaming Tinman's onslaught. The reader begins to wonder why he is content to let a rain-drop or two trickle down his neck when he might be a savage and stand naked to the sweet, warm rains.

Similar experiences have gone to the making of "The Bible in Spain;" but here the author is less concerned with recording his own feelings. He has endeavoured to convey the atmosphere of Spain to inhabitants of a foggier land. There are those who say that the real Spain is quite innocent of the mystery in which Borrow has wrapped it. Certainly the schoolday, geographical impression is of a land of sand and sun, with orange groves in Seville; while the historical impression is one of overbearing and cruel pride, as in the days of the Armada, or of unworthy allies, as in the days of the Peninsular War. There is also a vague impression of a Spain subject to the Moors; but probably few readers of "The Bible in Spain" could say whether the subjection lasted two days or two hundred years.

Borrow, however, has pictured Spain as wrapped in romance. It has become a vast, mountainous, craggy land, full of historical charm, set about with Moorish and Gothic remains, and inhabited by a people that yet retain grand and courtly manners, and still speak a noble, sonorous language. What Ruskin did for Venice, an easier subject, Borrow has done for Spain. He roused admiration for her old-time grandeur and stirred up pity for her degradation.

A word about "Wild Wales" will not be out of place. Its genius and the extraordinary difference in texture between it and Borrow's other works have already been alluded to, but it cannot be pretended that it possesses the human interest of "Lavengro" and "The Romany Rye," or of "The Bible in Spain," to which it in some ways approximates. If, however, the reader wants a closer acquaintance with what may be called Borrow's building materials he must read "Wild Wales." He will find there, in a crude state, the infinite wealth of circumstantial detail which is the brick and mortar of Borrow's art—the dry and almost unconscious humour, the strong, clean diction, the lucid descriptive power, and the cold, half-priggish, and nearly sexless personality of Borrow himself. He will also find other things of intense interest; but to the critical student "Wild Wales" must be the revelation of the foundations and main timbers of the author's methods.

It may be asked wherein Borrow's genius lies, and the answer is once more paradoxical, for it lies in the fact that Borrow was an imitator so original that his work cannot be compared. Although Steele and Addison, Swift, Defoe, and Fielding, and above all, Laurence Sterne, have left their influence on Borrow, yet he has produced works that were quite impossible for any of these writers, either in style or substance. He has, indeed, vested the almost faultless eighteenth-century prose with the warmth and mystery of romantic poetry. And this is the greatest paradox of all.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

(Concluded.)

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

IX.—THE FAILURE OF THE CROWD

It is a regrettable fact that nearly every one objects to spending money on the beautiful when it is not disguised as some form or other of the useful. People are willing to purchase old chairs that they dare not sit on, or grandfather's clocks that have stopped for ever, but they will not buy a book of modern verse, not even to throw at a cat. In England we are apt to suppose that they do these things better on the Continent, but it is not true. I am told that the artists of Belgium have to go to Buenos Ayres to sell their pictures; I dare not ask the name of the place where the painters of Buenos Ayres find a market. But the fact remains that in the advanced state of civilisation which we now enjoy the man who knows how to carve hat-stands will find it easier to make a living than the man who knows how to carve flesh and blood out of rocks. When reactionary æsthetes like myself object to this condition of things, they are met with the argument that a nude statue is of no use as a hatstand; but this is only true because our hats are atrociously ugly.

We all know the collector of pictures who tells them apart by the prices he has paid for them; but, while we find him amusing, we must remember that the majority of men and women always ask the price when they are shown something beautiful, and that their judgment on its merits is largely affected by the answer to their question. I have often pondered on the possible experiences of a man who should steal half a dozen Old Masters from the National Gallery, and should try hawking them round the suburbs at 5s. each. Unless he happened on the one man in ten thousand who knows something about Art, I believe he would starve to death before he succeeded in selling an unframed picture of real merit for 5s. in Tooting or Raynes Park. All of which is merely a long-winded method of stating the impression that it is only the very exceptional person who cares about beauty at all.

I found striking evidence of this at a great fire which occurred at Brussels two or three weeks ago. I was down on the boulevards interpreting for Easter-lost Englishmen when I looked up and saw a red bud breaking in the midnight sky. It was clearly too late for a sunset and too early for a dawn; so, with what I understand to be journalistic flair, I took a tram to the scene of the conflagration. An enormous stone town-hall, built in the elaborate style of the Renaissance flamande, was burning cheerfully from one end to the other; but what lent special piquancy to the spectacle was the fact that the whole building was closely enmeshed by blazing scaffolding-poles, so that it looked like a huge set-piece. Every now and then one of these poles seemed to leap up like a monstrous rocket, to fall fifty feet or so on to the pavement below. I have seen many fires in London, but I have never seen anything nearly so beautiful as this. The firemen would have pleased Mr. Max Beerbohm, for there were enough of them to be picturesque, while it was palpable that nothing they could do would make the smallest difference. When I had watched this noble pageant for an hour, while the fire burnt ever brighter and brighter, I felt that I should choke if I did not express my enthusiasm to somebody, so I poured it on to my neighbour in the crowd. He listened to my praise with a look of horror on his face. "Mon Dieu! monsieur," he cried, "it will cost a hundred and fifty thousand pounds!"

For a moment I could hardly believe my ears; I could hardly believe that any one would be so cynical as to weigh the price before that palace of leaping fire and under those heavens gladdened with a miraculous birth of stars. Then with a sinking heart I became aware that the whole crowd was assessing the cost of the spectacle in millions of francs, and that I was probably alone in realising that we were face to face with the ideal beauty, that elusive goddess whom some of us fare so far to meet. When I picked up the newspapers next day and found them all weeping francs, it became clear to me that the town-hall of Schaerbeek had burnt for me alone, save that perhaps here and there in the crowd there had been a small boy or two young enough and wise enough to know that this loss was really a tremendous gain to those whose eyes were not blinded by cupidity. How often our pleasure in a fine play has been marred by the stupidity of the audience!

It has been proved clearly enough that the fire was due to the spirited action of an incendiary, but there is no particular reason to suppose that his identity will be discovered. I imagine that it will be ascribed in turn to the well-known malignancy of the Jews, the Jesuits, the Socialists, the Flamingants, and the Pan-Germanists; but if I were concerned for the discovery of the miscreant I should advise the police to search the ranks of the artists. Or perhaps it was an amateur musician, some mute, inglorious Nero—in any case I should say that there is one man in Brussels who feels that he has been a success where so many fail. He has achieved the creation of the beautiful, and, though the child of his spirit only lasted a few hours, he doubtless knows that beauty is not to be measured in terms of years.

The crowd is not only unable to appreciate beauty when it meets it—that, if you will, may be held to call for a special education—but it is not even capable of knowing when it ought to laugh and when it ought to weep. I have been studying the audiences at cinematograph theatres lately, and I have been uniformly horrified by their emotional cynicism. The so-called pathetic dramas at these entertainments are as utterly remote from life as anything could very well be. They are like the tales a morbid child invents for its own amusement, and while they are perhaps in doubtful taste, they certainly do succeed in exhibiting the more artificial sorrows of civilised society in a humorous light. Grief wears a fantastic mask, and the world is turned upside down to add to its excesses; but the audience never fails to weep at these audacious parodies. On the other hand the so-called comic scenes are little tragedies presented with a remarkable realism. They uniformly represent the sufferings of the individual set down in an unfortunate environment, and with psychological accuracy they emphasise the fact that the failure of one man imperils all society. A thief, perhaps, is pursued by justice and in his flight brings ruin to a hundred honest tradesmen; another man in his efforts to escape from a false position brings a whole city toppling about his ears. I confess that when I hear a crowd of men and women screaming with laughter at these spectacles I am repelled by such perversity of feeling. Surely it is permissible to laugh at our own misfortunes, but not at those of other people.

Yet, as a matter of fact, the crowd never laughs at itself. There is a hydrophobia scare in Brussels at the present moment, so when a dog entered a café the other afternoon, and, after running round half a dozen times, dived into the cellar with a cascade of bottles, I was granted a delicious picture of fifty men and women clambering on to chairs and tables. This is where the laughter would have begun at a cinematograph entertainment, but I noticed that nobody laughed. Later on, when two gendarmes armed with swords descended into the cellar to deal with the culprit, the mirth was uproarious. Yet it seemed to me that the situation was not very amusing either for the gendarmes or the dog, and that the men and women in the café would have been more discreet if they had waited to get their colour back before indulging their curious sense of humour.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

THE MAGAZINES

As might have been foreseen by no very prescient mind, the question of the ascendance of Japan is beginning to usurp attention; and the very apt question is now being asked, Were we wise, morally or empirically, in greeting our alliance with Japan and that country's victory over Russia with such exultant glee? In the Edinburgh Review for April there is a critique of Mr. Putnam Weale's book, "The Conflict of Colour" (which has already been noticed in these columns). By the very nature of the case a review cannot deal fully or independently with the subject. It is this fact, by the way, that so mars the old type of magazine, such as the Edinburgh and the Quarterly, which restrict their columns to reviews of books. The article under consideration does but give us the writer's point of view at second hand, through disagreement or acquiescence with Mr. Putnam Weale. Thus it is that the writer frets one, without substantially advancing the reader farther in the matter; and it is for this reason that we turn with some keenness to Mr. Lancelot Lawton's article on the same subject in the Fortnightly. The title of his contribution—"The Powers and the Far East"—gives it its scope. That is to say, he does not restrict his attention merely to Japan, nor to that country's victory and the fruits resulting from it; he gives the whole aspect from the international point of view, and he makes it quite clear that Japan has been guilty of a serious breach of faith. That his view on the question should properly be understood, his article in the Fortnightly should be linked with one by the same pen in Nash's Magazine entitled "Japan or Russia?" They both deserve, and should receive, careful attention. It cannot be too clearly remembered, as in the two articles he points out, that Japan is as brutally barbaric in her way as any aboriginal tribe—more so because of her mimicry of Western civilisation—and that it was by chicanery that she enlisted our sympathies in her late encounter with Russia, a chicanery she has made apparent by the sure and inevitable methods she has employed to avoid the tacit pledges she gave of observing the principle of the Open Door in the Far East. Yet, when Mr. Lawton gives us the choice of "Japan or Russia" he puts before us indeed a very undesirable brace of alternatives. It is not at all necessary, since we have leapt into the fire from the pan, that we should be compelled to scramble back into the pan. A happy alternative surely would be to recognise America as a Pacific power (in more senses than one), and to adopt an Eastern policy in unison with her. Such a union would possess as much of a moral backing as is usual in high diplomacy. But the first step would, of course, have to be to remove the weakest Foreign Minister that England has been saddled with for many years.

In the Fortnightly, also, Mr. Roger Fry has an article on "Post-Impressionism" that shows a truer power of thought than has actuated anything we have yet read on that perplexed subject. He is no mere apologist: he is a clear and careful thinker; and so he compels self-respecting, earnest meditation. For the first time he gives us a real hint by which we can trace the line of descent of the Post-Impressionists from the Impressionists; and, seizing on his suggestion, we discover that when the latter sharply emphasise the distinction between light and shade, throwing one back and bringing the other forward, they obviously gave their successors the opportunity of discarding chiaroscuro, and thus, in providing the moment for the dismissal of depth, they drove them back on linear vision. "The Religious and Moral Status of Wagner" is the title of a contribution by the lady who signs herself as Vernon Lee. It is a very excellent article; it is also an exceedingly true, and in many ways a vividly true, article; but, remembering her previous manner of writing, we can but wonder what Carlylean cataclysm has swept on her. Or has her somewhat tempestuous subject affected her? Whatever it be, it is at least interesting to see a somewhat didactic, and even maturely dignified, moraliser swept into this tornado of humour. It is refreshing also. Maxim Gorky writes on "London" with a quite lovable affection; whereas, on the other hand, Mrs. John Lane takes up one of London's most miserable objects, and either seeks to make us imagine that he is more richly contented than those who abide in comfort, or does not seek to do so, and in any case alienates our sympathies by endeavouring to make a pretty article out of an ugly subject. The mind that sees joy or comfort in a London sandwichman is surely distorted.

Lord Acton's "French Revolution" receives double attention. Mr. Hilaire Belloc deals with it in the Nineteenth Century and After, and Mr. W. S. Lilly in the Dublin Review. Each treats his subject in characteristic fashion: Mr. Belloc driving swiftly and straightforwardly at the matter before him, Mr. Lilly in a more leisurely, circumambient manner bringing into his article some of the cognate subjects treated by Lord Acton in his essays on Liberty. There is something very academic in the latter article, even as there is something very empiric about the former one. Seeing that Lord Acton's method of procedure was itself highly academic, it may be thought from this that Mr. Lilly would the better illuminate his subject; whereas the fact is that we derive from Mr. Belloc the truest insight into Lord Acton and the matters that he treated of, even for the same reason that it takes steel to strike sparks from flint. In the Nineteenth Century Mr. and Mrs. Whetham have a very statistical article on "Eminence and Heredity," and, in the way of diverse interest, Mr. Bram Stoker deals with "Irving and Stage Lighting." In the Dublin Review Mrs. Meynell avails herself of the appearance of M. Dimnet's recent book on the Brontë sisters to write an article on Charlotte and Emily Brontë. There are few writers that can be more gracious and illuminating than Mrs. Meynell, and this article is no exception to the usual style of her critical work. An article that one would expect much from should be "Fairies—from Shakespeare to Mr. Yeats." Unfortunately Mr. H. Grierson but wanders on the fringe of its possibilities.

One of the best articles in the magazines this month is by W. H. Hudson. It is in the English Review, and is entitled "An Old Thorn." This is one of those articles that defy narration, and must needs rest on recommendation. And certainly it wins recommendation. Another excellent article in the same magazine, but one that lends itself more to analysis, is "A Drama of Youth," by Mr. Richard Middleton. It is full of a humour that is tinged with irony without ever being ironical. Also it is the keener indictment of a ruthless method of education because it never seeks to indict. It just depicts the simple horror of a sensitive mind to the ordinary herding process of education. Mr. A. C. Benson describes "The Musician;" but, very fortunately for musicians, qualifies his description by limiting it to his acquaintance. Are they quite so insipid and fatuous a body of men? Or is this the result of college windows? We imagine that Beethoven and Wagner, tempestuous souls, full of boisterous humour both of them, would very much vex Mr. Benson's conception of the simple-minded, placid, humourless musician. Mr. Yoshio Markino adds to his portraiture of "John Bullesses" by a treatment by sketch and script of Suffragettes. It is sufficient to say that both sketch and script excel themselves.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The article that drew our foremost attention in Mind was "The 'Meaning' and 'Test' of Truth," by Alfred Lloyd. We cannot think that a remote terminology is ever necessary to the discussion of abstruse questions. Bergson has proved to us surely that thought can be conducted under purity of language; and what can be done in French can be done in the far richer tongue of English. This same fault (a fault, we are convinced, of mental sloth and confused perception) underlies Mr. Schiller's article on "The Humanism of Protagoras." Despite this, however, both articles repay careful reading and subsequent thought. Indeed, this is always the distinctive note of the articles in Mind. Noteworthy articles in the International Journal of Ethics are "The Meaning of Good and Evil," by Mr. J. S. Mackenzie; and "The Spencerian Formula of Justice," by Mr. Ralph Barton. Both are clear in thought and convincing in manner.

There has been wanted for a considerable time a collection of remote Jacobite songs. These have now been collected together and presented in the Scottish Historical Review, by no less a person than Professor C. H. Firth. The Cornhill will not be able to do itself justice while it endeavours to grapple with not less than two serials in so small a magazine. Perhaps it is because it is thus overweighted that its literary flavour is not very pronounced this month. The best article is by Gerald Cumberland, and deals with "Charlotte Brontë's Street in Brussels;" but the magazine needs vigour. Among the literary magazines we generally expect good things from the Atlantic Monthly, and this time we are not disappointed. It is all good, the best being "The Embarrassed Eliminators," by E. V. Lucas, and a long, and very patchy, article on "Criticism," by Anne Hard. It is strange how pedestrian and uncreative American criticism is. It seeks to make up for this by distributing evidences of portentous reading. In the Eugenics Review there are two cognate and exceedingly interesting articles. One is by Arabella Kenealy, and is called "A Study in Degeneracy;" the other, by Dr. Goddard, is entitled "Heredity of Feeble-Mindedness." Both are worth reading, even if they suggest a wealth of opposite arguments.

MUSIC

THE BIRTH OF THE SEASON

When May begins, with its usual British severity, musical people ask themselves what will be the outcome of the musical season in general and of the Opera season in particular. This year curiosity is keener than in ordinary years, for in the Coronation we have an enigmatical element. Will it mean increased brilliancy and opulent exchequers, or will music suffer from the incalculable number of other attractions? Experts are divided in opinion, and the shrewdest are inclined to a policy of caution. The Covent Garden authorities have been cautious in their programme, but have braved the wrath of the more progressive lovers of music in announcing only two new works. Their line of argument has (it is semi-officially said) been as follows. Even the most indefatigable opera-goers will have but little energy left for serious music. They will prefer the works they know, which demand no effort of intellect on their part. The bulk of the audience will, in all probability, be drawn from the Colonies and the Provinces. Hearers of this type will find even "La Traviata" and "La Sonnambula" exciting novelties. The reasoning seems financially sound, if artistically it leads to a blank negation. The two new works promised us are Massenet's "Thaïs" and Puccini's "Girl of the Golden West," and the latter will be heard in ten days or so, and we shall see whether London agrees with the American press, which does not like it, or the American public, which apparently does. "Thaïs" has been chosen because of Mme. Kousnietzoff, who is said to be marvellous in the part, and the "Méditation" is a fetish of all those who love musical sugar-plums. In the last few days there has been a rumour that we shall hear Wolff Ferrari's "Il Segreto di Susanna," a one-act work which Germany and New York have applauded, which deals with a newly-married wife who smokes cigarettes unknown to her husband, who has a sharp nose, and suspects the unwelcome presence of a male smoker. The music is said to be full of Mozartian gaiety, and we are told that the chief parts will be played by Signor Sammarco and Mme. Edvina.

The Opera will make a bold new departure, or, rather, will revive an old custom. The ballet of the Opera of St. Petersburg is to come—lock, stock, and barrel—and bring with it a selection of its repertoire, which includes music by composers of undoubted greatness. We are not promised any sensational new singers; but the question is, Are there any to be found? The Syndicate seems to think not, and neither the name of Amato, nor that of Chaliapene, with both of whom rumour has been busy, appears in the prospectus, which is rich in promise of what we already know. A new thing, of which not quite enough has been made, is the presence of some young English ladies in the chorus, which is a great gain from the points of view both of music and of spectacle.

The season has now been under weigh for about a week, and a welcome merit has been the excellent smoothness of all the performances. Ten years ago it would have been unthinkable. The only person to regret it is the diner-out, who is thus deprived of a very useful source of cheap jesting. Signor Campanini and Signor Panizza have undertaken the French operas—so far without loss of any peculiar Gallic characteristics which are valuable. Some there were who sighed for a little more anæmia in "Pelléas et Mélisande"—but then we have never had Debussy conducted by a Frenchman here. They also said that Mme. Edvina was becoming too solid and two little elf-like; but she sang like a true artist, and M. Warnéry was almost ideally childlike. M. Huberdeau has a splendid voice, reminding one of the old tag about oil and velvet, and yet not sentimental.

Mme. Tetrazzini has dazzled her audiences as of yore, but she changes less than any other artist of equal rank. What was said of her three years ago is equally true to-day (or untrue). Mme. Kirkby Lunn, on the other hand, is always doing better. When we heard her Delile, in 1909, we could hardly have believed that it could develop into the perfectly balanced and artistically perfect creation it is now. As far as singing is concerned, it stands by itself. Another thing which silences criticism, and which we have seen developing gradually under our eyes, is the Rigoletto of Signor Sammarco. He has never sung or acted it as he does now. As Renato in "Un Ballo in Maschera" he triumphs, too. His "Eri Tu" is masterly. It was in the "Ballo" that we heard the only new singers—Mme. Wittkowski, a contralto with a remarkable voice, Mme. Bland, of Vienna, a capable dramatic soprano, and Mme. Wilna, an English singer with a sweet voice and a style of some charm. In the same opera also Signor Basso returned, full of fervour and singing well, but occasionally with strident tones.

In the realm of lighter music, Mr. F. C. Whitney has made another attempt to revive real Opéra Comique, and his production of "Baron Trenck" made a bold bid for the suffrages of those who are weary of musical comedy. The plot is not fresh and is not very skilful, but it is full of movement. The humours do not wander from the story, but they are (or were on the first night) very tenuous. The singing and acting of Mr. Walter Hyde were a real pleasure, and should suffice to draw all London. Miss Caroline Hatchard, too, was very pleasing. Mr. Rutland Barrington, Mr. Walter Passmore, and Miss Marie George may be trusted to make the humorous elements stronger in time.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

ALFRED KALISCH.

THE QUEEN'S HALL

ON Wednesday of last week Messrs. Eugene Isaye and Raoul Pugno gave the first of a series of three recitals in which they propose to deal with the whole of Beethoven's Violin-and-Pianoforte Sonatas. Apart from the Kreutzer, none of these Sonatas rank very highly in Beethoven's work, and the reason is not very far to seek. For the Sonata form is obviously one that demands development of theme and amplification of treatment. But this, again, in its turn demands preoccupation of energy. In his earlier Sonatas, in the first two Sonatas of this very programme, Beethoven does indeed attempt to achieve this preoccupation, and thus to work out the form he has chosen in the way best expressive of its genius. He very soon becomes aware, however, that this is impossible. The violin and the pianoforte refuse to work in concert; and so sensitive an artist as Beethoven very soon has his preoccupation of energy destroyed by a realisation that his two several instruments are at war with each other. Therefore amplification of treatment is inhibited at the very threshold of work, and the musician has to turn his attention to engendering a warfare rather than to developing a theme. He is caught perplexed. The true Beethoven manner—the manner of the Symphonies and the later pianoforte Sonatas—is upset; and thus, in hearing the work that results, the hearer's mind must needs be restless and ill at ease.

For this reason none of these Sonatas have that imperial gesture so characteristic of Beethoven. His very energy was thwarted; for the more he developed that energy, the greater was the opposition he threw into his two instruments. He sought at first to make this the basis of development; that is to say, he sought to make his development proceed on the lines of internecine warfare. But this meant a very slender theme. It was opposed to the genius of his art form, and it was opposed to his own genius. Latterly he did manage to work his instruments in concert, and so succeeded in working out his development.

This was most noticeable in the third Sonata. The programme consisted of the first three Sonatas, and the ninth, the famous Kreutzer. The very un-Beethovenesque limpidity of the first two produced a weariness of attention. In the second movement of the first Sonata, the Tema con Variazione, all that has been said above was seen in progress. In the first, second, and third variations Beethoven is working his instruments more and more together. In the fourth variation an almost accord is achieved, and the attention is gripped with interest. In the third movement this accord is broken up again; though, since this movement is a Rondo, this, perhaps, was to be expected.

It was, however, in the third that the interest was really caught. Those who find more excitement in a fanfare of trumpets, and the very obvious use of percussion in Strauss and the Straussians, than, for example, in the effortless strength of Elgar's Concerto, will probably be wearied even with the Adagio con molto espressione of this third Sonata. True passion chooses the strings for its expression; it is the counterfeit passion of the æsthetic bully that wields the drumstick like a war chieftain. And in this Adagio Beethoven's passion, in the use of his two instruments, never sinks their diversity, but wins unity out of it. For in music, as in much else, it is unity that is strength, not diversity.

The Kreutzer has, unfortunately, won an unhappy fame from Tolstoi's unhealthy book named after it. It is, of course, a work written by a man full of passion, but we would not be ready to read sex into it if Tolstoi's hero had not set the fashion by virtue of his inflamed and prurient mind. There is probably no suggestion of sex in it at all; but if there is, it is like the prime question of sex itself in all its wonder: healthy and pure to all healthy and pure minds, and farmyard to all farmyard minds. At any rate, the Kreutzer Sonata as a piece of music was a pure delight to hear again, and purifying and exalting to the mind.

It is needless to say that Messrs. Isaye and Pugno realised almost perfect accord one with the other. This was merely a matter of practice. The accord achieved by continuous practice can nearly always be sounded by the ear. It was the far more important accord of temperamental fitness. M. Pugno's playing made the basis for M. Isaye's larger excellence; but this was as it should be, and part of the essential matter of the music. And it was to M. Isaye we looked for the bigger music and the more soulful power; this was also partly a question of the writing. It was also that M. Isaye has a passionate power that lifts him to the foremost place among living violinists. He should be careful, however, not to let this passion cause him unduly to shorten his tremolo, particularly in Adagio movements. To M. Pugno was left the finished technique that must form the basis of passion.

MY DICTIONARY

WHEN, the other evening, a friend who is noted for his candid expressions of opinion on things in general dropped into my rooms to borrow a match, he caught me with the dictionary open before me, and paid me an unexpected compliment. He remarked that surely a dictionary was not of much use to me, and hinted kindly that he had always considered me to be one of those heaven-born geniuses who invariably knew whether "accommodation" had two m's or one, one c or two; whether "development" and "judgment" should have the e docked or not—who could, moreover, explain the difference between "antimony" and "antinomy," "Acady" and "Arcady;" who never—well, hardly ever—used "transpire" when "happen" was meant, and who could say offhand whether the "asymptotes" were a tribe of Indians or a mountain range in Greece, and so on. When I suggested, after duly thanking him, that my dictionary was a most interesting book, and that it made an agreeable diversion from the pile of novels "with the publisher's compliments" which had been my mental fare for two days, he scorned me openly, and presently left with a couple of the aforesaid novels tucked under his arm. I pressed the dictionary upon him, but he would not take it.

Yet as a matter of fact I had been spending a most amusing and instructive hour in the company of the editor of that mighty tome. Impartial, non-committal, stolid, and level-headed observer of words as he may be, he cannot keep his personality out of his book; no author (and in one sense he must be regarded as such) ever can. For example, he is a humorist, for he calls an accordion "a portable musical instrument," and an animal which shall here be nameless "a well-known wingless insect of great agility." He also states that love is "nothing in tennis and some other games," which shows that he is not infallible.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

He is a student of human nature, for he defines "society" as "the civilised body of mankind." Two or three times his passionless placidity vanishes completely and the man himself emerges, as when, after defining "Zolaism" as "an attempt at a so-called realism claimed to be a proper scientific view of human nature," he adds gratuitously, "In effect Zola's books are dull and dirty, and his realism is not reality." One wonders if he read many of them, and if so, whether in the original or in translations? And does he not exceed the limits of legitimate dictionary-making in such comments?

He is punctilious, anxious above all things that his readers shall be perfectly clear in their minds as to the meaning of a difficult word. A few days ago I chanced upon the term "lycopodiaceæ" and fled to the dictionary in despair; what did I find? "A class of isoporous vascular cryptogams, having mostly a dichotomous form of branching." That is the sort of thing to inspire confidence in a man; no ordinary person would have bothered to state the case with such meticulous care.

He is not absolutely up to date, for "aviator," "aeroplane," and "suffragette" are not recognised as belonging to the English language (perhaps they do not, and never will); and although "taxis" occurs, the term has nothing to do with the taxis which buzz along the roads. But he is often suggestive; for when he informs us that the word "abyss" comes from the Greek a, "without," and byssos, "bottom," we discover that the mountaineer who estimates the depth of an abyss to be, say, 500ft. is perpetrating a joke, and that the novelist's favourite "bottomless abyss" is really tautological. Persons who coax the gay nasturtium over their trellis-work will be astonished to learn that the only meaning attached to "nasturtium" is "the watercress," and that the word is derived from two Latin roots signifying "to twist the nose."

It is pleasant to dally with these pages lazily, and light upon strange, uncouth words here and there which no one would ever suspect of belonging to our mother-tongue. Strictly speaking, they do not, but have forced their way in by the back door. Surprises await us at every turn. "Myomancy," for example, means "divination from the movements of mice." As a profession it seems to offer the advantage of being at present uncrowded. Here is a curious passage which seems to reflect in rather uncomplimentary fashion on the editor:—"Zoanthropy—a form of mental delusion in which a man believes himself to be a beast; the devout divine, Simon Browne (1680-1732), under this belief, devoted himself to the making of a dictionary. 'I am doing nothing,' he says, 'that requires a reasonable soul: I am making a dictionary.'" Thus candour and a magnificent indifference to public opinion may be added to our list of attributes of the man behind the book.

Other unfamiliar terms are there by the score, and the art of polite conversation might easily be gathered by a study of the synonyms for common things—polite, but somewhat stilted. If you are suffering from earache the fact may be dignified by announcing it as "otalgia"—it sounds worth an extra guinea on the doctor's bill; and "ptosis" denotes "inability to raise the upper eyelid;" evidently there is a name for everything if one can only find it. And the tricky little points in language, such as the shade of difference between "pence" and "pennies"—they are not neglected; it is not easy to catch the clever man napping.

Altogether, my dictionary is not to be disdained as a dry or uninteresting collection of words: it is much more than that. It is, as some guileful reviewers say, "distinctly a book to read;" and, in the same phraseology, it is to me a volume "to pass very pleasantly an hour which might otherwise be tedious." And the best of it is that one cannot possibly read it through; there always remain pages one never remembers seeing before.

PAPILLON.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

BRITISH INTERESTS IN PERSIA

BY LANCELOT LAWTON

THE outcry that followed the meeting of the two Emperors at Potsdam, and the premature publication, shortly afterwards, of an agreement between Russia and Germany, will still be fresh in the memory. Pessimism is the sleeve card of the professional scaremonger; and so it is not surprising that such an occasion should have been dexterously manipulated by certain writers in order to create gloomy forebodings concerning the virility of the Triple Entente. In this respect Dr. Dillon went considerably farther than most publicists. Boldly he announced that Russia had cynically abandoned her partners, Great Britain and France, and that the Triple Entente, never, in his opinion, very much alive, was now quite dead and done for. Yet, at the time, the only accomplished fact which by the wildest stretch of imagination could be regarded as in any degree warranting this prophetic despondency, consisted in an undertaking given by Russia to link up any railway system she might build in Persia with the Khanikin-Sadijeh branch of the Baghdad line. In the nature of things the agreement carried with it an expression of respect for mutual interests in the regions covered. In vain did M. Pichon, who was then Minister for Foreign Affairs in France, and Sir Edward Grey protest vigorously that the balance of power in Europe remained undisturbed. Their assurances were regarded merely as a manifestation of that convenient optimism which may be likened to the shield in the armoury of diplomacy.

The pertinent questions were asked, Why should Russia, who in the past had proved so uncompromising in her opposition to the Baghdad Railway, now lend willing support to the scheme? And what consideration could induce her to consent to establish a connecting-link with the German system, more especially as such a link would replace a trade route now largely used in the transit of British merchandise? It will be recalled that, a few weeks ago, I discussed the matter at some length in the columns of THE ACADEMY. It was shown then that German pressure had begun to make itself felt in Northern Persia, and that if Russia desired uncontested enjoyment of benefits accruing to her within the sphere of influence secured under the convention with Great Britain, it was imperative for her to arrive at some satisfactory arrangement with Germany. Now that the main outlines of this arrangement are known, it does not appear that the realisation of the Baghdad scheme has, in consequence, been furthered to any appreciable extent. On the other hand, however, Russia has gained very considerably, inasmuch as she is free to pursue her own way in Northern Persia without the probability of German interference.

As far as the Baghdad line is concerned, the position has undergone change in no single detail to which Great Britain could have legitimately objected. The Company has been granted the privilege of constructing a branch line to Alexandretta, on the Mediterranean, where it has also been given the right to make a new port. Undoubtedly these concessions will assist materially the growth of German power within the Ottoman Empire. But however much we may deplore the circumstance, we cannot obviate it. Turkey is at liberty to dispose of her resources as she pleases; and the most we are entitled to in the present instance is indulgence in a futile regret that it is not British enterprise that is singled out for exceptionally favourable treatment. Among Englishmen it is a common error of the day to imagine that whenever another Power gains a foothold in any part of the world, even though the means employed be those generally acknowledged as fair, our interests have been deliberately assailed, on the one hand, and wantonly sacrificed on the other. No action on the part of British diplomacy can prevent the ultimate fulfilment of the Baghdad scheme within the borders of territory that is indisputably Turkish. Nevertheless, as a nation we have the power, should occasion justify, to delay the project by withholding financial support. It is true that in the past our inclination has been towards too great a readiness to advance money to commercial rivals, the consequence of which has been, of course, detrimental to British interests. In this connection I cited recently the case of Japan, and another notable example is that of the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank - a "British" institution operating on a large scale in China, in which the Germans have a not inconsiderable stake. There are, however, distinctly encouraging signs that the public is beginning to shun those avenues of investment where the enemies of the nation lie hidden in ambush.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Within the last few weeks the pretensions of the Baghdad Company to control the last section of the line—the Gulf section—have been abandoned. In the event, however, of a new company being formed for the construction of a railway to the coast it is provided that the Germans shall have participation on an equality with that enjoyed by any other nationality partaking in the project, and that such new company shall compensate the Baghdad Company for the cancellation of its rights. In an arrangement of this kind Great Britain would not have a deciding voice. She would merely hold a fourth share in the enterprise, the remaining three being in the hands of Turkey, Germany, and France. But it must not be forgotten that the agreement is one to which only Turkey and Germany are consenting parties. The claims of Great Britain in the territory under discussion are based upon obligations we have entered into with the Sheikh of Koweit, and also upon our interests generally in the region of the Persian Gulf. While the right of Turkey to grant concessions to the Baghdad Company within her own dominions is beyond question, the matter assumes a totally different complexion as soon as she attempts to devise plans for the Gulf section. No agreement she has made on the subject with Germany can be final. The attitude of Great Britain will alone be the deciding factor. As the situation is at present it would seem that Turkey has framed the constitution of an undertaking which she has no right to originate without our consent, and she has pledged this undertaking to give compensation to Germany for the surrender of rights which in reality never existed.

Calm reflection makes it more than ever apparent that the result of the Potsdam interview has not been to stiffen Berlin policy in the Middle East. Indeed this policy required no stiffening. The Baghdad scheme always had behind it the whole-hearted determination of the German people. And this determination no human agency, save perhaps it were the sword, could thwart. Russia is in very much the same position as that in which Great Britain finds herself. It would be improper for her to interfere in an affair that is a matter of arrangement simply between Germany and Turkey. As far as the Gulf section of the line is concerned, she is not at present called upon to express an opinion, but should it be required of her she would be found loyally supporting the attitude of her partner in the Triple Entente. For the rest, face to face with German activity in Northern Persia, she has had no other alternative than that of consenting to link up the Persian railways with the Baghdad system.

In the current number of the Fortnightly Review Mr. Lynch points out that "Ocean steamers from Great Britain and from India discharge their goods at Busrah, and these goods are favoured as far as Baghdad by the magnificent waterways of the Tigris, up which they are conveyed by a British and by a Turkish service of large river steamers. Of these British and Indian goods, the proportion destined for carriage into Persia, after passing through Baghdad, alone amounts to an annual value of about a million sterling." It will be realised that if the merchandise destined to be forwarded by this route were to pass from the Gulf over a railway to Baghdad under the control of an international syndicate (in which Great Britain held only a fourth share), and from that point, first by a German railway and then by a Russian railway into Persia, trade might be unduly hampered. Apart from the fact that to some extent the communications would be in the hands of our commercial rivals, we would, as Mr. Lynch observes, be sacrificing the advantages of water carriage on the Tigris as compared with carriage over a railway. For the rest of the way into Persia a trade route which we have done much to open up would be substituted by railways under foreign control. In the course of a Parliamentary debate on the whole question Sir Edward Grey intimated that in these circumstances it was for Great Britain to seek alternative routes. Once more the critics fell to wailing. It was declared that in the mind of the Foreign Minister no definite project existed of a nature calculated to compensate us for the sacrifices we could be called upon to make as a sequel to the "railway linking" agreement between Germany and Russia, and the suggestion was renewed that the Triple Entente had mildly retreated from the Middle East at the bidding of Germany. The writer then declined to share these gloomy forebodings, and plainly stated, and repeated the statement, that time would prove that Russia and Great Britain were co-operating to mutual advantage.

Now comes the interesting news that Great Britain has applied to the Persian Government for an option to construct a railway from Kharmosseh, a point at the head of the Gulf south-east of Mohammerah, northwards along the valley of the Karun river through Ahwaz and Thuster to Khoramabad. It is significant that this application should have been tendered with the full knowledge of Russia. At first it was thought that British rights in the matter were based upon explicit promises given by the Teheran Government that as soon as railway concessions were granted to other Powers in the north Great Britain would be similarly favoured in the south, and furthermore the assertion was made that justification for our action was to be found in the circumstance that Russia was seeking the privilege of building a line from the capital to Khanikin. According to a later despatch from the Times correspondent at Teheran the British request for an option for a line to Khoramabad was not made in any sense dependent on the granting of a concession for the Teheran-Khanikin line to Russia. The same authority added the very interesting information that "Russia has hitherto made no request for this concession, and whereas the proposed English line would be highly advantageous to British trade, the advantages of the Khanikin line to Russia are very problematical. Complete harmony between Great Britain and Russia appears to prevail in the matter." Whichever version be true of the negotiations now in progress, the suggestions of the alarmists that Russia has acted in a manner inimical to our interests is palpably false. If Russia is in no hurry to build the Teheran-Khanikin line, then her agreement to establish a connecting link with the Baghdad system is virtually a dead letter. In that event her unselfish support of British claims at the present moment is a gratifying proof of real friendship. It is certainly quite reasonable to suppose that Russia, within whose Empire illimitable resources are awaiting development, should be not over anxious to embark in Persia upon railway enterprises of a more or less speculative nature. The Potsdam understanding may have committed her to connect a Teheran-Khanikin line with the Baghdad system, but it is unlikely to have included any provision determining an abitrary period for completing the undertaking. Meanwhile Russia gains relief from German intrigue in Persia. And the Potsdam trumpetings will result in Germany being left to derive what satisfaction she may out of a paper promise! British interests certainly could not suffer in a transaction of this kind!

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Ultimately Russian railways are destined to stretch south from the frontier to Teheran, and from Teheran to Khanikin. By the time that these projects, together with the extension of the Caucasian system, now in preparation, have been carried out the Baghdad Railway and the newly proposed British line in Persia will probably be completed. Then it will be possible to reach the Persian Gulf from Europe by two direct railway routes—viâ Teheran Khanikin and Baghdad to Koweit, and viâ Teheran Khoramabad to Kharmosseh. It should be explained that a connection between the British and Russian railways in the region under discussion is in contemplation. Thus, even were Russia to decide against deferring her undertaking, our trade is still protected.

The importance of recent developments in relation to the whole problem of the Middle East cannot, therefore, be minimised. British merchandise, instead of entering Persia by the Baghdad Railway, a circuitous route under foreign control, would proceed directly northwards over communications largely in the hands of British management. It is believed that, with an adequate expenditure of money, Kharmosseh can be converted into a commodious and well-protected harbour, vastly superior in every respect to Bushire, the existing port for trade in this region. Apart altogether from what might be termed regular traffic, the British enterprise engaged in the Karun oil industry will profit by the realisation of the project. Viewed in a broader sense, our interests generally must gain by the introduction of the civilising influences of a railway into a territory which has ever been the seat of tribal warfare.

The political importance of this later proposal lies in the fact that, by providing for an alternative and a better route, it does away with the complaint that the contemplated connection between the Baghdad line and the Russian railway in Persia threatened irreparable injury to British trade. Doubtless Germany will insist upon the construction of the last section of the Baghdad line to the port of Koweit. In view of our recent "move" at Teheran there does not appear to be any reason why we should go out of our way to advance this project, more especially when it is considered that there is seemingly no disposition to give us a controlling share in the suggested international syndicate. Sir Edward Grey has certainly shown an admirable initiative in practical statesmanship, and if his plans are successful and he accomplishes the removal of British interests from that absolute dependence upon the Baghdad Railway which at one time seemed inevitable, then it will be said of him that he did all within his power in a complicated situation of exceptional difficulty. Now it is apparent that Russia and Great Britain are working hand in hand in the Middle East, those critics who prematurely announced the demise of the Triple Entente are effectually rebuked by its very presence, living and robust.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

I THINK that we are less virile than we used to be. We grow tired very quickly. We began a small boom in Home Rails in February, and we casually stirred up the Rubber and Oil Markets. Really we did nothing remarkable. The effort would have been as nothing to a genuinely greedy man. Yet for the past three or four weeks we have been quite tired. The Stock Exchange was closed upon May Day to enable the jobbers to dance round the Maypole on Brighton Pier and allow the brokers to crown peroxide blondes with gardenias at the Café de Paris or the Rat Mort. One would have thought that both broker and jobber would have returned to business like immortals whose veins were filled with ichor. Nothing of the kind! They come back flabby and idle. They have just enough energy to keep prices steady. But they could not start a new rise. They were happy and hopeful, but no more.

These new issues don't go. We have had a dozen Canadian issues, all well underwritten, all with fine promises. But they fell flat. Can it be that we have had too much Canada? I hear queer stories of how the Canadian banks decline to lend any more money. I hear curious tales of stock pawned with moneylenders. It is the fashion in Canada to make what they call "mergers." That is to say, they collect a few competitive industrials and add the capitals together, double the common stock, and allow the British investor to apply for the debentures. Then they market the common stock in London. If Canada continues to grow as fast as she has hitherto grown, this common stock, which is, of course, promoters' plunder, will become valuable. But if Canada gets a set-back we shall see all this stock assessed. The companies are all registered in Canada and the boards are Canadian. There is a definite danger in this wild scramble for English money. I hear of hundreds of companies ready to be floated in London. Canada is a great and prosperous colony, but, like all new countries, she may run away from her original solid basis and get into a quagmire of financial trouble. Some very serious people in Montreal have warned us of the trouble impending. Canadian issues require to be most carefully scanned.

There are many companies promised us in the future. Oil companies, one of huge dimensions, dealing with California, to be promoted by T. S. Marshall; one to be brought out by George Macdonald; rubber companies good and bad (Parry has one of sound quality in the Malay, with Zorn and Leigh Hunt as brokers); a Canadian silk combine, of which I don't hear great things; a motor-'bus company to run the new Daimler omnibus, in opposition to the London General Omnibus Company. But the gilt-edged loan market is flat and the bankers decline to underwrite any more after the Queensland loan fiasco.

MONEY is more or less plentiful, but it will not grow much cheaper until the Treasury allows its huge hoard of fifteen millions to come out. The Stock Exchange wants cheap money, but the banker is only too glad to see large sums locked up and kept off the market. We shall not get any reduction in the Bank Rate for some weeks.

FOREIGNERS do not require any comment, for Perus remain the only stock in which there is any movement. I am assured that Peru preferences will continue to rise, but if I were a bull I should take my profit. A tip has gone round to buy, and this means that the clever people desire to unload.

HOME RAILS are wonderfully steady. A bull account exists in almost each security, yet the fall from the top is but a few points. This shows how confident buyers are that the dividends on the present half-year will be increased. I hardly like to advise a purchase, because I think we ought to get a reaction; but the market is much stronger than I could have believed possible, and I may be too pessimistic. In any case a purchase of London and North Western, Great Western, Lancashire and Yorkshire cannot do much harm, for here we are on safe ground. The smaller gambling counters may go back, and the Southern lines are specially dangerous.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

YANKEES are being supported from New York, where the bankers desire to keep a market in order to sell short-dated notes and bonds. The American railways will want tons of money in the next few years, and they are now so carefully managed that lending upon bonds or notes is as safe an investment as the most careful man can desire. Of course Paris is the one desire of the American Finance House. If Yankee railways could tap French gold they would be secure from all trouble. The French, however, do not like American railway finance. They cannot forget the old methods, which, by the way, are now completely exploded.

CANADAS have soared to new records. There are many reasons. The Montreal buyers are rich and pay for their stock. The English holders are greedy, and, as they got in well below 175, they see no reason why they should sell at 10 per cent. stock. The Wall Street gambler, who really makes the market in Can Pacs, has only a limited amount of stock in which to gamble, and a bear can be squeezed with sublime effect. This is shown in the recent rise.

RUBBER does not seem happy. If the Para people are really unable to hold up their stocks we might see a nasty slump. Brazil must see the danger of lending unlimited money on rubber with the Malay States monthly output growing so fast. The big financiers are not so eager as some people make them out to be. They also see the danger of backing up a market in face of a large hidden stock. On the whole I am inclined to think that Brazil will keep back her stock until the river falls, when she may be able to raise the price. The contracts for the new season are made in July and August, and the dealers will try and push down prices in order to force the Amazon to sell at low rates. It is an amusing but complicated battle, and no one knows which side will win. The actual market for shares in the Stock Exchange is a see-saw, which moves backwards and forwards as the bears or the bulls go up or down. It is quite safe to buy on any relapse, and still safer to sell on a rise.

OIL is the talk of the City. Do not misunderstand me. I say "talk," and I mean it. The promoters are desirous of selling all the shares they can. Therefore they talk oil. I have often told you the best shares to buy. I need hardly repeat that, as reasonable gambles, Black Sea and Kern River are good. Most of the Maikop companies are dangerous. California and Burmah are sound but over-priced. Spies are also good, but not cheap. Shells are too dear in view of the oil war.

KAFFIRS are not in favour. Yet some shares are cheap. However, no one wants to buy Kaffirs, and people will not invest in Rand shares. They want them as a gamble. This is not quite wise, for a careful man can purchase to pay 10 per cent. and still be able to amortise his decreasing lives. I will one week give a list of the cheap Kaffirs.

RHODESIANS.—We are not inclined for mining gambles, otherwise we should be tempted by the excellent reports that come in each week from Rhodesia. This is a country of small mines, but there are half a dozen mines like El Dorado, Giants, Cam and Motor, Falcon, Hay Mines that should do well for some years to come. The cheap shares are Jumbo and Rhodesia Consols.

OMNIBUS shares have been badly mauled. The bulls have counted upon a monopoly. Why they should have imagined that so simple a thing as an omnibus was beyond the scope of a promoter I can't conceive. Any one can build, any one can run an omnibus. Whether even the London General can make one pay is another matter. 'Bus stock is to-day much over-priced and should go lower on intrinsic merits.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

CORRESPONDENCE

"MARRIAGE AND COMMON SENSE"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—Some of your readers who are familiar with Mr. Arthur Machen's prowess as a logician are doubtless anticipating a pungent reply from him to the letter of "R. W.-S." To cast aspersions on Mr. Machen's logic is, indeed, to beard the lion in his den, to pull the prophet's beard, to invoke the Jovian thunders! Meanwhile, another point suggests itself to me on beholding the prize-ring of the correspondence columns thus thrown open. Here we have Mr. Machen, good man, entrenched in his citadel, directing the fire of his artillery on all and sundry who happen not to be as rigid in their adherence to the letter of the law as he is, concentrating it especially upon Mr. Cecil Chapman in that he has dared to write a book which presents another side of the question; and here we have Mr. Chapman equally confident, in his possibly wider experience of the rough-and-tumble of humanity, that the spirit of the law is better served by a certain laxity, in view of modern stress and change. Between them we have a spectral "R. W.-S." gently remonstrating with Mr. Machen for his undue dogmatisms. My idea is that argument on such a subject is futile. Argument does not invariably "clear the air"; it occasionally increases hostilities or brings matters to a deadlock, especially when the disputants are both ultra-confident in the correctness of their views. The only reasonable way of arriving at a decision would be for each to state his case clearly, coolly, and concisely, and for a third party—the reader—to form his own opinions. It is not much use instancing the procedure of the "Jews of Bombay," as does Mr. Chapman; nor is it of much avail to argue as though the population of England consisted wholly of church-going Christians, as Mr. Machen seems to do. We are a mixed crowd, and the via media, if there be one, will not be discovered by such methods.—I am, Sir, etc.,

MARJORIE.

BOOKS RECEIVED

EDUCATIONAL

A Scheme of Work for Elementary Schools. By Miss A. Gertrude Caton, S.Th. Blackie and Son.

PERIODICALS

Economic Review; Cornhill Magazine; Windsor Magazine; Night and Day; Literary Digest; Bulletin of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, N.Y.; Fortnightly Review; The International Journal of Ethics; Saga Book of the Viking Club; Blackwood's Magazine; Friendly Greetings; Everybody's Story Magazine; Boy's Own; Woman's Magazine; Nineteenth Century and After; Bookseller; The International; The Antiquary; St. Nicholas; Publishers' Circular; Educational Times; Wednesday Review; Records of Sport; Deutsche Rundschau; Revue Bleue; English Review; American Historical Review; The Vineyard; Harper's Magazine; Book Monthly; University Correspondent; Conservator.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service viâ Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, ——PALERMO, NAPLES.——

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

DELICIOUS COFFEE.

RED WHITE & BLUE

For Breakfast & after Dinner.

In making, use less quantity, it being so much stronger than ordinary COFFEE.

"THE BOOK MONTHLY."

The May "Book Monthly," which is now ready, Sixpence net, contains an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the well-known novelist. It also has various other articles of a literary interest, and all the news about the new books. Its illustrations are an engaging feature as usual, and, in fine, the May "Book Monthly" is worth getting. The publishers are Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send a specimen copy free on application.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ACADEMY
AND LITERATURE

No. 2036 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MAY 13, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

THE ECONOMICAL

AN EXAMPLE.
Running Costs for One Year, covering 9,279 miles, at Half the Cost of a Taxi-Cab.

MADE IN TWO SIZES—25h.p. and 45h.p. Both 6 Cylinders.

Sheffield Simplex

Read the following from the owner of a luxurious 45h.p. 6-cylinder "SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" Cabriolet Car:—
"Northampton, January 29th, 1911.
"By the 1st February I shall have had my car 12 months. The distance I have run is 9,279 miles, and the cost 4.4d. per mile."

"SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX" are strikingly simple in design, exceptionally sound in mechanical principles, with which is combined the finest possible workmanship AND SPECIALLY CREATED SHEFFIELD STEELS.

Catalogues post-free on application to Dept. "A."

The SHEFFIELD-SIMPLEX MOTOR WORKS, Ltd.
TINSLEY, SHEFFIELD.

London Depot: c/o MULLINERS, 132-135, LONG ACRE, W.C.
SCOTLAND:—MIDDLETON & TOWNSEND, 56, Belford Road, Edinburgh. LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE:—THE HOLLINGDRAKE AUTOMOBILE CO., Stockport.
SOUTH WALES:—GEORGE ACE, LTD., Warren Street, Tenby. AUSTRALIA:—MURRAY AUNGER, LTD., Adelaide, S.A. MOULDER BROTHERS, Sydney, N.S.W.

T. McLEOD, Consulting Engineer & Naval Architect, Marine Surveyor, Yacht Agent, &c. . . .

STEAM AND AUXILIARY YACHTS FOR SALE OR CHARTER.
SURVEYS (FOR DAMAGE REPAIRS OR PURCHASE) UNDERTAKEN.

Superintendence during Building, Alterations, or Repairs, of all classes of Vessels, whether Steam (Reciprocating or Turbine) or Oil Engines.
Designing to any special requirements. :: Yachts economically managed for owners.
Insurances effected at Lloyds.

Teleg. Address: "McLEOD, WEST HARTLEPOOL." Highest Referenees. Telephone: 89 HARTLEPOOL.

23, Church Street, WEST HARTLEPOOL.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

TYPEWRITING.

Literary and Scientific MSS. carefully typed by London Undergraduate (Inter-Science). Translations from French and German.

GEORGE H. HONE, 50, Bishopsgate, E.C.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

A perfect Writing Fluid. Best for Fountain Pens and Office use. In Bottles, 1d. to 3/- each.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C.

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

YOUNG AUTHORS.—Success in journalism. Full criticism and advice for publication given by literary and journalistic experts. Full particulars, write J. Murray, Leylands, Wells, Norfolk.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

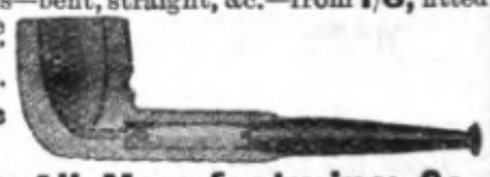
MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.



Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.

THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Book-finder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOK-SHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

ANNUAL CATALOGUE, 1911.
GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF PUBLISHERS REMAINDERS
is now ready, and will be sent on application.
Comprises a great variety of books in all departments of literature at special BARGAIN PRICES.
WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.
Librarians should apply for this useful Catalogue.

EDWARD WHISTLER,
11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.
Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.
CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

GEORGE ODELL,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

OPHTHALMIC AND MATHEMATICAL OPTICIAN
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.
BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

THE ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	571
Song Forsaken	572
Felo-de-Se?	572
Some Characteristics of Modern Irish Poetry—I.	572
Wagner's Autobiography	574
Reviews:—
The Life of Lord Goschen	575
Two Warriors of Old Japan	577
The American Commonwealth	578
Robert Louis Stevenson	579
"In Loco Cambrigiensis"	580
Sport and a Sportsman	581
Awakening Asia	581
The Surprising Chevalier	582
Reviews (continued)—
Some Light on the Near East	583
Shorter Reviews	583
Fiction	584
The Royal Academy—II.	586
The Theatre	587
Our Prison System	588
Some New French Books	589
Fifty Years of Modern Italy	590
Our Pantisocrats	591
Art	592
The Poet's Holiday—X.	593
Sheffield Musical Festival	594
Foreign Affairs	595
In the Temple of Mammon	596
Correspondence	597
Books Received	598

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED, 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

With next week's ACADEMY we shall issue an eight-page "Empire Supplement." Articles by contributors of special knowledge, experience, and authority will appear, and will deal in an interesting manner with affairs of the Colonies and the British Empire generally.

MR. JUSTICE WARRINGTON'S decision in the recent action brought to test the validity of "Form 8" is another blow to that marvellous and—according to Mr. Lloyd George—perfectly simple measure, the People's Budget. "Form 4," which was so simple that its originator was obliged to have repeated consultations with specialist authorities in Downing Street, eventuated in a somewhat ignominious position of affairs. Those to whom it was sent were informed with regard to certain questions that they might partly answer them, that they need not answer them at all, or that they could give what answers they liked. It reminds us of the inquisitorial question which husbands were at one time required, under this Bill, to put to their wives, as to the amount of their income: an inquiry which caused much domestic dissension, and which was eventually disposed of by the suggestion that a blank "I don't know" might be the reply. Probably in some cases words of additional embellishment were added. At any rate, "Form 4" fell down the hill to oblivion, and "Form 8" comes tumbling after.

Shakespeare and Stratford-on-Avon, Shakespeare and the old Globe Theatre, are familiar associations of personality and place; but the linking of Shakespeare's name with Whitehall is less frequent, save perhaps to the student specialising upon Elizabethan affairs. The connection was emphasised in a pleasant manner on Saturday last by the meeting of the London Topographical Society at the Board of Trade Offices, under the presidency of Lord Rosebery. Several curious points with regard to the London of olden days were touched upon in the various interesting speeches. Mr. Ernest Law, for instance, mentioned the fact that when the "Great Hall," situated in what is now Horse Guards' Avenue, was required for other purposes, plays were occasionally given in the "Cockpit," the site of which is at the back of No. 10, Downing Street; and Lord Welby put rather startlingly the contrast of past and present when he remarked that on that actual site stood now the rooms of the Permanent Secretary and the Financial Secretary to the Treasury. Some of the old Cockpit buildings, said Lord Rosebery, existed well into the nineteenth century, and now that we have learned to recognise Shakespeare as Groom of the Chamber in Whitehall Palace, "we may look out for further revelations as to his close connection with the Court." The subject is inexhaustible, and there will be evidently plenty of room in a year or two for more volumes on Shakespeare—even apart from the literary side. Incidentally, Mr. Law gave an intimation of Shakespeare's early fame which completely eclipses the exploits of Mr. Somerset Maugham or Mr. Shaw. "There was a record," he said, "of eight plays being given in one week, and thus we have King James anticipating Sir Herbert Tree 298 years ago by giving in His Majesty's Theatre, only a few yards from where His Majesty's Theatre now stands, in the Haymarket, a cycle of Shakespearean plays in the dramatist's own lifetime."

We welcome with great pleasure the appearance of the first number of the official organ of The Land Union. Unlike most, or at all events many, official organs, it is quite readable, and it is packed with material which will be appreciated by all of those who waged such a just and gallant fight against Mr. Lloyd George's People's Budget. The first contribution, "The Broad Case Against the Land Taxes," is an admirable short article by Mr. Harold Cox, who so successfully and humorously exposed the grotesque absurdity of the proposal to tax ungotten minerals. Many of the other articles contain warnings which will be extremely useful as cautions to those whom the Land Taxes are calculated, if they were not devised, to bleed to death. We have before described the policy of the Government ever since they assumed office as a prolonged conspiracy against employment. No wonder that they are now proposing measures to support in idleness those whom their reckless legislation has deprived of their means of subsistence! Mr. E. G. Prettyman has a forcible article, entitled "The Badge of the Tribe." In the Supplement will be found Parts I., IV. and VII. of the Revenue Act of 1911, with explanatory notes. We think that the new journal, The Land Union, should be found in every estate-office, and any one who is subject to be plundered under the Act of 1911—and who is not?—will do well to expend, however difficult he may in these days find it to do so, 3d. weekly in the purchase of an advisory journal which may conceivably save him many times that sum.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SONG FORSAKEN

When I went forth singing,
  Then all things made me glad,
Flower, star, and songbird,
  Such joy I had.

Ah, the dreams I cherished,
  The songs I fashioned then,
You shall find them treasured up
  In quiet homes of men.

The wise man came and counselled me
  Gold to win, to keep,
I heard his evil counsel,
  I put my soul to sleep.

I have a silver tankard,
  A golden finger-ring,
But my soul withers in me,
  I have no songs to sing.

ETHEL TALBOT.

FELO-DE-SE?

Is it conceivable that the House of Lords, fearing death, will, at the bidding of Lord Lansdowne and Mr. Austen Chamberlain, perpetrate suicide? Suicide on the most irrational grounds, and at a juncture when courage to live would be sublime, refuge in self-slaughter a reproach to the heirs of glorious traditions—of battles fought and won for the freedom and progress of the people?

The existing members of the House of Lords are but trustees for the nation of an institution which has deserved well of it, and which holds a secure position in its esteem and affection.

Why and wherefore all this twaddle about reform, which is no reform at all, but revolution thinly disguised? Why flight from the path of duty when the country on appeal has lately endorsed the action of the House in referring to it the so-called Budget of 1909? What possible defence of flouting the registered decision of the country can be alleged?

There is but one halting palliation, and the House of Lords should be the last body to advance it. True, the country condemned the Budget, but the House of Commons, as the result of a bargain in defeasance of the verdict of the country, upheld it.

Why should the House of Lords argue thus—the country condemned the Budget; the House of Commons by a device overruled the decision of the electorate; are the Lords to argue, ergo—"We hold ourselves condemned, hurry to array ourselves in sackcloth and ashes, and rush to revolution. We cannot even possess ourselves in patience until the Government—coercing their antagonistic elements—can produce a plan of reform, as they admit they are bound to do. We must smooth their path, we must show that the best plan we can produce covers us with contumely and ridicule, and we must provide them with a powerful argument for declining any attempt to redeem their promise to the electorate"?

Prince Arthur, with a sure and cruel death in front of him, bravely essayed an attempt at freedom and existence—

"As good to die and go, as die and stay."

Cannot the House of Lords, if die it must, meet its doom with dignity and courage?

What an inscription with which to blazon the degeneracy of the successors of the haughty Barons who upheld the honour and freedom of England in peace and in war!

"Superfluous lags the veteran on the stage."

Certain members of the House of Lords have been accustomed during the last two decades to promote academic discussions on reform of the House; amongst them the foremost has, of course, been Lord Rosebery, the most brilliant and the least practical of politicians. Others who have been proud to tread in his footsteps, not endowed with his Northern caution, have endeavoured to outstrip him in the race. Lord Rosebery dwelt, according to custom, in an atmosphere of resolution—or shall we say irresolution? In very eloquent language he shadowed forth aspirations and, satisfied with applause, relapsed into indolence. His imitators proceeded to the logical conclusion. They formulated measures wrapped in mantles of nescience. They pricked the bubble, and the liberated gas asphyxiated their reputations.

We are sorry that Lord Lansdowne has failed to profit by observation and experience, and has produced a scheme which, if it were the progeny of any other man, we should not hesitate to describe as grotesque, but in deference to the noble Marquess we will only designate as negligible.

Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman—less urbane than ordinarily—once remarked, if we are not mistaken, "Enough of the foolery." We do not wish to suggest that any such expression would be courteously correct or properly applicable to the scheme of the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Lords. We do, however, say—and we say it after a long experience and one or two laborious and futile excursions in the same region—that the House of Lords cannot be tinkered into an amorphous mass which is not the House of Lords at all, and which would be a byword amongst Legislative assemblies.

Having admitted that the hereditary principle is indefensible, by what sort of logic can you retain so much of it as is convenient for manipulating a majority for yourselves? Then, again, as members of the House of Commons are not honest and independent enough to recommend names to the Lord-Lieutenant for appointment as Justices of the Peace, by what sort of logic will they be possessed of all the virtues when participating in the election of 120 Lords of Parliament? Every one is apparently to be eligible for election to the "House of Lords." Our old friend the working man who never works may display his vast abilities in the morning on the reconstituted Bench, and, as Lord Shirker, deliver polished orations from the red benches in the evening. We draw a veil over a painful vision.

If proof were wanted that the House of Lords cannot be transformed into something which is not a House of Lords, Lord Lansdowne has conclusively afforded it.

The responsibility of proposing a reformed Second Chamber rests with the Government. Let the Opposition leave them "to stew in their own juice," and exclaim with Macbeth—

Why should I play the Roman fool, and die
On mine own sword?"

CECIL COWPER.

SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF MODERN IRISH POETRY—I.

"SHALL I be thought fantastical," asks Charles Lamb, "if I confess that the names of some of our poets sound sweeter, and have a finer relish to the ear—to mine, at least—than that of Milton or Shakespeare? It may be that the latter are more staled and rung upon in common discourse."

That is one way of saying that the poets whose names he found sweetest were, in a sense, a discovery of his own, and therefore, whatever their particular merits, they had for him a personal and intimate meaning not offered by the great masters whose words are on the lips of all. It is easy to admire the poets who the critics tell us are to be admired; it is more difficult to persuade ourselves that the admiration is wholly sincere and spontaneous. For most of us it is a rarer pleasure to find something to admire "all by our own selves," as the children say. There is nothing more refreshing at times than to leave the broad and beaten highway of fame, trodden flat by the feet of devout pilgrims, for a by-path of literature where there is at least a possibility of some new and exciting discovery. It is true the path may be uneven, and the overhanging branches may at times render it obscure, but here and there the wanderer is rewarded by a glimpse of some retired and delicate beauty whose sudden freshness appeals more to the heart than the obvious glories of the open road.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

It is, in other words, a delight to have an opportunity of forming one's own opinions and of reading poems which have not had the doubtful advantage of explanatory prefaces and learned, copious, and distracting footnotes. The works of the minor poets of the new Irish school are sufficiently unknown to offer a delightful field to the ignorant and unprofessional critic, a still untrodden byway to the amateur explorer. I should recommend any such to beg or borrow them, if they will not buy: to steal them is not worth while, for among many other merits they possess that of cheapness. They issue from the press in little square and oblong booklets, costing from a shilling to half-a-crown. Not for them the scarlet and green and gold, the tooled morocco and padded russia of those who have "arrived;" but instead, sober suits of brown or green or grey paper, or, at best, of linen with a twisted Celtic border.

I am not going to speak of the leaders of the movement in Ireland; they are too near the high-road and the finger-posts of fame for a rambling excursionist with no settled itinerary. The books which prompt the following remarks have been picked up at random, and there must necessarily be many gaps in their ranks; but it is possible to learn from them "which way the wind blows" in Ireland to-day.

I am told that in France, where men seem to have a natural flair for literature, the critics hold that Ireland is the scene of the only considerable literary movement of the present time. However this may be, it is obvious even to the most casual of amateurs in literature that there is in progress some sort of renaissance—a stirring of life after long and barren years. The Irish Press has issued, I should suppose, more volumes of verse in the last decade than in the previous half-century, and though quantity is not quality, it too has its significance. We may be watching the beginnings of a great literary rebirth, or but a passing phase of fashion—impossible as yet to say which—but even fashions have their interest, and the Irish movement has still the undoubted charm of novelty.

In the poetry of modern Ireland there are naturally very varying degrees of merit, and very wide divergences of style and treatment; but there are also such strongly-marked general characteristics as give to the separate volumes of verse a more than individual interest, and mark them as not merely the outcome of isolated or sporadic impulse, but as the outward sign of some hidden process in the life of the nation.

The most striking of these common characteristics, and one not to be ignored by the most careless reader, is love of country. The dominant note in every instance is "Ireland." Throughout her history Ireland has always inspired a passionate love in her children; she possesses for them an inexplicable, a potent charm—a fascination which even strangers sometimes feel:—

> Not the slopes of Rhine with such yearning are remembered (1),
> Not your Kentish orchards, not your Devon lanes.

(1) Stephen Gwynn.

Never has that yearning found more fervent expression than in the poetry of to-day. The poets of the Young Ireland of the nineteenth century were patriotic too, but their feeling took a more belligerent and at the same time a more stereotyped form; it was a political principle rather than a conviction of the mind, and they expressed it in symbols which had in them little that was characteristically Irish. To-day love of country seems to be the very breath of the poet, and in passing it may not be out of place to say that a feeling so spontaneous and so unanimous is not likely to be, as some would have us think, the swan-song of an exhausted and expiring nation, but rather the happier impulse of one "musing her mighty youth," and inspired by youth's divine and rhapsodical fervour.

Where the poems do not deal directly with love of country they are full of Irish names and of allusions to Irish story. For almost the first time Irish writers are seeking their inspiration at the well-springs of their national literature—Helen is superseded by Deirdre, and Achilles gives place to Cuchullin. Take at random any of the volumes, and you shall find such titles as these:—Clan Lir, To the Leanan Sidhe, Irish Hymn, Tir na n-Og, After Aughrim, Grainne after the Death of Diarmuid. This concentration on native resources seems to me to be an indication of strength—as borrowing is a confession of weakness; it is a kind of Sinn Fein policy carried into the realm of letters. There is enough material in the ancient literature of Ireland to furnish forth a hundred poets, and the men of to-day are in some sense the heirs of the bards of a thousand years ago.

They have inherited with their stories some of their main characteristics, and of these one of the most arresting is their love of Nature. This love is distinctive of the early Irish tales, and it is equally prominent in the poems of the twentieth century. There is in them a passion for the unspoilt country-side, the clean air of mountain, wood, and field. In these days of complicated and tortured psychology, of self-conscious probings into the problems of the unnatural life of towns, it is a real refreshment to dwell in spirit with men for whom—in their books, at least—such problems do not exist; men who are content to watch "the little wind that laughing across the water blows" (2), or to wander where

> The mists of bluebell float beneath
> The red stems of the pine; (3)

Or to see in the bending poplars an image of the dead

> Swaying in some sad dance by shady Acheron (4).

What Seosamh MacCathmaoil says of himself might be said with equal truth of many of his fellow-poets:—

> I am the mountainy singer—
> The voice of the peasant's dream,
> The cry of the wind on the wooded hill,
> The leap of the fish in the stream.

Here and there we come on touches of description that, with a rigid economy of words, yet bring a poignantly clear picture to the eye:—

> When rooks fly homeward
> And shadows fall,
> When roses fold
> On the hay-yard wall,
> When blind moths flutter
> By door and tree,
> Then comes the quiet
> Of Christ to me (5).

(2) S. O'Sullivan. (3) T. Boyd. (4) S. O'Sullivan
(5) S. MacCathmaoil.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Again, we find an expression of feeling for Nature that is almost personal in its intensity :—

The great waves of the Atlantic sweep storming on their way,
Shining green and silver with the hidden herring shoal ;
But the little waves of Breffny have drenched my heart in spray,
And the little waves of Breffny go stumbling through my soul (6).

One and all they go to Mother Earth for inspiration :—

And the old brown woman answers mild,
" Rest you safe on my breast, O child.
Many a shepherd, many a king,
I fold them safe from their sorrowing.
Gwenever's heart is bound with dust,
Tristram dreams of the dappled doe,
But the bugle moulders, the blade is rust,
Stilled are the trumpets of Jericho,
And the tired men sleep by the walls of Troy.
Little and lonely,
Knowing me only,
Shall I not comfort you, shepherd boy ? (7).

WAGNER'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY

The publication of Wagner's autobiography has been looked forward to very eagerly and very keenly discussed, and, as is usual in such cases, a great deal of wild nonsense has been talked about it. We were led to expect sensational revelations about Wagner himself and all kinds of other people. We were told to anticipate information which would revolutionise our opinions about Wagner's works and his contemporaries. Mr. Bruckmann, of Munich, has now published the book in German in two handsome volumes of light blue, embracing nearly nine hundred pages ; but we shall have to wait with what patience we may for the English translation. It will be issued by Messrs. Constable in due course.

Nearly everything we have been told beforehand about the book turns out to be fiction, but none the less it is an invaluable addition not only to Wagner literature, but we may almost say to the literature of biography. It is an extraordinarily interesting book, quite apart from the fascination of the subject. Some time ago a lady who, in spite of the precautions taken by the Wagner family, had seen a copy, announced that it was valueless and badly written. Both statements are very wrongheaded. It is well known that, as a man of letters, Wagner was a Jekyll and a Hyde. He could, as his letters show, write terse, nervous, picturesque, and humorous German, but when he mounted the professorial chair and discoursed on matters of art his style became the ne plus ultra of turgid complexity. We have samples of both in the book, but fortunately the professorial pages are comparatively very few in number.

The great merit of the book is that it gives an extraordinarily vivid and life-like picture of Wagner, far more so than any other book that has been written about him. Not only that, it shows a Wagner quite different from the impossible creature of convention. It has always been a puzzle how a neurotic, choleric, aggressive, dictatorial egoist such as we have been led to believe him to have been could ever have gained the passionate admiration and affection with which his friends regarded him, and it is still more hard to believe that such a person could have done the amount of work he did in his lifetime, or could ever have carried through a scheme requiring so many qualities of the highest diplomacy as the building of the Bayreuth Theatre. This book makes all these things comparatively clear. We see that, in spite of his excitability and susceptibility, he had an enormous fund of level-headedness and grim determination, which nothing could shake, and a large fund of warm sympathy for all kinds of men and things.

One of the most attractive things about the book is the impression which a reading gives one of being in contact with a personality inspired by a consciousness of pre-eminent strength and of being predestined to do a great work in life. The question whether the picture here drawn is true to life or not is sure to be discussed with some violence. It can only be said that if it is not true it is a great work of fiction, better worth reading from that point of view than nine-tenths of the novels which are poured from the Press.

The fact that the story ends in 1864, when Wagner went to Munich in obedience to the summons from the King, robs it of some of what may be called the topical interest, but there is a great deal that is vastly interesting about Wagner's contemporaries, such as the glimpse of Weber acting as cook for his friends at a picnic—the Duke of Wellington in a grey beaver hat with his hands in his trouser-pockets ; Joachim and Brahms as enthusiastic youths ; Saint-Saëns as a brilliant student ; Mr. " Mac Farrine," whom he could not abide, and his overture " Steeple Chase " (by which is meant " Chevy Chase ") ; and Cipriani Potter, to whom he took a fancy ; Spontini, who told him that opera had gone in his own hands as far as it could ever go. Of his musical development Wagner has a good deal to say. He tells us how he first became acquainted with Weber's music by means of a military band, how he was for a time under the spell of Italian opera and " started " " Euryanthe," how he wrote an " extra number " for " Norma," and how he was at first puzzled and repelled by Berlioz's music and then fascinated by it.

He tells us a great deal, too, about his extreme calm when " Tannhäuser " was being hissed in Paris. He felt, he says, as if in a dream and watching some catastrophe of Nature with which he had no near concern. That was his feeling whenever he heard his own music.

The most interesting piece of psychological analysis is a passage in which he describes what he felt when he was being married to Minna Planes. It was, he says, as if his whole self was being carried away by two contending currents, one above the other, the upper one turned to happiness and the sun, the lower rushing towards darkness and disaster. The whole account of his relations with his first wife is curiously judicial. He speaks with gratitude of her heroism during the dark days in Paris, but realises that she had no sympathy with him after his conduct—which she thought unpardonably reckless—had deprived her of the title of Frau Kapellmeisterin, which was the summit of her worldly ambition. It appears that she had more to do with the breaking-off of relations with the Wesendoucks than is clear from the correspondence.

Lovers of " Die Meistersinger " will read with special interest of his walk at Marienbad during which he first had the idea of the Master singing a song, and the mistakes being punctuated by the strokes of the cobbler's hammer. This was the gem of the music drama. He tells us, too, which is not common knowledge, that his first idea was to have all the Valkyries assembled on Brünnhilde's rock in the first Act of " Götterdämmerung."

To conclude, it is one of the books which everybody ought to have read.

A. Kalisch.

(6) Eva Gore Booth. (7) N. L. P., in " The Native."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE LIFE OF LORD GOSCHEN

The Life of George Joachim Goschen, First Viscount Goschen, 1831 to 1907. By the Hon. Arthur D. Elliot. With Portraits. In Two Volumes. (Longmans, Green and Co. 25s. net.)

By Sir William Bull

[Second Notice]

We dealt last week with the first fifty-four years of the life of this devoted public servant, who had risen by sheer merit to a place in the confidence of his Queen and her principal advisers that was almost unique. In the December of 1885, at the express wish of Lord Salisbury, the Prime Minister, the Queen had put herself into communication with Mr. Goschen, and a long correspondence subsequently took place directly between them. Her Majesty's letters show the great reliance she placed in the patriotism and wisdom of Mr. Goschen.

At the General Election of 1885 the whole Irish Nationalist vote had been thrown—so far, that is, as Mr. Parnell and his colleagues could effect it—upon the Conservative side. The "Hawarden Kite" on Home Rule had changed all this, and when Mr. Gladstone, the Leader of the Opposition, rose to reply to the Address, the ovation he received showed that the centre of gravity had shifted, and that, in the view of the Irish Nationalists at all events, Liberals were to be henceforth led to the support of no mere extension of local government, but to carry out the policy of separating the political nationality of Great Britain and Ireland, for which Mr. Parnell and his associates had so long and so passionately contended. And, here let us remark, Mr. Elliot has brought out his biography at a most opportune time. The political student can learn from his lucid pages how the great struggle of a quarter of a century ago commenced and was carried on.

Mr. Goschen and Lord Hartington were beginning to consider what they should do. In spite of Gladstone's dominating personality, they were quite firm from the first that Home Rule would never do; but it was Goschen who appears to have kept Hartington up to the mark: "I spoke to Hartington in the strongest terms—I said it would be disastrous if he disappointed the Liberals in giving them a lead against Home Rule—that we must not think of party." Then came Jesse Collings' "three acres and a cow" amendment. Hartington had made up his mind, and he supported the Government, followed by Goschen and some eighteen or nineteen Liberals. But it was no good; the Liberal party as a whole, backed up by the Parnellites, voted together, and the Salisbury Ministry was at an end in a manner characteristically English, for, as a result of a division which had nothing whatever to do with Home Rule, Gladstone once more found himself Prime Minister—but at a terrific cost.

All the finesse and wavering at that anxious period is admirably depicted by Mr. Elliot, who was an active and militant Member of Parliament at the time. It is partly described in letters from Goschen to his friend Sir Robert Morier, the Ambassador at Petersburg. Hartington was a practical statesman—he was willing to break with his old leader, but he looked ahead. "Are you prepared," he asked, "not merely to condemn Home Rule, but to face the necessary consequences of its rejection?" That was the question. The answer came when Mr. Gladstone, now Prime Minister, commenced to form his Cabinet. He applied to Hartington, Goschen, James, Bright, Derby, Northbrook, Selborne, and other lifelong Liberals, but they all refused, and Home Rule received its first check.

Mr. Trevelyan, and some others who were known to disapprove of Home Rule as strongly as Lord Hartington, unfortunately took a weaker line in the hope that when Mr. Gladstone's proposals were submitted to the promised examination some practicable and satisfactory prospect might result. Chamberlain's position is shrewdly described—how he came to join the Government and how without inconsistency he left it. Mr. Gladstone's friends thought it was of the utmost importance that the Home Rule scheme when it saw the light should appear to be entirely Mr. Gladstone's own. It would not do to let it be seen too plainly that the Liberal Leader was simply accepting the policy and measure of Mr. Parnell.

One cannot help pausing here to notice how history repeats itself. The course of the next few months was an anxious time for every one. Liberals still desperately hugged the belief that in some way or other the ingenuity of Mr. Gladstone would save the situation. The 8th of April was to clear the air—for on that day the Bill was to be introduced, but on the 27th March the Government received a second blow—Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Trevelyan both resigned!

Mr. Gladstone, in spite of all this, persevered, and in an eloquent speech of three and a half hours developed his scheme. Then, as usual, everybody poured out into the lobby to talk it over—it is curious how rapidly the House of Commons makes up its mind. The lobby was against the Bill from the first. "I bet this Bill never passes its second reading," muttered a Liberal lawyer. "Done with you," said the undaunted Labouchere, "shall we say a hundred?" "I am no betting man," said the lawyer; "let's make it a guinea," which he valiantly doubled a fortnight later and won! Lord Hartington took the lead of the dissentients, to the great joy and satisfaction of his unselfish henchman. Strenuous nights and days followed—fierce argument in the House—reams of correspondence in the Press—meetings here, there, and everywhere. It was plain the country would not stand the tearing-up of the Act of Union, and on June 8th there was a majority of 30 against the Bill. It is interesting to read in the light of history how Gladstone triumphantly pointed to the success of Home Rule in Austria-Hungary, Sweden and Norway, since the latter twain have peacefully drifted into separate nations, and it is thought by many that at the end of the present reign Austria and Hungary may do the same.

But the victory was not won without cost. Goschen was beaten in East Edinburgh and Trevelyan in the Border Boroughs, very much as the uncle of the latter, Lord Macaulay, had been beaten nearly forty years before. Gladstone paid a generous tribute to his old friend and new opponent in a letter to Granville:—"Goschen supplies soul, brains and movement to the body. Can Hartington get him a seat? Can he form a Government without him? Ought we to wish for a Salisbury or a Hartington Government?" It was round Goschen that the Unionist Alliance was really formed.

Writing to Goschen on July 24th, 1886, Hartington said: "Lord Salisbury came to me this morning to tell me that he wished to tell the Queen that he thought I ought to form a Government." . . . [In the event of refusal] "It is possible that there may be a further offer to some of us to join him, but I do not much expect it. My answer is a refusal to both proposals. He said that if I declined he hoped I would let him talk over politics with me. I mentioned your name, but I could not gather whether he was likely to ask you separately or not." There were some among the Liberal Unionists who thought it essential that Mr. Goschen should accept office in Salisbury's Cabinet, as he would "form a bridge" between Lord Salisbury's followers and those of Lord Hartington.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Justin McCarthy, in his "History of Our Own Times," avers that many of Mr. Gladstone's colleagues had never been Radicals, or even Liberals, in the real sense. Mr. Bright had pointed out years before, in a letter to a friend, when Mr. Goschen was taken into a Liberal Cabinet, that Mr. Goschen had never really been a Liberal in principles at all, and predicted that he would one day be found a leading member of a Tory Administration. Randolph Churchill had always been against Goschen. Colonel Hozier, the Liberal Unionist Secretary, who honestly thought that if Goschen were to enter the Cabinet it would be the ruin of the moderate Liberal party, writing on the 29th July, says, "I am delighted to hear you are not going into office," and he repeats the current gossip that Lord Salisbury had been dissuaded by Lord Randolph Churchill from carrying out his intention to invite Goschen's assistance.

The new Parliament opened on the 19th August, Mr. Gladstone, once more in Opposition, following the proposer and seconder of the Address, and being followed by Lord Randolph Churchill, now Chancellor of the Exchequer and Leader of the House of Commons.

Goschen writes in his irregularly-kept diary:—"Churchill's selection or self-selection for the Commons Leadership is to me a staggerer. I regret it deeply, for it is a premium on the arts by which he has risen into notoriety. I dare say he will steady down, but as he imitates Dizzy at a distance, so men of even lower morale may imitate Churchill."

Lord Randolph's resignation is told of in detail, also how Goschen, "whom he had forgotten," was appointed Chancellor in his place. The Queen, with unusual enthusiasm in matters political, writes:—"The Queen rejoices to see Mr. Goschen her Chancellor of the Exchequer."

Here he was undoubtedly in his element—his financial training, his experience in the City and at the Bank of England, and his knowledge of foreign Exchanges all stood him in good stead, and his five Budgets were models of careful finance. There is no room here to discuss his greatest work—the conversion of the National Debt. Major Coates, M.P. (himself no mean authority), once remarked to the writer, "It is so easy to job backwards," and it is easy now, twenty-one years after, to criticise the conversion, but it is doubtful if Goschen were living now whether he would be quite of the same mind, or would be satisfied with the success of his scheme. It is made abundantly clear that it was Goschen's courage and immediate grasp of the situation which saved the Baring crisis from being turned into a disaster before which the Black Friday of Overend and Gurney would have been a bagatelle.

On the death of W. H. Smith from late hours and overwork the Leadership in the Commons became vacant. Salisbury, in writing to Goschen, said he had all the qualities required except one, and that was that he was not a member of the political party which furnishes the largest portion of the Unionist phalanx. If he had joined the Carlton earlier there is no doubt the leadership would have gone to him, but it is equally certain that he served his party and his country better by being in no hurry. He once more stood aside and cordially approved of Mr. Balfour: "I have been quite convinced lately that Balfour was the man who should at a most important moment be able to command the enthusiastic support of all Unionists." Balfour wrote to him:—"I wish I could think that under any circumstances I could even hope to render half the services that you have done to the Conservative party." As usual, Mr. Balfour struck the right note. The General Election of July, 1892, resulted in a victory for Mr. Gladstone, who became Prime Minister for the fourth time. Mr. Elliot states that this Government fell on a trumpery and almost accidental division on the Army Estimates. This we do not think was the case. We have conversed with the chief actors in the matter, and have come to the conclusion that the snap division on cordite was most ably and deliberately planned. Lord Salisbury was now in a position to call to his aid all the Liberal Unionist leaders, and the country was not surprised when they accepted the responsibilities of office:—

> The alliance of Lord Salisbury and Lord Hartington—most honourable to both—begun at the Opera House in 1886, became in 1895 a combination and a junction of forces which, so long as Home Rule remained the great issue between political parties, secured the maintenance of the Union, with the approval of the great mass of the people, whilst at the same time it prevented recourse to the reactionary policy still in favour with a section of the old Tory party.

Hicks Beach became Chancellor, and Goschen, greatly to his taste, returned to his old post at the Admiralty. He was at the helm through Cleveland's electioneering manifesto about Venezuela, and after the Jameson Raid quietly ordered sufficient ships to Delagoa Bay to prevent, if need be, any landing of German troops in South Africa on the pretext of protecting German property and interests at Pretoria. It was Goschen who founded Dartmouth College and abandoned the old Britannia.

We are disappointed that Mr. Elliot does not tell us a little more about the taking of Port Arthur, and why the British squadron sailed and left it to the Russians just as their fleet were preparing to haul up their anchors and leave. This is a mystery that history has not yet dealt with, and we should like to have heard Mr. Elliot's version of the affair. During the Boer War it was Goschen's work at the Admiralty that enabled us to keep open the routes whereby a quarter of a million troops were safely transported over 6,000 miles from their base—a feat unparalleled in history.

The last few pages of the book are devoted to the Tariff Reform question. As Mr. Hope says in his delightful "History of the 1900 Parliament," he (Mr. Hope) makes "no claim to impartiality of judgment." Such a pretension, hazardous enough in the mouth of any writer of contemporary history, would be grotesque in the case of a militant politician. Mr. Elliot, it is true, is not a militant politician, but the able editor of a great review with large influence. He makes no secret—indeed, it would be impossible for him to do so—as to which side he is on. He gives the story of the Tariff Reform movement clearly and sincerely from his point of view and Goschen's, but, whilst endeavouring to be strictly fair, the events are too recent to be put into proper perspective, and as this critic is a militant politician he forbears to criticise.

The book comes to an end somewhat abruptly, but we have enjoyed reading every line of it. It tells the story of a great and modest Englishman who devoted his long life to the service of his country, and, while having a fair share of healthy ambition, never hesitated to sacrifice himself when necessary. Mr. Elliot has presented us with a successful portrait of the statesman, if not of the man, and we are under a debt of gratitude to him for showing us how Goschen served his country again and again at great crises in her history. His book is a worthy monument to a great man.

(Concluded.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

TWO WARRIORS OF OLD JAPAN

Saito Musashi-Bo Benkei. (Tales of the Wars of the Gempei.) By JAMES S. DE BENNEVILLE. Two Vols. Illustrated. (Swan Sonnenschein and Co. 16s. net.)

MR. DE BENNEVILLE has given us, for the first time in English, a full account of the Wars of the Gempei or the struggle between the Minamoto and the Taira clans. He has based his work upon such Japanese sources as the "Gempei Seisuiki," the "Heike Monogateri," the "Musashi-bo Benkei," the "Yoshitsune Kunko Zue," &c., with the excellent result that every page is steeped in the spirit of Old Japan of the twelfth century. In Nippon these party wars have been dealt with from a literary point of view in such a voluminous manner that the present author is to be congratulated on not only attacking so formidable a task, but also upon bringing his work to a successful issue. Without in any way under-estimating the book before us, we are inclined to think that there is still room for a little boiling down if such a theme, abounding in so many fascinating stories of war and love, is to make anything like a popular appeal. We note that the present work is dedicated to the author's little children, but we are afraid that only grown-up children with a more than usually good memory for names (Japanese names of many syllables) are likely to appreciate this work as a whole. The author's Preface is very diffuse, and it seems rather beside the mark for him to give us an introduction of nearly 140 pages for the purpose of surveying the legend and history up to the period when our two warriors, Yoshitsune and Benkei, appear on the scene. The interest of this book, to an English reader at any rate, is biographical rather than historical. No follower of Darwin, even in an age when publishers insist on introductions, need go further back than Dickens's remark in "Dombey and Son"—"I am born." But apart from this lavish display of rather unnecessary information and a lack of knitting the incidents closely together without a host of long-named nobodies, we have little reason for complaint and very much to be grateful for. It is a great pity in a valuable work of this kind that the author should not have restrained the bad habit of using words that jar. "Chunky, slab-sided woman" is not good English, and it is rather appalling to learn that "Susa scotches the snake." Perhaps it is too much to expect the author to bring reverence to his task, but occasionally he gets carried away by his flippancy and exceeds the bounds of good taste.

Viewing the salient features of this book—that is, Yoshitsune and Benkei—we are forced to admit that we must go far to find their equals, much less their superiors, in our own country. We may compare, as our author does, Yoshitsune with the Black Prince or Henry V., and Benkei with "Little-John, Will Scarlet, and Friar Tuck rolled into one;" but these comparisons are very disappointing. Benkei would have made an excellent subject for Mr. Rider Haggard's pen. Yoshitsune would have seemed a very remarkable hero had not his faithful henchman, Benkei, also figured in Japanese history. As it is we are forced to admit that Benkei was far and away the greater man. He not only towered in stature above his companions, but he rose above his brethren in courage, wit, resource, and a wonderful tenderness. Here was a man who could slay a hundred men with absolute ease, and with the same quiet assurance expound the Buddhist scriptures. He could weep over Yoshitsune when, by way of strategy, he found it necessary to severely beat him, and with infinite gentleness render assistance when his lord's wife gave birth to a son. There was yet another side to Benkei's versatile character, his love of a practical joke. The bell incident is a case in point, and his enormous feast at the expense of a number of priests another; but if he had his joke, he never failed to willingly pay for the laugh to the full. Benkei remarked on one occasion: "When there is an unlucky lot to draw, my lord sees to it that I am the one to get it." This was remarkably true. Benkei always made a point of doing the dirty work, and when his master asked him to do anything, Benkei's only complaint was that the task was not sufficiently difficult, though, as a matter of fact, it was often so dangerous that it would have frightened a dozen less gifted heroes.

Benkei, according to one account, had a god for a father and O'Haya for a mother, but unfortunately this pretty notion is upset by another version that sweeps away the miraculous and reveals the far from moral excellence of a certain Buddhist temple. However, we are told that when Benkei was born he had long hair, a complete set of teeth, and, moreover, that he could run as swiftly as the wind. Benkei was too big for a modest Japanese home. When he struck Jinsaku's anvil, that useful object sunk deep into the earth, and for firewood he would bring a great pine-tree. It was not long before Benkei asked O'Haya who his father was. Having ascertained the truth, he set off not with the desire of bringing his father to account, but with the utilitarian idea of obtaining support from the hot-blooded Bensho in order that he might play like other children, and banish all possibility of doing any work.

When Benkei was seventeen years old he was serving in a Buddhist temple. One night upon returning from Rokuhara, the Administrative office in Miyako, whither he had been sent to deliver a message, he was about to seek rest in a mountain shrine when he heard the sharp cry of a woman in pain. Peeping out Benkei saw that a number of men had kidnapped a young and beautiful girl. Benkei, swinging round an uprooted sapling, soon made short work of the robbers. The girl, Tamamushi, not a little embarrassed, thanked her brave knight. Unfortunately, however, as far as Mrs. Grundy is concerned, clouds hid the moon, and a thunderstorm came on. Benkei and the girl took shelter, and, to put it delicately, and in the Japanese manner, they exchanged pillows with the best intention of getting married later on. But this was not to be. A few months later Benkei was destined to see Tamamushi take her life before his very eyes.

Now we find Benkei breaking away from priestcraft, or rather allying it with that of a warrior. He became known as the Tengu Bozu. He desired to collect a thousand swords, and for this purpose he lay in wait for knights as they crossed the Gojo bridge. He had easily secured all but one sword, and now impatiently waited to accomplish his task. One night, while standing on the bridge, he heard the sound of a flute. He was not long in finding an adversary who put to shame the many cowardly knights preceding him. The Tengu Bozu had to deal with a young man who was agile in the extreme. For the first time Benkei was defeated, and the giant learnt that the name of his victor was Yoshitsune. Benkei begged the young man to take him as his retainer, to lead him and other of the Minamoto against the Taira.

When Yoshitsune and Benkei, at the head of the Minamoto host had finally vanquished the Taira at the sea-fight of Dan-no-ura, we should have expected that our two warriors would have received due recognition for their services. Yoshitsune's brother, Yoritomo, was Shogun, and held the buké and kugé in his hand. Yoritomo grew jealous of his more illustrious brother, and sought to kill him. Yoshitsune and Benkei were forced to fly the country. We follow them across the sea, over mountains, outwitting again and again those sent out to catch them. At Mutsu a great army was sent out against these unfortunate warriors. Camp-fires stretched in a glittering line about the last resting-place of Yoshitsune and Benkei. In an apartment stood Yoshitsune with his wife and little child. Death stood in the room, too, and it was better that Death should come at the order of Yoshitsune than at the order of the enemy without the gate. His little child was killed by an attendant, and, holding his beloved wife's head under his left arm, he plunged his sword deep into her throat. Having accomplished these things, Yoshitsune committed hara-kiri. Benkei, however, faced the enemy. He stood with his great legs apart, his back pressed against a rock. Never had he looked so fierce as he grimly guarded the ford. When the dawn came he was still standing with his legs apart, a thousand arrows in that great brave body of his. Benkei was dead, but his was a death too strong to fall. The sun shone on a man who was a true hero, who had ever made good his own words: "Where my lord goes, to victory or to death, I shall follow him."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE AMERICAN COMMONWEALTH

The American Commonwealth. By JAMES BRYCE. In Two Volumes. New Edition, Completely Revised Throughout, with Additional Chapters. (Macmillan and Co. 21s. net.)

FOREMOST among the historical philosophers of the day stands the British Ambassador at Washington, who, long before he had adopted diplomacy as a profession, had shown himself a master of the constitutions and organisations of foreign states, ancient, mediæval, and modern. The Holy Roman Empire and the United States of America are the two great national organisations which Mr. Bryce has studied most deeply, and his great works on these two subjects were admitted without question immediately on publication within the jealously-guarded circle of the classics. "The American Commonwealth" was first published in 1888. Five or six years later a new edition of this monumental work, amplified and extended in many respects, was issued, and now a further edition has appeared. Since the last edition was published Mr. Bryce has spent some years in the United States as British Ambassador, and he has thus had still further opportunities of studying the constitution, organisation, and life of the great country to which he is accredited. The results of these studies have been incorporated in the volumes now under notice.

> In 1910 [so he writes in his Preface] I find that so many changes have taken place in the United States that a further complete revision has become necessary, and that some note ought to be taken of certain new phenomena in American politics and society. In this edition, accordingly, there have been introduced, sometimes in the text, sometimes in supplementary notes, concise descriptions of such phenomena.

There are in addition, however, four chapters which are entirely new. One deals with the extensions of territory which the United States have acquired during the last two decades and with the consequent effects on the foreign policy of the Union. A second treats of the immigration into the United States during the same period. Another new chapter deals with the negro problem in North America in its latest phases, and the fourth with the remarkable development of the American Universities within recent years. The chapter on Municipal Government, which was contributed to the first edition by Mr. Seth Low, formerly Mayor of New York, has been entirely rewritten by the same authority.

In these chapters alone, apart from the remainder of the two volumes, much light is thrown on many problems, and the interested reader is given many an opportunity for thought and reflection. It is impossible in this review to attempt to follow a tithe of the trains of thought to which Mr. Bryce's illuminating pages give rise. It should be sufficient if a fact or a reflection is picked out here and there and placed before the reader as illustrations of the contents of these two volumes, which are in themselves sufficient to represent the life's work of any thinker. In the chapter on immigration the great change which is overtaking the racial composition of the American people is put vividly forward. Until 1890 about one-third of the inhabitants of the United States were of Celtic—mostly Irish—origin and the remainder Teutonic. Since that date, however, the conditions have been entirely altered. New elements have come in overwhelmingly, and of these new elements the great majority have belonged to the Roman Church. Thus not only have the two great racial divisions in which Americans could hitherto have been classed been upset, but the Roman Catholic element in the population has gradually been encroaching on the others. America has been fitly described as the melting-pot, and out of this same melting-pot there is already issuing a new race which differs in many respects from the old. At present the fusion is by no means complete, and thus we learn that—"In parts of New Jersey and southern New York one may, in asking one's way along the roads, find hardly any one who can speak either English or German. So in Pennsylvania the Bible Society distributes copies of the New Testament in forty-two languages, while forty-nine are said to be spoken in New York City," and so on to a similar effect. Despite this wonderful combination of diverse elements on American soil, Mr. Bryce has no fears for the future of the American people. Among the most dissimilar races Americanisation goes on apace. The children of the immigrants "mix with the native inhabitants, grow up speaking English, and mostly forget their own language before they reach manhood. So far from desiring to remember it and to cling to their old nationality, they are eager to cast these away and to become in every sense Americans."

The chapter on the present and future of the negro is especially interesting. Such a passage as the following throws more light on the true inwardness of the negro problem than could be gained from the perusal of newspapers spread over decades:

> Those who have housework to do, or who live in the few and small towns, pick up some knowledge of white ways and imitate them to the best of their power. But the great mass remain in their notions and their habits much what their ancestors were in the forests of the Niger or the Congo. Suddenly, even more suddenly than they were torn from Africa, they find themselves not only freed, but made full citizens and active members of the most popular Government the world has seen, treated as fit to bear an equal part in ruling, not themselves only, but also their recent masters. Rights which the agricultural labourers of England did not obtain till 1885, were in 1867 thrust upon these children of nature, whose highest form of pleasure had hitherto been to caper to the strains of a banjo.

This passage of course relates only to the negroes of the Southern States, but it comprises practically the whole of the black population of the Union. The Christianity professed by large numbers of these negroes is often little more than nominal, and bears but a faint resemblance to the faith which is known by the same designation elsewhere. In some of the most out-of-the-way negro districts, not merely have the old heathen superstitions been retained, "but there have been relapses into the Obeah rites and serpent-worship of African heathendom. How far this has gone no one can say. There are parts of the lower Mississippi valley as little explored, so far as the mental and moral condition of the masses is concerned, as are the banks of the Congo and the Benin." On the other hand some of the negroes of America have attained to a relatively high state of culture, equal and often superior to that of a very large number of the whites. There is, however, an impassable gulf which separates the most cultured black men from any of the whites, and even the former are now becoming reconciled to its inevitable permanence. Mr. Bryce holds that the negroes will concentrate in the Southern seaboard States. Such concentration will diminish the risk of collision, and probably tend towards a greater equanimity on the part of the blacks. On the other hand, "contact with the whites is the chief condition for the progress of the negro," and isolation will mean a corresponding mental and moral retardation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A detailed consideration of the innumerable ideas which Mr. Bryce sets moving in the minds of his readers would easily fill a volume. The foregoing brief references must, however, suffice for the present purpose. If they interest those who read them, and send them to the volumes themselves, they will have fulfilled their purpose. Before we conclude we cannot, however, forbear one further quotation, this from the Preface, which sums up the whole of the new portions of the work as they appear to their author:—

> It was with some anxiety that I entered on this revision, fearing lest the hopeful spirit with which my observation of American institutions from 1870 to 1894 had inspired me might be damped by a close examination of their more recent phases. But all I have seen and heard during the last few years makes me more hopeful for the future of popular government. The forces working for good seem stronger to-day than they have been for the last three generations.

ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON

Lay Morals, and Other Papers. By Robert Louis Stevenson. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

When we reflect that seventeen years have passed since Stevenson's death, we cannot but think that Time, prince of destructive critics, has dealt very gently with the reputation of that distinguished writer. This is the more remarkable in view of the fact that during his lifetime Stevenson was lavishly over-praised, or perhaps it would be more accurate to say, was studiously praised for attributes that he did not possess. By his contemporary friends Stevenson was regarded as an inspired writer of romances and the possessor of a fine prose style, but it is becoming increasingly clear that he was neither one nor the other. His stories were carefully planned, ingenious, entertaining, but they lacked that speed, that breathlessness that prevents the reader from noticing the machinery that drives the wheels of romance. It is only necessary to set "Kidnapped" or "Catriona" against one of the earlier romances of Mr. Stanley Weyman, to realise how little Stevenson was gifted in this manner of writing. It is another instance of a Hamlet seeking to create Hotspurs, and in consequence we feel no surprise on recognising the anxious features of our Scotch moralist under the tattered finery of Alan Breck. Stevenson was far too much concerned in the struggle between his vagabond temperament and his Puritan conscience to devote himself whole-heartedly to love and fighting and adventure as a good writer of romances should. Nevertheless he was attracted to this kind of composition, partly, we fancy, because being sprung from a distinguished family of engineers he thought he would find himself in the literature of action, and partly because throughout his life he retained the little boy's love for toy swords.

As for his style, it had every merit but that essential ease which every writer must retain, even while he is learning to keep it under control. His picturesque sentences force the reader to be conscious of the ingenious hand that wrote them, and his careful mannerisms prevent his books from achieving an existence independent of his personality. While we pause to admire his sly Scotticisms, his judicious derangement of epithets and the poise and rhythm of his phrases, the story not unnaturally falters; and it is for this reason that we prefer his essays, where an individual and self-conscious style is an advantage, and his letters, where he often wrote as happily and carelessly as a schoolboy, to his romances which go with a verbal and metaphysical limp where they ought to carry us off our feet, and at best only attain to the crippled agility of a John Silver. Mr. Edmund Gosse, we believe, has somewhere expressed the opinion that it is by his correspondence and his essays that Stevenson will live. We would certainly add his poems—the most original section of all his work and oddly underrated by most of his admirers—and two or three of his short stories to the list. In such a story as "A Lodging for the Night" his vividness of imagination and his sympathy with the vagabondage of Villon have enabled him to achieve the necessary illusion in spite, it might be said, of his quibbling turn of words.

But all this is to miss Stevenson's true value for his readers, which lies in the autobiographical nature of all his work rather than in any merit he may have possessed as a creative artist. Like Pepys, he was his own Boswell, and whether he set out to write a romance, an essay, or a poem, he always ended by writing about himself. He is one of those writers whose personality appeals to us more than the particular manner in which they seek to express it, and it is natural that his work should be judged by the worth and interest of the character therein revealed. And here, happily, we are on more grateful ground. For after all the confessions that crowd the pages of his books, after the many criticisms of his friends and his enemies, he still lives for us a gallant and lovable figure of a man. His popularity may be held to reflect the broad humanity of his nature; and just as it has been said that we all have something of Willoughby Patterne in us, so it is to be hoped that we all have something of Stevenson in us as well. For he was above all things a brave fighter, and if we must agree with Henley that in Stevenson Jekyll never wholly succeeded in overcoming Hyde, we may take pleasure in the fact that both sides of his nature fought with superb courage. He fought his ill-health, and even more he fought the effects of his lamentable Scotch upbringing, better calculated to produce Cabinet Ministers than men of letters; and if these were not the chivalrous opponents his romantic nature would have chosen, for us his courage is not the less admirable. All the evidence goes to prove that it is easier to lead an army into battle than to endure the toothache, and Stevenson's battlefields are only petty in the eyes of the unintelligent.

Judged from this standpoint, as presenting the inner life and aspirations of a human being sufficiently typical to be of interest to us all, nearly the whole of Stevenson's work is important, for the man is as much displayed in his fragments and his failures as in his finished works. It is on this account that we are prepared to welcome the publication in the volume under notice of much immature work that might seem in the case of another writer to be impertinent. It contains the first unrevised chapters of a projected treatise on ethics, a few early essays of no special merit, the opening chapters of three unfinished romances, and the famous open letter to the Reverend Dr. Hyde on Father Damien - a letter which we seem to remember Stevenson afterwards regretted having written. Hitherto these papers have only been available in the two fine collected editions, and lovers of Stevenson who have bought his books one at a time—as lovers generally do buy their books—will be glad of the opportunity to complete their collection. "Lay Morals" is Stevenson with a vengeance in his most didactic mood, and might almost have been written by any one who had a thorough knowledge of his work. As for the other papers, we confess to a partiality for the outspoken disgust of the letter on Father Damien, while "The Great North Road," though not to be compared with the masterly fragment of "Weir of Hermiston," looks as if it would have developed into a pleasant, boyish yarn.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The essays are interesting, as showing from what unpromising materials he derived his ultimate style—by playing, as he told us with unwise candour, the "sedulous ape" to Hazlitt, Sir Thomas Browne, and a number of others. It is true that every author has to learn to write, but we have always felt that with Stevenson the process was too conscious, that he was not, in the fullest sense of the word, born to be a writer at all. His papers on the art of writing compete for futility, in our opinion, with Poe's well-known essay on the same lines; and while we may credit Poe with knowing better than he wrote, there is, unfortunately, no reason to doubt Stevenson's sincere belief in his disastrous theories. Nevertheless, by force of character, by sheer hard work, and especially by aid of his enthusiastic interest in himself—an interest that it would be unjust to call vanity—he won for himself an enviable position among the men of letters of his day; and that day is not yet over.

"IN LOCO CAMBRIGIENSIS"

Highways and Byways in Cambridge and Ely. By EDWARD CONYBEARE. Illustrated by FREDERICK L. GRIGGS. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

IT would be difficult to state precisely why, but there is a charm spun about Cambridge that is the more potent because it is so indefinable. University to University Oxford woos with perhaps a more imperious gesture. County to county there are a dozen counties that would stride past Cambridge in the race for interest. The University may not be so kingly, but it wins home with a softer and surer touch. We cannot but think that poor Jude would not have felt quite so thrust-away there as he did in the sister University lying on the fringe of Wessex. We feel that while Oxford may be lustrous with Jacobean memories, it was in Cambridge that Spenser and Wordsworth strode. So with the county. In a land of billowy hills and beautiful dells it is distinctive for its marshy flatness. The picture arises in our mind that Carlyle drew of Cromwell coming up to the Long Parliament with rugged face through a misty, marshy scene, and we understand something of its strange charm.

But if Mr. Conybeare is blest with Cambridge for a subject, Cambridge has no reason for unhappiness with him as its exponent. He does not come to us a stranger to his subject. His "History of Cambridgeshire" and his "Rides Around Cambridge" are books that are not unknown to Cambridge enthusiasts. Yet were these books not standing to his credit such sentences as these from his preface would prove his qualification. He says:—

> The highways of Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely are usually regarded as unattractive compared with those of England in general. Nor is the criticism wholly unfair. The country does lack the features which make for picturesque rural scenery. There are no high hills, little even of undulation, and, what is yet more fatal, a sad sparsity of timber. The highways, then, seem to the traveller merely stretches of ground to be got over as speedily as may be, and he rejoices that their flatness lends itself so well to this end.
>
> It is, however, far otherwise with the byways. These abound with picturesque nooks and corners. In every village features are to be found—thatched and timbered cottages, hedgerow elms, bright willow-shaded watercourses, old-time village greens, and, above all, old-time village churches, often noble, and never without artistic and historical interest of high order. Few counties better repay exploration than Cambridgeshire.

How true this is the briefest holiday in Cambridge would make manifest. And if there wanted a more immediate testimony, the most cursory glance at Mr. Griggs' illustrations would suffice. How delightfully they are conceived in the very spirit of the place is evident in each of his sketches; but as examples of his two most pronounced methods of work his sketch of Ashwell, with near shade and far sun, and his sketch of the billowy quaintness of Swavesey, may be mentioned, not to speak of the idyllic rusticity of the cottage at Rampton.

It is to be expected that Mr. Conybeare should proceed directly with the University. He would have done better in this section not to have been at such pains to "write down" to his reader. The man who needs to be told that the coxswain of a boat's crew is usually termed cox, and that moreover in the dignity of a footnote, is scarcely the man who would purchase this book. It may, perhaps, have been necessary to inform his reader once that the chief of King's is called Provost, not Master, and that the chief of Queens' is called President; but it is scarcely necessary to repeat this information. The worst results of this method is that thereby he loses that most valuable of all things in such a book as this—atmosphere. Nothing destroys atmosphere quite so speedily as explanation.

All the Colleges are dealt with in turn, and some of the history of each is given. And as Mr. Conybeare escorts us through one and another of them the mind is hallowed with history and legend. Something of the same mood is awoken in us as stirred in Wordsworth when he sang:—

> I could not print
> Ground where the grass had yielded to the steps
> Of generations of illustrious men,
> Unmoved. I could not always lightly pass
> Through the same gateways, sleep where they had slept,
> Wake where they waked, range that enclosure old,
> That garden of great intellects, undisturbed.

Before our eyes too, as before his, pass the figures of Newton, Chaucer, Spenser, Milton, and of lesser names, with more besides that have succeeded since his day—Tennyson, Ted Fitzgerald, Thackeray. It would be the highest of possible praise to say that Mr. Conybeare deals adequately with his subject here; yet he wins it.

Leaving the University, he proceeds to a perambulation of the county in general; and though we feel that he is scarcely at home away from the 'Varsity precincts, yet his treatment of the circumambient country lacks nothing of charm and interest. Even as with his detailed account of the University, he loses no item of historical interest in the routes he chooses. Taking Cambridge as his centre, he leads us out North, South, East, and West by road on road, dealing with the Byways through the Highways. Thus he not only deals adequately with the whole county, but formulates a "plan of attack" for the prospective tourist into whose hands this book shall fall. It is perhaps when he gets to Ely that we find him at his best.

We have already spoken of Mr. Griggs' illustrations, but we cannot close any review of this book without drawing particular attention to them. The book is worth purchasing if only for the pleasure and instruction to be achieved from a close examination of them. This is a day when the illustrator's art is receiving very close attention, and when delicate work is no rarity. But Mr. Griggs' illustrations are more than merely choice; they show that far rarer quality of judgment. The illustration on page 57, for instance, depicts Clare College in the distance, with an excellent suggestion of lightness—that is craftsmanship; but the infinite value that is given to this by the dark pillar and portico of King's immediately to the right is above all craft—it is instinct. So, too, the beautiful choice of position for Emmanuel College on page 157; so, too, the balancing of weight in the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on page 135. This judgment gives a rare value to an illustration. To praise the format, binding and printing of the book would be a late function, for the series is not unknown, and these excellences are recognised as attributes of it. It is certainly an invaluable book, especially for visitors to Cambridge.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SPORT AND A SPORTSMAN

A Medley of Sport. By J. M. M. B. Durham (Marshman). Illustrated. (Gibbings and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

What a strange thing sport is, and what a strange fascination it has! To read or think of fish kicking and gasping on a sunny bank, or of a heavily wounded pheasant fluttering into dense bush to die a slow, pitiless death, or of a deer fleeing in terror before the tamed and domesticated descendants of prairie wolves, is to experience a shuddering sense of revulsion. The cooler judgment forbids such exercises as either atavism or depravity, according to the philosophical standpoint adopted. Yet the sense yearns towards them. The eager chase is always a delight, and there is infallibly a charm in reading of such furious joys.

Whatever the instinct to which Mr. Durham appeals, there can be little doubt as to the excellence of his equipment or his capacity to deal with the subject. There seem to be few branches of "sport" in which he has not participated. Moreover, the veldt has been laid under fee to satisfy his zest no less than the humbler fields of England and Ireland. Nevertheless, the book is not all that it might be, for its substance is but scrappy at the best, and it is not enlivened as frequently as it should be with the fine flavour of a good "yarn." There are only two manners of sporting books. There is the work of technique, occupying itself with the craft of the thing, equipment, skill, and site; and there is the book that passes from tale to tale, from anecdote to anecdote, and from recital to recital. It is to the latter genus that Mr. Durham's book belongs; but its fund of anecdote is not very capacious, and—a much more considerable thing—neither is it as pungent as it might be.

Still, despite this fault, even if Mr. Durham has not given us a book of stories of such rich flavour which we shall prize tenderly for after-dinner recital, the book has its pleasure all the same, though it be of a quieter and soberer order. It is rather a book to be read peaceably over the fire; it is not the type of book that compels one to seek the first possible comrade for the retailing of a capital story. Yet such books have their uses no less than their more excitable companions. There is, however, an excellent account in this quiet order of a certain tame-stag hunt. Not that it is the recital of any exceptional episode. In fact its virtue is that it recounts what must surely be common in that form of sport. At any rate, the present writer can lend his testimony to the tale as being typical of the various tame-stag hunts he has seen. He tells of "a heavy-looking stag" who, after being uncarted, bestows a "benign and kindly glance upon his would-be pursuers," and forthwith proceeds to "nibble at the tender young shoots of a thorn-bush within a yard of the Master, towards whom he appeared to entertain a great affection." Evidently, whatever enmity man chose to display towards him, he was determined to set him a better example. Not the most furious whip-flicking could wake him to a run. Somewhat characteristically it took the fiendish inventiveness of a small boy to fetch a trot out of him. Even then it was but to a short distance. Finally, however, they managed to get him into a run. But by the time the hounds were well after him he had eluded them and was once again quietly nibbling his mid-day meal in an adjacent lane. And then, when one of the huntsmen dismounted so as to whip him again into activity, the gently disposed stag promptly proceeded to fraternise with the riderless gelding! Apparently the Master of the hunt in question seemed to imagine that this was not sport. We are inclined to agree with him. Tame-stag hunting certainly is not sport.

Some of the best chapters in the book are those in which Mr. Durham is engaged in the mere business of slaying. His chapter "A Cold Fowling Cruise," particularly the portion in which he describes his experiences on the "15-ton yawl Seamew," is quite admirable. So is his chapter "Yuletide on a 15-tonner," which somewhat precedes it in the sequence of the narrative, but which evidently deals with the same occasion. In these he is very finely occupied with the fight against wind and tide in which Man shows to best advantage—if, that is to say, he have any virtue in him. Even here he is seldom aroused to any real "gusto," being rather content to tell his tale in a peaceable sort of a way. This peaceable manner, together with a great sameness of material, serve to erase from the book that fine high excitement that one rather looks for in books of this nature. After all one fox-hunt is very much the same as another. The only real distinction that can be made between them is a question of striking anecdote, and that, as we have said, is lacking. One may perpetuate the high ardour of the chase infinitely: that is one thing; but to reproduce it ad perpetuum in a book is quite another. Nevertheless, readers of "A Medley of Sport" may rely on a certain quiet pleasure, if not that keener zest and anecdotal glory.

AWAKENING ASIA

An Eastern Miscellany. By the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P. (William Blackwood and Sons. 10s. 6d. net.)

In a letter to the Times a few days ago it was suggested by Mr. John Murray that if Members of Parliament are to receive salaries they should be called on to furnish proof of their qualifications in the same way that all other persons who receive salaries from the public purse are required to do. The idea is a fascinating one, and should not be lost sight of, but can only be touched upon here to point a moral. The varied and extensive knowledge of Asia, based on personal observation, Lord Ronaldshay has acquired in the course of his travels, gives him a better title to be heard on Asiatic subjects than talkative sections who are generally so ready with their opinions on every topic under the sun.

The subjects dealt with in this book are mainly topographical, economic, and political, with the exception of the chapter on "A Siberian Mystery," which, in spite of its interest, appears somewhat out of place. Many of the chapters have seen the light before in the shape of speeches, addresses, and magazine articles, but are not the less welcome, though in some places they might have been rewritten with advantage. The views of the author on the Baghdad railway in 1904, for instance, have somewhat lost their interest in view of recent developments, and might have been brought up to date with advantage.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In the chapter on Modes of Asiatic Travel the author shows a practical acquaintance with the various methods to be found in Asia, from dashing along in a Russian tarantass to the slow progress of a Yak that wanders along at the rate of two miles an hour at an elevation of 16,000ft. above the sea. Like everybody else he found a camel "chiefly a cause to blaspheme," which reminds one of the old Jesuit Father who described the camel as "a four-legged animal of strange appearance and worse smells." A journey on foot across the Himalayas in mid-winter, and a three months' solitary ride from Quetta to Meshed across "a thirsty and waterless land robed in an eternal garb of drab," sufficiently show that Lord Ronaldshay is no mere fair-weather traveller.

The best part of the book is that which deals with India. A very careful account is given of the revolutionary changes forced upon the Indian Government by Lord Morley, and it is impossible to avoid the conclusion that Lord Minto has allowed the Viceregal authority to be encroached upon by the Secretary of State. It would be interesting to know where the responsibility lies for the tardiness in dealing with a "poisonous and unbridled Press," and for the weakness displayed in dealing with convicted criminals. "You don't know how to reward, and you don't know how to punish" was the criticism of a friendly native gentleman a good many years ago. What would he say now, when everything is done to destroy English prestige, to discourage the loyal, and to pander to sedition?

The pages in which the writer states the case for commercial reciprocity between India and England are written with especial care, and show close familiarity with the conditions. It is apt to be forgotten that India is, commercially, one of the most self-contained countries in the world. It produces, and very cheaply, everything in the shape of raw products that it requires for itself, and many things that the world cannot obtain elsewhere. It is this that has made India the quicksand in which the gold and silver of Europe have disappeared, from the days of the Roman Empire till now; and when Indian manufactures are once thoroughly established we may see a return to the state of affairs that existed in the days of Akbar and Jehangir, when India imported nothing but jewels, bullion, horses, and a few luxuries for the rich. The history of the Indian cotton Excise duties is one that no Englishman, whether a Free Trader or Tariff Reformer, can read without shame. It was these duties that first gave point to the discontent and unrest that now cause so much anxiety, and they still continue to be a festering sore. It is a reproach against the Unionist Government that during its ten years of office nothing was done to abolish this indefensible impost.

In his chapters on Japan Lord Ronaldshay tries to drive home the lesson that military ascendancy in the Far East is not the only goal of Japanese ambition; commercial and industrial supremacy in Eastern Asia are the objects to which the energy and will of the nation are now being directed, and the struggle for the lordship of the Pacific will be fought out in the factory and the workshop as well as in the dockyards and arsenals.

There is real poetry in the two and a half pages in which the author relates the impression made on him by the great Buddha of Kamakura.

THE SURPRISING CHEVALIER

D'Eon de Beaumont: his Life and Times. By Octave Homberg and Fernand Jousselin. Translated by Alfred Rieu. Illustrated. (Martin Secker. 10s. 6d. net.)

Fifteen years have elapsed since Comte Albert Vandal, of the French Academy, dealt a mortal blow to the legend that the notorious Chevalier d'Eon, diplomatist, dragoon, spy, author, and lady of quality, was at one time lectrice to the Empress Elizabeth of Russia; and an even longer period has gone by since the Duc de Broglie, also of the Academy, showed the Chevalier in his true colours in regard to other episodes of his chameleonic career. D'Eon, however, found an enthusiastic English biographer in Captain Telfer, whereupon Mr. Ernest Vizetelly entered the lists to renew and accentuate the attacks of the two French Academicians. After that came a pause, and it seemed at last as if the subject of D'Eon were exhausted; but, a few years ago, the original of the work we are noticing appeared in Paris. Mr. Alfred Rieu has now made a capital translation of it, which should appeal to all who are interested in D'Eon and his adventurous life. It is to be noted that, although Mr. Vizetelly's "True Story of the Chevalier d'Eon" is not included in the list of authorities cited by MM. Homberg and Jousselin, they, after proceeding on lines of their own, have arrived at much the same conclusions as he did. They certainly think that there may have been some "substratum of truth" in the legend that D'Eon masqueraded at the Russian Court as a female, even as he masqueraded in England and France in later years, but they adduce no proof whatever to that effect; and on the other hand, reviewing D'Eon's career as a whole, they admit that he was much too eager to improve his fortune, and overstepped the bounds of legitimate ambition. For our part we will add that the Chevalier's self-conceit was extreme, and that, given his ideas of his own importance, there was little chance of success for him in an age when ramper pour parvenir was a recognised maxim.

MM. Homberg and Jousselin go too far in claiming that the private papers of D'Eon's which they have used in preparing their work enable them to set "the mystery of his sex" at rest. Since the day of the Chevalier's death in 1810 there has not been the slightest mystery of that description; and, besides, more than half a century has elapsed since Gaillardet printed the medical report on the subject, in the first of what may be called the independent biographies of D'Eon. However, MM. Homberg and Jousselin have certainly had at their disposal a number of papers which throw additional light on some of the Chevalier's doings, particularly in his later years, and on the engouement with which he inspired so many of his contemporaries. Slight as may be their historical importance, these particulars are often interesting, and by reason of their presence here the book undoubtedly supplements, in a variety of ways, both the Telfer and the Vizetelly biographies. As the latter were issued several years ago and may not be generally accessible at the present time, we can the better recommend MM. Homberg and Jousselin's work to those readers who may desire to know how a young Burgundian gentleman entered the secret service of Louis XV., became both an aide-de-camp to Marshal de Broglie and a Minister Plenipotentiary at the Court of George III., planned an invasion of England, embroiled himself with his superiors, did all sorts of eccentric and surprising things, and at last assumed the character of a spinster lady, and masqueraded as such with astonishing success for many years. The book is illustrated with seven interesting portraits or caricatures of D'Eon, including some which do not figure in the Vizetelly and Telfer volumes, but we are sorry to notice that there is no index.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SOME LIGHT ON THE NEAR EAST

My Balkan Tour: an Account of Some Journeyings in the Near East, together with a Descriptive and Historical Account of Bosnia and Herzegovina, Dalmatia, Croatia, and the Kingdom of Montenegro. By Roy Trevor. Illustrated. (John Lane. 21s. net.)

Since the ever-smouldering torch of the Balkans is again breaking out into active flame, Mr. Roy Trevor's book comes with peculiar appropriateness at the present moment. Not that the work needs any topical considerations as a stimulus to its perusal. It is, indeed, quite one of the most able productions of its kind that has seen the light for some while past. "My Balkan Tour" may be classed as an all-round book. The merits of its text are rivalled by the excellence of the illustrations, and the whole is enclosed within a suitably artistic cover. From this full measure of praise it need not be implied that the book is faultless. It has merely fulfilled the object of its existence more nearly than the majority of similar works.

There is no doubt that Mr. Trevor is strongly gifted with the power of description. His narrative flows easily, and the numerous fragments of history and legend are introduced with a due sense of sympathy and romance. So much for the craftmanship of the volume. But there are few enough authors who are blessed with a canvas such as this upon which to weave their story. What a journey that was upon which the Mercédès car embarked! Or was it not rather a voyage—an adventurous sailing through oceans of mountain and lakes of valley that had never before suffered the pressure of a tyre? Certainly a breakdown in the midst of all this was almost as serious as a shipwreck at sea.

Thanks to the Austrian occupation of Bosnia and Herzegovina the author was enabled to traverse in safety districts that but little more than a year ago were only to be entered by unprotected strangers at the utmost peril of their lives. But this security only held good so far as the inhabitants were concerned; the roads themselves appear to have afforded as much excitement as was compatible with the enjoyment of an ordinary trip. Such, however, was only to be expected when a motor-car was set to climb wild mountain tracks and to creep along the dizzy edge of precipices.

From the practical point of view the Austrian occupation appears to have produced beneficent results. Although no signs of actual oppression are evident, law and order would appear to have been introduced for the first time into the motley companies of "Moslems, Christians, Jews, and Orthodox," who would now seem to have resigned themselves to live side by side in peace and comparative friendship. Much good work has been effected in a surprisingly short period of time; the main roads—the former haunts of bandits—have been improved and modernised, and, according to Mr. Trevor, it is likely enough that the political desolation of these tempestuous countries will soon be nothing more than a memory of the past.

But the author was not content with his progress through Bosnia and Herzegovina, and the wealth of local colour and gorgeously barbaric costume of which the journey was productive. His faithful car took him beyond all this into Dalmatia, Croatia, and Montenegro, where the scenes and customs were at least as vivid as any of those in the first-visited countries. We have fascinating material here. Descriptions of quaint ceremonies and of ancient castles and monuments, tales of feud and battle, the humours and adventures of the journey itself follow rapidly one upon the heels of the other. In fact, there is not a dull page in this bulky volume that all readers of travel literature must welcome.

SHORTER REVIEWS

Canada and the Empire. By W. R. Lawson. (Blackwood and Sons. 6s. net.)

Mr. Lawson's book appears opportunely. The introduction of a treaty of commercial reciprocity in the Legislatures of Canada and the United States has been followed in the Republic by a great shouting of "from Panama to the Pole." So great, so spontaneous has been the delight of patriotic Americans at the prospect of bringing the Canadian States into line with the United States that people on our side of the Atlantic are beginning to realise a certain fact, which they ought to have known before—viz., that deep down in the heart of every American is a fervent desire, ambition, and hope to see the whole of North America one nation, with the capital at Washington, and with complete political independence of Europe.

Of late years the immense increase in Canadian prosperity, the growth there of national sentiment, and the improved relations between Canada and the Mother Country have produced in the United States a feeling of anxious doubt as to whether this dream would ever come true. Hence the shout of relief and jubilation with which the proposed treaty has been hailed. Americans regard the work of the War of Independence as incomplete as long as Canada maintains the Colonial status. They realise better than do most of us in the old country how great are the geographical forces which tend to produce practical union between Canada and the United States and practical separation between Canada and the United Kingdom. It is impossible to travel much in Canada and in the northern parts of the United States without becoming aware of the operation of these physical facts. There is no natural barrier between Canada and the United States. At all points the one territory is the continuation and completion of a stretch of plain or tract of mountain which commences in the other. But between Canada and the United Kingdom lies the dissociating ocean. More and more as the years go by the modes of life in Canada and in the United States become increasingly alike. The United States have the advantage of propinquity, we have the advantage of an existing bond. But the bonds which unite us to Canada and Canada to the rest of the Empire must be strengthened if they are to resist a continual stress, which is like the stress of gravitation, in that it acts continuously. As Mr. Lawson truly says, Canada with her eight millions, if standing alone, would be practically absorbed by her neighbour of ninety millions, on account of the fact that the community of ninety millions increases so much more rapidly than the community of eight millions. He is, moreover, of opinion that "if the British Empire is to last much longer it must be properly organised." Much has been done in this direction of late years, but Canada still presents problems which demand the highest qualities of statesmanship both at Ottawa and at Westminster.

The Songs of Old England. Selected by James Wintle. (John Ouseley. 5s. net.)

This is a quite charming production, bringing before one all one's favourites amongst songs, whether they deal with love, bucolics, sentiment, patriotism, or sport. There are some extremely good photographic reproductions of pictures by Pater, Maclise, Turner, Meissonier, Gainsborough, Landseer, Corot, Paulus and others. On the whole, we think that this charming book should be found in every boudoir. We rather wish that the binding had not been of quite so green a green, but doubtless some people will not share in our objection to this particular colour.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Record of Sports. (Royal Insurance Co.)

BETWEEN the covers of a daintily-bound and compact little book the Royal Insurance Co. has for the eighth time compiled their "Record of Sports," which contains summaries and tabulated statements of all sports to the end of 1910. Aviation is naturally dealt with at a much greater length than usual, many notable performances and events being recorded. A short history of each sport is given at the beginning of the chapters, and no pains appear to have been spared to make the book as clear and concise as possible. We note that at the top of several pages, however, one line is rather carelessly printed over the top of another. With this exception, every detail is very well and ably set forth. The manager very graciously offers any of our readers who care to apply for it a copy of the "Record of Sports" as far as his stock will permit.

Cotbank and its Folks. By the Author of "Rob Lindsay and his School." Illustrated. (T. N. Foulis. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE author of "Rob Lindsay and his School," "Auld Drainie and Brownie," &c., has now presented us with a dainty little sketch of Cotbank as it appeared some eighty years ago. The simple country folk of the district are described in so pleasing and sympathetic a manner that it seems almost possible to feel the refreshing breeze wafted from the Scottish moorlands. The author evidently has a keen love and appreciation for the Scotch dialect, and a great charm is added to the book by the tasteful crayon drawings of Miss Preston Macgoun.

FICTION

The Last Galley: Impressions and Tales. By ARTHUR CONAN DOYLE. Illustrated. (Smith, Elder and Co. 6s.)

THIS collection of short stories by Sir Arthur Conan Doyle will be greatly appreciated as a mute companion upon a journey or voyage. The classical portion of the book, consisting of some 124 pages, is extremely well done, and transports us into the atmosphere of the period of which the tales are told. "The Last Galley," a story of the destruction of the Carthaginian Fleet, is intended to convey a moral to Great Britain. As "The Last Galley" is engulfed within sight of Carthage—

> A huddle of naked, starving folk stood upon the distant mountains, and looked down upon the desolate plain which had once been the fairest and richest upon earth. And they understood too late that it is the law of heaven that the world is given to the hardy and to the self-denying, whilst he who would escape the duties of manhood will soon be stripped of the pride, the wealth, and the power which are the prizes which manhood brings.

The rebuke is not fitting as addressed to the people of this country; but it conveys a warning to them not to be lulled into false security by the stratagems and devices of vote-catching politicians.

The whole of the ten stories in this section of the book are delightful. In the second part "The Marriage of the Brigadier" is an extremely diverting episode in the life of that prince of romancers, Etienne Gerard. In "The Lord of Falconbridge" Sir Arthur Conan Doyle recalls to our mind the romantic charm with which he succeeded in surrounding the sordid atmosphere of prize-fighting in "Rodney Stone" of glorious memory. The other stories are all interesting, but we venture to suggest that perhaps it would have been more prudent to omit two of them of such repulsive plots as the "Blighting of Sharkey" and "De Profundis." It is only people with the strongest nerves, or with no nerves at all, who can read such stories near the midnight hour without a decidedly creepy feeling, and conjuring up in a night of broken dreams the most horrible phantoms which can present themselves to the human imagination.

Fenella. By HENRY LONGAN STUART. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

MR. HENRY LONGAN STUART has that gift, not uncommon in latter-day writers of fiction, of making his characters operate in a mental fog. We never know precisely what they would be at, nor why they would be at it. Mr. Stuart endeavours to leap up and down the gamut of so many emotions, and he appears to have so many pieces of information to communicate, that the reader never becomes quite wise as to any of them. We gather that Mr. Stuart looks upon the world with a pessimistic eye; that he has strong views on the villainies of publishers; that he believes the typical theatrical manager to be a Jew, and the typical Jew to lisp; and that he is of the opinion that newspaper editors express themselves chiefly in that free and slangy manner which we all admire in our billiard-markers and bar-tenders. As regards his characters, Fenella, despite the pains Mr. Stuart has taken with her, does not strike us as being even a moderately well-bred person, although she may be a magnificent dancer. Of her two lovers, Sir Brian Lumsden, a sporting baronet, and Paul Ingram, an ascetic author, we do not share their creator's opinion that the one is a gentleman and the other a man of genius. Sir Brian appears to us a human and rather amusing bounder, and Paul a sincere fanatic with a bad liver. Some of the minor characters are not at all badly done, but they suffer, as far as we are concerned, from recalling so many other personages in so many other books. The story is of a distressing nature which is not relieved by any charm of style or true literary flavour. Though a muscular writer, Mr. Stuart rather belongs to the halfpenny Press descriptive reporter class, a member of which tells some of the story. The book has its moments and its true emotions; but we cannot acquit it of a large taint of that vulgarity which, like snobbery, consists in a mean admiration of mean things. Judging by the flattering notices of Mr. Stuart's book "Weeping Cross," which are printed in the front of this volume, we think that the latter can hardly be as good as its predecessor.

The Trap: a Revelation. By DICK DONOVAN. (F. V. White and Co. 6s.)

THE revelation is of the inner workings of the infamous secret societies known as the Camorra and the Black Hand, and according to the publishers' preliminary announcement, Mr. Dick Donovan has been collecting his materials ever since the assassination of the renowned detective Guiseppe Petrosino at Palermo in March, 1909. Therefore, in view of the extraordinary trial now proceeding in Italy of forty-one members of the Camorra, the story should arouse considerable interest, for it is written in the author's most popular style. Money-making is the principal object of the Camorra, and money or the knife is its watchword. Its undoubted and far-reaching power is attributed mainly to the fact that this criminal organisation is based on the co-operation of members belonging to all classes, from the beggar to the lord, the plebeian to the patrician, in the perpetration of crime and the raising of funds by every device. Aristocrat or homeless mendicant, one and all have to take the same oaths, to suffer the same tattooing which designates the different ranks and offices in the band, and obey the orders of the supreme chief. With such groundwork to go upon, Mr. Donovan has produced a powerful story, and from London to Naples, from Naples to the Bowery, New York, and back again, the whole of his characters bear the stamp of reality, and are very much alive. Joseph Bastu, the hero, is a young Italian notary established in London, and he takes upon himself the elucidation of the mystery of the murders of an Italian art dealer and his household in Wardour Street after the English and Continental police had shelved the case. How he eventually does solve the mystery, and receives his reward from a grateful heroine, together with his hair-breadth escapes and other adventures, we leave the reader to find out for himself from the book. The plot is a deep one, and the disclosures are awe-inspiring.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Leech. By Mrs. Harold E. Gorst. (Mills and Boon. 6s.)

The old story of the camel who began by putting his head into the Arab's tent and in the end ousted the original occupant is told again in Mrs. Gorst's new novel. Here we have an account of a cunning and masterful woman who induces her sister-in-law to give her board and lodging for the sake of charity; eventually she becomes mistress of the home in which she has sought asylum. The gradual conquest is graphically described in the earlier part of the book; but matters do not assume their most tragic aspect until the death of the weaker woman. A daughter, Elvina, is left behind, and, by one trick and another, finds herself at the mercy of the objectionable aunt and the aunt's equally unpleasant daughter. The book afterwards develops into a story of the "Cinderella" type on modern and somewhat squalid lines; but the Prince, unfortunately, comes too late. One is at times wearied by the constant use of the vernacular which the author deems appropriate to her characters, and it is still harder to forgive certain lengthy conversations intended to convey the humour which Mrs. Malaprop once made fashionable. A misapplied word may be amusing in places; it may be a gem if it is discovered rarely and unexpectedly; but it has only to be multiplied to make it depressing and wearisome. Apart from this fault, the book contains a great deal of powerful writing, and the sketches of life in a small shop at Peckham and at a Battersea boarding-house are full of convincing reality. All the scenes pass in an atmosphere as gray and dull as the fog of London suburbs can create; there is scarcely a touch of romance, and only at the very end is there anything which can be considered as a dramatic incident. Yet, in spite of all this, "The Leech" is a novel which can hold the reader's attention, and, though it contains nothing which can be called "a problem," it has clearly been written with thought and possesses the quality of arousing thought in those who read.

The Vision of Balmaine. By G. B. Burgin. (Hutchinson and Co. 6s.)

Balmaine was a good-natured, pompous, country banker who believed that the market-town in which he lived was his own particular creation. Tebbits was his chief clerk, and a cunning ruffian of the worst order. The bank is in difficulties; there are charges of dishonest dealing, including forgery, and Balmaine goes to prison, though proofs of his innocence are in his hands. Tebbits, the real criminal, is not worth shielding, but Balmaine accepts penal servitude because he believes himself deserving of punishment for a wrong which he has done to a woman. Most readers will consider this an eccentric method of paying a debt, but greater wonders are in store. When the banker is again a free man he becomes a seer of visions, and undertakes the not very hopeful task of saving the soul of Tebbits. It is not a bad story, but we could not help being rather sceptical as to some of the mystic episodes which occur in the new life of the old convict, and the fact that they are shared by the woman from his past does not help to convince. Mr. Burgin might have made these things theatrical and ludicrous, but his writing shows a restraint which is altogether admirable. To weave the supernatural into a story of life in a small country town is, however, a too ambitious attempt, yet the author deserves credit for having avoided what might have been a really painful failure.

King Philip the Gay. By Reginald Turner. (Greening and Co. 6s.)

Mollavia, the scene of this story, is akin to Ruritania and the other comic-opera countries. A King, a Scotch Prime Minister, Household Guards (fifty in number) appear to entertain us. The King marries a Princess of the neighbouring State of Bollheim, and is so supremely happy with his wife and his little one-horse country that he gets bored; so he fosters a revolution, personates himself, gives his wife many anxious moments, and finally all is well. The book contains a certain amount of satire on other countries and their ways, and is good of its kind.

The Unknown God. By B. L. Putnam Weale. (Macmillan and Co. 6s.)

The reason which led Paul Hancock to become a missionary in China may have been known to Paul Hancock himself, but we doubt whether the secret was revealed to Mr. Putnam Weale. According to Mr. Weale, Paul, at the age of eleven witnessed the herioc attack of his head master upon a mad dog which ran amuck in the school; the master's terrible death was "a lesson, a visitation" that, skilfully used by an ardent young clergyman, made an emotional convert. Paul's existence, however, was entirely purposeless until the sudden death of his father. Then, standing by the graveside, he is startled by the roar of voices from a neighbouring football-field; he hears the cheers of success and the moans of failure. Above all is the cry of "Go on, go on!"—this must be his watchword; hence he becomes a missionary, not to conduct sewing-circles in a conceited suburb, but to Christianise China. Here the unfinished buildings of the mission upset his sense of symmetry; yet the filth of the Chinese village is "so human, so close to nature." He debates and worries over the rights and wrongs of missionary propaganda among non-Christian peoples, has various adventures, and marries so that his partner may help him work out a plan of campaign. We expected throughout the book that Mr. Weale would lead us up to this plan, but we were disappointed. He is at his best in the second half of the volume, where we are held by his descriptions of Chinese life and travel. The first portion, which occasionally wanders beyond the limits of an ordinary dictionary, is so laboured that we sometimes doubted whether we were reading fiction. There is such a veneer of erudition over every paragraph that Mr. Weale is never happy. But perhaps "the happy age was the ignorant age," as Paul Hancock wisely remarked.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Priest's Marriage. By NORA VYNNE. Cover Illustration by Charles E. Brock. (Andrew Melrose. 2s. net.)

WHY "A Priest's Marriage" outside and "The Priest's Marriage" on the title-page? A very well-told tale, this, of a very weak and despicable man and a very sweet, loving woman whose affections were played with fast and loose, the result being an unexpected development of her character. The fight between the priest as priest and the priest as a man is the motif of the story. We will not anticipate the result, or it would spoil the pleasure of reading the book, which is quite equal in value to many of three times the price.

A Drama of the Telephone. By RICHARD MARSH. Frontispiece. (Digby, Long and Co. 6s.)

HERE we have, not a novel, as the purchaser might expect on looking at the cover, but a collection of nine very second-rate short stories, every one of them unworthy of Mr. Richard Marsh's high reputation as a writer of detective novels. Moreover, the story which furnishes the title of the volume was issued a twelvemonth ago in cheap novelette form, price 1d., when it was called "The House of Dread." To make up a six-shilling book with the aid of a penny dreadful is not, we most decidedly think, treating the reading public fairly. This first story occupies over a third of the volume, and at that rate the publishers cannot be accused of giving over much value for the price they charge. It is sensational and most improbable, though it has the advantage, which the others have not, of boasting one of Mr. Marsh's detectives.

The Irresistible Husband. By VINCENT BROWN. (Chapman and Hall. 6s.)

THE reason for this title is hardly evident from the book. It is full of irresponsible chatter about a foolish wife and a blind husband. The lady is a grandmother. Finding her life very boring, she goes off "on her own" and thinks she is in love with a brute of a man. All ends happily; but the story is a shocking exposure of a woman's uncalled-for weakness—and in these days of woman's so-called superiority adds nothing to the credit of the sex.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY—II.

EXAMINING the sculpture exhibits at Burlington House is always somewhat of a tantalising pleasure. The first thing the observer of a statue or a modelled head does—or desires to do—is to walk round it, to gain a fair opinion of its appearance from four or five different view-points; he often finds that what seems a fault from one position becomes a beauty from another. Therefore to be compelled to consider many excellent works of art in marble and bronze from a very limited range—since most of the exhibits are pathetically placed with their backs to the wall—is a hardship. Yet we can hardly blame the authorities; they have done their best with a difficult problem.

Probably the loveliest thing in the whole of the two halls devoted to sculpture is one which nine out of ten visitors will miss altogether, dominated as it is by the crush of more florid conceptions. We refer to "The Spirit of Night," by Mr. Alfred Drury, in the Lecture Room. It is merely the head of a sleeping woman—it clamours for no notice, makes no startling appeal; but its purity, calmness, tenderness, its wistful sweetness, are beyond words. For relief from the burden and heat of the day we returned to it several times.

Not far from this is an unusual but effective statuette of a young lady, in silver, by Mr. E. G. Gillick; the folds of the dress, however, are rather stiffly treated. Two enamels in the same room should not be overlooked—"The Vision of Calvary," by Mr. A. Fisher, with a woman's head very, very reminiscent of D. G. Rossetti's women, and the beautiful "Miracle at Lourdes," by Mr. Oswald Crompton. A large study for a marble bust of Thackeray, by Leonard Jennings, is quite successful in catching the genial expression of the novelist, and a bronze bust of Sir William Crooks, by Walter Merrett, which from a distance we feared was a frozen image of Mr. Bernard Shaw, is very lifelike. A statuette by Mr. Derwent Wood, "The Bather," has a rather ugly attitude—one shoulder shrugs nearly up to the eyes—and fails to satisfy the sense of beauty; another statuette, entitled "The Queen of the Fairies," by Lorna Adamson, is full of delicacy and daintiness. Of the various medal exhibits, we must especially mention a case by J. R. Pinches; in the central one, "For Marksmanship," the idea of distance is finely conveyed by the variation of the relief. And of the truly delightful "Peter Pan," by Sir George Frampton, by which Mr. J. M. Barrie is to be immortalised, we need not write at length. Fortunately it is not against the wall, so it may be studied for half an hour at a time—as it deserves. It is perfectly charming.

The Central Hall contains a beautiful "In Memoriam" relief by "S. Nicholson Babb"—if we mistake not, this is Mr. Stanley N. Babb, of whom we have pleasant memories at the Plymouth School of Art. It is a little conventional, perhaps, but full of fine drawing and clever treatment. "The Sea-Mother," by Mary C. Buzzard, an exquisite conception in which the curl of a breaking wave is used as a motif, must be highly praised, more for idea than for sheer execution. The large statue "Victory," by Benjamin Clemens, is entirely different from the usual notion of such a subject; the victor binds up his own arm, and seems rather sad; nevertheless, it is fine work. So is a beautifully modelled "Mercury," by A. Stanley Young. In "The Wooing of Thetis" and "Herakles," two large adjacent groups, the artists (Arthur Walker and Allan Wyon) have been eminently successful in imparting a tremendous sense of motion. The "War" group in the same hall, by Crosland McClure, is wonderfully impressive and strong; but, alas! once more we want to walk round it and test it from more than two points of view.

Returning to the main galleries, we select a few pictures for comment in addition to those mentioned in our first article. In Gallery X. is hung "The Sonnet," by Harold Knight—a blaze of green and gold which fails to impress the onlooker at close range save by its size and its ambition. Seen, however, from a distance—through the doorway of Gallery XI., for example, almost from the entrance hall—the effect is startling; it is precisely as though we looked into a garden pleasaunce and saw the young poet reading his sonnet to the girls who sit or lie in careless attitudes near him. Only thus can this really clever painting be enjoyed. "The Pond," in the same gallery, by C. W. Simpson, is rather damaged by the extremely heavy painting of the reflections on the water. Gallery XI. contains a "blossom-picture" by E. A. Hornel, entitled "A Spring-time Rondelay." Under a mass of blossom seven happy children sport and play. The general pink-and-white effect is rather disconcerting, for there is no point on which the eye can rest; the whole thing dazzles the beholder, charming though the colours be. Of a dazzling character, too, is "The Shower of Gold," by E. F. Wells, where laburnums droop over a nude girl lying asleep below their vivid bloom; the effect is superb, and very decorative. On the same wall we must note Mr. Bernard Gribble's "Helpmates in Distress;" the tramp-steamer, thrashing through a heavy sea, is splendidly drawn.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A pleasing little study of "Brentford Bridge" in Gallery IX., by J. Littlejohns, is rather overwhelmed by its competitors; the water and its motion are very happily treated, and a suggestion of distance on the extreme right adds much to the quality of the picture. We noted one "Haven under the Hill" last week; another, by Muriel G. Dyer, gives an impression of strong evening light on the hill, with shadowy cottages in the foreground; the colours used are unconventional, but the effect is true to Nature. Why the "Chelsea Embankment," by W. E. Fox, should have been painted in such a grey and unattractive mood we hardly know; it has not the excuse of mystery or moonlight, and expresses little but the stiff line of the road and wall. A study of detail entitled "The Japanese Fan," by Sir James D. Linton, is quite wonderful; the minutiæ of the pattern on the woman's dress are fascinating, and repay close scrutiny. Another clever work here, at which many people will not trouble to look twice, is a still-life study of a torso and some statuettes on the corner of a mantelpiece, by Lilian E. Harris. The quality of both drawing and colouring is exceptional.

It is a question whether the class of picture which depends for its effect on sharp contrasts between the gloom of evening and artificial light—there are several of them especially pronounced in this year's Academy—is not often meretricious. So much can be hidden or shaded in the way of slipshod drawing; so much can be conveyed to the untutored eye by sudden, brilliant splashes of light. However that may be, two or three of the present collection are worthy of note—one we have already referred to; another, with a very similar title, may be bracketed with it. Although there is no exquisite face in "A Night in June," by T. C. Gotch (Gallery VII.), the depth of the distance and the fine quality of the contrasts of light and shadow are fascinating. The best depiction of firelight is "Devant le Feu," by Charles Michel, in the preceding room, which is a trifle exotic and un-English, perhaps, but very pleasing and restful. Finally, let none of our readers miss the wonderful and spacious "Moonlit Shore," in Gallery V., by Julius Olsson. Beneath darkened cliffs the wide expanse of moonlit foam stretches as far as the eye can see; it is a triumph to have rendered an extremely difficult theme so perfectly. Alas! that such pictures cannot have a room to themselves, where other colours might not clash, and where the voice of the vandal who puts forth waggish remarks to his feminine friend should be silenced.

THE THEATRE

THE PIONEER PLAYERS AT THE KINGSWAY THEATRE

THREE little plays, on widely differing themes, were presented to an enthusiastic and evidently sympathetic audience at the Kingsway on Tuesday afternoon last; but, although the themes varied, one note—the equality of woman with man—sounded through all. Propaganda hand in hand with art usually makes for a fall, and the success of Tuesday's programme was due more to the excellent acting of a band of picked and devoted artists than to any especial merit in the plays themselves.

"Jack and Jill," by Miss Cicely Hamilton, is typical of the "Woman's Movement." Jack—a struggling author—enters for one of the "first novel" competitions which tempt the free-lance with a big prize; Jill—his sweetheart, also a struggling author—enters too, each keeping the secret. Of course—the play being by Miss Cicely Hamilton—the girl wins the prize; the man behaves like a cad, nearly crying with pique and wounded pride; and, after some very solid "straight talking" by Jill to prove that she is "as good a man" as Jack, all ends happily in reconciliation, curtain, and wild applause. Mr. Harcourt Williams, whom we last saw in "The Master Builder," was excellent in his somewhat thankless part, and Miss Athene Seyler gave a clever rendering of Jill.

The extraordinary nature of the second playlet, the action—or, rather, conversation—of which takes place in the maternity ward of a London workhouse, makes it difficult to criticise plainly. Most of the talk related to the position of the unmarried mother, and there was a multiplicity of babies. The whole thing left an unpleasant taste, and, though the acting was clever, and the author—Mrs. Margaret Wynne Nevinson—was called for loudly, the purely biassed nature of the "play" made us wonder why it was not written as a pamphlet on sociology.

Not often, even in London, is it possible to see such an array of well-known actresses on one stage as was the case in the last piece. To Miss Margaret Hughes (of "Killigrew's Company of King's Players," A.D. 1661) comes a vision, as she sits despondent, despairing at the impossibility of woman ever appearing on the English stage. Before her pass Nell Gwynne (Miss Ellen Terry), Mrs. Barry (Miss Lily Brayton), Mrs. Bracegirdle (Miss Suzanne Sheldon), and other famous heroines of the theatre, each delivering a brief, encouraging speech; finally comes "An Actress of To-day" in the person of Miss Lena Ashwell. In the little prologue Mr. Ben Webster—who must be rather bewildered by his quick changes of late—represented Sir Charles Sedley, dandified and superior, excellently. Naturally, there was not much scope for acting in "The First Actress," but the whole effect was pleasing, and no man would grudge the woman her triumph in the dramatic art, whatever his opinions as to her administrative powers. Mr.—or we rather believe Miss—Christopher St. John must be congratulated upon a pretty conception, and upon the distinguished manner of its presentation. We wish the Pioneer Players every success as long as they will not overstep the mark and kill the interest of a play (for those who value good artistry) by forcing the propaganda side of their scheme.

"A DOLL'S HOUSE"

Madame Lydia Yavorska (Princess Bariatinsky) continues at the Kingsway for a few days longer the success of "A Doll's House," although she is supported by a very different cast. As Nora Helmer, harassed until she decides to work out her own salvation alone, Madame Yavorska is really amazing, and one great quality of her acting, which we realised more fully on seeing her play the part for the second time, is that she has none of the irritating, stereotyped tricks of the stage which most actresses seem compelled to use in order to express their emotion. Miss Janet Achurch, who once played as Nora, took the part of Mrs. Linden, As Torvald Helmer, Mr. Norman Trevor rivalled Mr. Ben Webster, who previously interpreted the character; the play was again, in fact, in capable hands. We shall be extremely interested to see Madame Yavorska in the "modern play" which is promised us shortly.

"KISMET" AT THE GARRICK THEATRE

THE feeling that remains with us after having seen Mr. Edward Knoblauch's "Arabian Night" is that it is not Arabian. The scenery is excellently full of colour, and the dresses are wholly correct. There is not a little that is suggestive of Orientalism in the occasional music, and the aroma of incense comes pleasantly to the nostrils. For all that, the piece has nothing of the allurement of the East. Not one of the characters is, in any sense of the word, Oriental. Mr. Oscar Asche is all too loud and robust, Miss Lily Brayton no different from the Miss Lily Brayton who appears in Shakesperean revivals and the romantic hotch-potches of her répertoire. The Guards and Wazirs, Dignitaries, Courtiers, Soldiers, Eunuchs, Beggars, Caliphs and Sheikhs are all dull and prosaic, and the young woman (about whom we have heard so much) who discards a transparency to walk into a swimming-bath seems to be encased in a suit of Jaeger. After "Sumurun," "Kismet" is tasteless. The story is incoherent and episodic, and when we should have been thrilled and horrified we were merely mildly amused. The murder of the Wazir Mansur by Hajj the Beggar made the audience shriek with laughter. It is not to be wondered at. The incident resolved itself into horseplay, and the bull-like roarings of Mr. Asche as he sprawled over the bath were comic. If Hajj had been played by Spontelli and the Wazir Mansur by any one of Herr Max Reinhardt's company this murder scene would have been a nightmare. It becomes more and more clear that our English actors and actresses lack the sense of atmosphere and the gift of characterisation. You may dress them up as Othello, as Falstaff, as Bottom the Weaver, as Count Hannibal; they remain Mr. Oscar Asche and Mr. This, That, and The Other. This is obviously because there is no school for acting, no apprenticeship in the art, and no one capable of teaching even if those who are in command were capable of being taught.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

"Kismet" is not therefore a production of much value, but it has its moments which remain in the memory. The scene of the Tailors was excellently put on, but this was the triumph of the scene-painter and the stage-manager. The Street before the Mosque of the Carpenters was ruined by the so-called singing of a party of very English choirboys, who took everything atmospheric out of the scene. Every now and then Mr. Oscar Asche did well, but he was always too robust, or perhaps the word should be rambustious. He was without the cunning and the oiliness necessary to the part. As an actress Miss Lily Brayton does not improve; the continual vibrato which she puts into her voice becomes unpleasant. The best acting in the play was done by the small boys in the bazaar who had nothing to say, and by Mr. George Ralph as the Mansur's Sworder. Nevertheless, somewhat unsatisfactory as "Kismet" is, Mr. Oscar Asche is to be congratulated on having produced it. There is at any rate one manager in London who is prepared to back his opinion and to put on a play which is not a copy of something which has been staged before. "Kismet" must be a great relief to the playgoer who is satiated with the commonplace stuff to which managers pin their faith. It is a great success.

OUR PRISON SYSTEM *

By One Who Knows It

Mr. Wintle here chronicles the professional exploits of an old Lag (or, to explain to gentle readers who do not understand slang—a convict), whose life seems to have alternated between crime and its punishment, when discovered. He was by no means of the "gentle shepherd" type; on the contrary, his energies were devoted to London, Leeds, Birmingham, and other large centres both of wealth and crime, and he seemed safer thus. In fact, he repeats what has often been said—that London is the best hiding-place in the world. It would spoil the reading of the book were we to make extracts from the many examples of his skill and his also freely-confessed failures, but we may take the opportunity of noting his various opinions of some things which are of general interest, also of adding some observations of our own.

First, as to the police and their attitude to a convicted man. Our "lag," who spent most of his freedom under supervision, speaks very well of them and their kindness, and of their anxiety not to give a man away who is trying to reform. He knew all there is to be known about the obligations on both sides, and he gives a well-merited rebuke to a country policeman who called to see him in uniform, contrary to the rules. The next subject on which he comments is "Fences," or receivers of stolen property. Without these men there could be no profitable thieving, and in our opinion they should be punished, when caught, equally with the thief. The only thing to be said in their favour is that they sometimes, and only sometimes, give information to the police, but that is probably to save themselves from a prosecution. In addition to buying jewellery, &c., at a quarter or less of its value, they also, it would appear, obtain information as to likely and profitable places to "burgle," making plans of the premises, and employing men to find out the habits of the persons in charge.

A very amusing tale may be repeated. When engaged in robbing a warehouse in Tooley-street, the "lag" was sandbagged by two other gentlemen engaged on the same business. After an exciting experience of being nearly drowned, he returns, and, opening a trapdoor, so frightened the men then engaged on the job that they fled viâ the trapdoor, and our "lag" cleared off with the booty. Apparently, when one is professionally engaged in burglary, it is extremely annoying after working for hours to break open a safe to find only half a sovereign in it; so our man revenged himself by smashing up the office furniture and knocking senseless with a sandbag a stoker and an unfortunate policeman who, in the course of duty, looked in to see what was the matter. Yet the man who could do this grumbles at the bread at Dartmoor, and makes other complaints of the irksomeness of prison-life and discipline, also of the work! Our "lag" was put on to weaving, which, he says, is not done now; but, as a matter of fact, it still is in certain prisons in the North. The chapter of crime ends in the shooting of an innocent postman and an unfortunate policeman, the "lag" being finally caught, and getting twenty years' penal servitude—a fit punishment. The book concludes with advice on "How to Guard against Burglary," which, although not particularly novel, is useful.

The following observations may be made on the subject of prisons and prisoners generally. Under the present method every consideration is shown to prisoners. The Borstal system is perhaps too lenient, and is not sufficient punishment to those young men who, in these days of free education, know quite well what they are doing. Much early crime is due to idleness and loafing. Prisoners who are in prison for the first time are, if otherwise eligible (and this is determined by the Visiting Justices and the Governor), put in a special class by themselves, and do not come in contact with old criminals. This does much good. But it is, in our opinion, wrong to commit any one to prison in default of paying a small fine imposed for a minor offence—for example, 10s. or seven days is a very common sentence. This class of prisoner is not wanted in a prison. There should be a house of detention for such as he, since it is wrong to stamp a man as a gaolbird for such a minor offence against the law.

Short sentences are of little use. There are two classes

* Nights with an Old Lag. By W. J. Wintle. (John Ouseley. 5s. net.)

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

of criminals—accidental and intentional, or amateur and professional. The amateur should certainly not go to prison for his first or second offence, but should be put on probation; the professional or intentional thief or criminal should be kept in prison as long as the law allows. The American system of a sentence of not less than ten or more than twenty-one years (the actual length of sentence depending on the prisoner's conduct and reformation) has much to recommend it. It must not be forgotten that all the routine connected with the entry of a prisoner into a prison is almost the same in the case of a seven-days' prisoner as that of one staying for eighteen months. As to longer sentences: these prisoners have nothing to complain of; in fact, they are, in our opinion, too much studied. Regular exercise, work in association, a choice of religions, the best medical attendance, appeal to the Visiting Justices, or, if the latter are hard-hearted, to the Home Secretary in cases which the prisoners consider hardships, remission of a portion of their sentence by their own good conduct, and various other privileges, all go to show the reason why men commit breaches of workhouse discipline in order to be locked up in prison.

This is not as it should be. A man is sent to prison to purge a wrong against the community at large, and while one does not wish to go back to the old days, still the modern system is, in the case of professional criminals, erring on the other side. Our "lag," whose history has prompted these remarks, had no hesitation in using a revolver against unarmed, innocent persons, and yet complained of prison rules and treatment. When put on outdoor work at Portland, he thought it good fun to steal the Governor's wine, and at another time the Chaplain's. Punish the wilful wrongdoer and take no notice of what the man says whose first act on restoration to liberty would probably be to commit a worse crime than his previous one.

A word, in conclusion, as to the relief afforded to prisoners by the various aid societies. Every appeal by a prisoner for help on leaving prison is carefully considered, and assistance in the shape of clothes, stock-in-trade, tools and employment is given as far as means will allow. Every boy on leaving is questioned as to what he is going to do, whether going home or otherwise. If not he is assisted with employment, or to a berth on board ship. In fact, subject to our remarks as to the non-desirability of short sentences, everything that can be done is done for prisoners, particularly young ones who have not joined the ranks of the hardened and professional criminals, with whom we have no sympathy and who deserve all they get and probably more.

SOME NEW FRENCH BOOKS

M. Marcel Revon, formerly Professor of Law at the University of Tokyo, and who now occupies the post of Lecturer on the History of the Civilisations of the Far East at the Faculté des Lettres de Paris, has compiled an "Anthologie de la Littérature Japonaise, des Origines au XXe siècle" (Delagrave, 3f. 50c.), of the highest interest. In his erudite preface the author points out that the literature of Japan is one of the richest existing, and calls attention to the two events marking its chief evolution—viz., in the sixth century the introduction of Chinese civilisation, and, in the nineteenth century, the introduction of Occidental civilisation. The principal periods of Japanese literature are next dealt with. According to Mr. Revon, the first epoch, extending till about the seventh century, is especially rich in primitive chants and Shinto rituals. The era of "Nara" which succeeds (710-784) witnessed the creation of the first University, and gave birth to the Kojiki, "in which is recorded the foundation of the national history and religion."

Then follows the classical period of "Heian," during which was composed the "Kokinnshou," or "Collection of Ancient and Modern Poems," of which we give a specimen, in M. Revon's translation; it is entitled "Ono-No-Komatchi":—

La Couleur de la Fleur
S'est évanouie,
Tandis que je contemplais
Vainement,
Le passage de ma personne en ce monde.

The epoch of Heian seems to be one of the most glorious of Japanese literature, for with the poems appear also diaries, novels, etc.; "this movement," says M. Revon, "was at first favoured by a rapid progress of the national language, at that time arrived at its highest development; then by the invention of two systems of writing, the katakana and the hiragana . . . which simplified the work of the writer and the efforts of the readers." Curious to note, the court of Itchiyô was, about the year 1100, the centre of an assembly of brilliant women, "who, in truth, wrote the major part of the great national masterpieces." Amongst the latter is specially to be mentioned the "Makoura-no-Soshi," or "Pillow-Notes," written by Sei Shonagon, one of the ladies in waiting of the Empress. Speaking of this work, M. Revon says:—

> En lisant telles maximes concises où Sei Shonagon, femme du monde hardie, qui pousse la franchise jusqu'au cynisme, marque d'un trait mordant quelque vice hypocrite, on songe à La Rochefoucauld; et quand on voit surtout tant de pages profondes où la terrible rieuse, si prompte à saisir les ridicules de la ville et de la cour, a mis en se jouant une pensée que signerait le meilleur des moralistes, ou un portrait qui dresse devant nous l'image d'un caractère éternel, on ne peut s'empêcher de penser que le Vieux Japon a eu aussi son La Bruyère.

M. Revon quotes in extenso one of the works of Eikken, the celebrated moralist (1630-1714), which, though very short, is of capital importance. It is called the "Onna Daïgakou." and is the manual for the education of girls, formerly and still used by the Japanese aristocracy. This "great school for women" has "contrived to form that perfect type of sweetness, gentleness, modesty, and charm which is that of real Japanese womanhood, and which fills the impartial observer with admiration."

The "Anthologie de la Littérature Japonaise, des Origines au XXe siècle," is an erudite and conscientious work, and ought to be greatly appreciated by those who take an interest in the Far East. It is admirably compiled, and to enlighten the reader M. Marcel Revon has thoughtfully added many notes, which greatly enhance the incontestable value of this very complete résumé of Japanese literature.

Many French authors belonging to the younger school of writers betray a curious tendency towards the morbid exaggeration of self-analysis, of which a most striking example is furnished by M. Jean Giraudoux's last book, "L'École des Indifférents" (Bernard Grasset, 3f. 50c.). It is composed of three stories, or rather sketches, in which three youths, of evidently particularly sensitive dispositions, describe their ideas and impressions. Their neurasthenia has apparently reached the most acute stage, and their too evident preoccupation of defining and dissecting their least important sensations or thoughts becomes at length slightly wearisome and exceedingly despairing—all the more so perhaps because one realises that Jacques l'Égoiste, Don Manuel le Paresseux, and Bernard le Faible, the heroes of "L'École des Indifférents" are cleverly-drawn counterparts of persons existing in real life. The dominant traits of their characters—if they have any!—appear to be weakness and irresolution, and the words of the Cardinal de

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Retz are strangely suited to them:—"Les gens irrésolus prennent toujours avec facilité les ouvertures qui mènent à deux chemins, et qui, par conséquent, ne les pressent pas d'opter." Those who desire to be kept au courant with the present movement of French literature should read M. Jean Giraudoux's curious book, in which are to be found (besides some phrases which indeed appear bewildering to the profane reader not initiated in the subtleties of ultra-modernist psychology) some delicate observations, some whimsical conceptions, charming by their very originality.

M. Jules Bertaut has traced, in a very entertaining study, the evolution that the "young girl" has undergone in French literature. In "La Jeune Fille dans la Littérature Française" (Michaud, 3f. 50c.) the author first draws a picture of the young girl as she existed in the French society of the seventeenth century. Ignored by her parents, treated condescendingly by her relatives, uneducated, she was a mere puppet to be disposed of as best suited the plans of her family—either to be married or to be placed in a convent. Speaking of the Précieuses, and showing how great a part they took in liberating the maidens of that epoch from the bondage in which they were previously kept, M. Bertaut says:—

> They [the Précieuses] formed in a gross and semi-barbarous society the revolutionary and indispensable element destined to change the morals and hasten evolution. They were not only witty—they invented good taste. They were not only refined in the choice of their expressions—they fixed the language. They were not only the natural centre around which the artists and the writers grouped themselves—they were the actual creators of all artistic manifestations.

And he observes further:—

> These are titles for the gratitude of scholars, which would win for these women universal admiration, if, under Molière's baneful influence, opinion had not been for ever prejudiced against them.

In the eighteenth century M. Bertaut notes that parental authority appears to have relaxed somewhat; he glances swifty through the literature of that period, and in doing so remarks that the heroines of that epoch seem, for the first time, to give evidence of possessing a semblance of will and personality. He also observes the apparition of three new elements in the souls of young girls—coquetry, sensibility, and sensuality—the last-named being especially apparent in the damsels figuring in the works of Marivaux, Sedaine, and Choderlos de Laclos.

M. Bertaut next turns his attention to the romantic school, and, after demonstrating its impossibility to create an exact character of a young girl, he introduces us to some quaintly amusing types of that period. Thus, step by step, after having successively treated of the heroines of Châteaubriand, Lamartine, Victor Hugo, Balzac, &c., the author explains the evolution which has eventually led to the modern French writers' conceptions of "la jeune fille," so delightfully expressed by the amusing, witty, though rather hoydenish, creations of Gyp and Henri Lavedan.

It is evident that M. Bertaut has no sympathy for the young Parisian girl of to-day. Speaking of her, he declares: "Irrespectueuse et sèche, voilà les deux caractères primordiaux qu'il faut noter chez la Parisienne d'aujourd'hui. La seconde épithète explique la première. Tête froide gouvernant les sens, esprit critique tuant les enthousiasmes et les admirations." We cannot help thinking that this generalisation is too drastic. There certainly exist in Paris many selfish, cynical, and hard young girls; but we are sure that in all classes could be found charming examples of girlish spontaneity, simplicity, and abnegation.

The latter half of M. Bertaut's interesting work is devoted to the modern type of girl-heroines in French literature of our day. The author treats of the Intellectual, as conceived by Colette Yver and Gabrielle Réval; of Willy's ambiguous "Claudine," who "is the most original type of young girl created since the de Goncourt's heroine."* Marcel Prévost's conceptions are also analysed, and some of Paul Bourget's finest creations, such as Julie Monneron† and Charlotte de Jussat Randon.‡ M. Bertaut introduces us also to a feminine type which has had great success of late years, as well on the French stage as in literature—it is called la révoltée, and is always represented by a young person who protests in exalted accents against the education she has received, against the convenances, and Mrs. Grundy in general, and who proclaims, in all good faith, her right to love, to be happy, and to live.

M. Bertaut closes his book by a conclusion summing up the previous chapters, and ending by this declaration, which we quote:—

> Nous avons pour représenter la jeune fille française un modèle littéraire . . . vivant, expressif, pittoresque, imprévu, spirituel et toujours nouveau, la figure malicieuse et bonne, délicieuse et avertie, tragique et amusante à la fois, de la plus mélancolique des tintamarresques, de Renée Mauperin, la vraie jeune fille française.

M. Bertaut's English readers may or may not corroborate this opinion, but we can assure them that they will derive great pleasure in perusing this work, in which are presented to us, as evoked by the skilful and talented author, some of the most exquisite figures of French maidenhood.

FIFTY YEARS OF MODERN ITALY

By Frank Harris

In these last few days modern Italy has been celebrating he fiftieth anniversary of its birth, or its "unification" as Italians prefer to call it. And their method of celebrating it is characteristic: at Rome they have opened an International Exhibition of Fine Arts, whereas at Turin an Industrial Exposition is in full swing, which all the Italian journals seem to think shows the wonderful progress of their country. And if increase in commerce and wealth is a sure sign of progress and development, and is besides, as Macaulay believed, a certain proof of the increase of happiness and virtue, then no one can deny that Italy has made astonishing progress in the last fifty years.

Let us try to sum it all up in figures for the benefit of those who judge the health of a man by his outward appearance and his wellbeing by his appetite.

First of all, let us take the Italian Debt. The 5 per cent. loan fell during the war of 1866 below 50 lire; it was worth in 1870 a little less than 63 lire. The course of exchange with England, for example, was terribly against the new kingdom. The taxes were so heavy that their unpopularity shook the throne, and whole districts of the country suffered from periodical devastating famines. From 1870 onwards matters steadily improved. The credit of the State advanced, and in 1886 the Rente practically touched par. From 1886 to 1894 the adventurous foreign policy of Crispi damaged Italian credit—after the battle of Adoua the Italian Rente fell to 78. But as soon as Crispi disappeared from the scene and Italy drew away from Germany a little and towards France, thanks to the wise guidance of her King, the credit of Italy began to improve again, and in 1906 Luzzatti, the Finance Minister, was able to undertake the conversion of the Debt. The old 5 per cent. loan, which had

---

* Renée Mauperin. † L'Étape. ‡ Le Disciple

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

been reduced to 4 per cent., was now reduced to 3¾ per cent., with the proviso that in 1912 it should automatically become 3½ per cent. The Rente to-day is worth 103·50 per cent.—that is to say, 80 per cent. more than the 5 per cent. was worth in 1870.

The development of the railway system has been just as remarkable. In 1860 Italy only possessed 1,180 kilometres of railway. But at the end of 1910 she possessed 16,989 kilometres, of which 13,437 belong to the State and 3,552 to private companies. The gross receipts, which in 1860 were only 70,000,000 lire, have risen to-day for the State railways to 481,000,000 lire. This does not include the receipts from private railway companies and steam tramways, which together increase the total to over 600,000,000 lire per annum, a revenue more than eightfold the revenue of fifty years ago.

In 1862 the merchant marine of Italy consisted of 9,356 sailing vessels and only fifty-seven steamers with a combined tonnage of 650,000. In 1908 their sailing-vessels had fallen to 4,701, but their steamers had increased to 626, and the total tonnage had more than doubled.

The posts and telegraphs, which in 1866 gave only about 20,000,000 lire to the State, produced with the telephones in 1910 more than 137,000,000 lire.

Naturally enough, the growth of foreign commerce corresponds with the growth of internal commerce. Italian imports in 1862 were about 830,000,000 lire, but in 1910 they had increased more than fourfold. The exports had grown from under 23,000,000 pounds sterling to over 80,000,000 pounds.

Agriculture has always been the chief industry of Italy, and it has made astonishing strides. In 1860 the value of the whole agricultural product of Italy was estimated at about 2,859,000,000 lire; in 1910 it was worth three times as much.

A hectare, which is a little more than two acres in extent, was judged to yield 125 lire in 1860, which is about £5, and now produces over 260 lire.

The mineral products of Italy seem to have kept pace with the agricultural growth. The mineral products in 1860, which were valued at about 28,000,000 lire, to-day are valued at 77,000,000 lire. The iron and steel industry has grown tenfold, the silk industry fourfold, and cotton at least as much.

The promise of the future is even better than the past. Italy has splendid watercourses, and is beginning to use this cheap power to generate electricity. Ten years ago this source of wealth had hardly been tapped; to-day over 1,000,000 horse-power is being used, and in another decade this will probably be doubled.

But more remarkable than the industrial growth of Italy is the growth of State banks and co-operative associations. There are now more than 365 co-operative Popular banks in Italy; and there are besides 547 co-operative producing societies, while of co-operative retail societies there are more than 5,000. Even in 1862 there was no Post-office Savings Bank in Italy; now there are over 2,000,000 depositors in the ordinary Savings Banks, and in the State Savings Bank over 5,000,000 depositors, altogether over seven and a half million thrifty people, or a quarter of the population of Modern Italy. The sums deposited in 1864 amounted to about 28,000,000 pounds, in 1910 over 165,000,000 pounds sterling.

This growth of co-operative industry has had a striking effect on the wages of workmen; all observers are agreed that the real value of the wages of labour in Italy have increased in fifty years by something over 100 per cent. And Italians are very proud of pointing out that whereas in 1861 there were seventy-five illiterates to every hundred inhabitants, there are now less than 50 per cent., with a minimum of 22 per cent., in industrial Lombardy and Piedmont, and a maximum of 75 per cent. in the Catholic country districts of Sicily and Calabria.

The birth-rate, which seems almost a sure sign of the poverty and improvidence of a country, has fallen from 38 per thousand in 1863-67 to 32 per thousand for 1906-8.

And finally, the mortality, which was 30·60 per thousand inhabitants in the period 1860-67, is now, in the period 1906-8, 20·50.

With these figures before one it would be difficult to deny the growth of modern Italy in material prosperity. No small part of this growth is due to the direct initiative and wise guidance of the King, who from the first turned resolutely away from the megalomania of Crispi and the close alliance with Germany. "Peace is what Italy needs," said the King a good many years ago, and he has kept steadily in view the quiet and orderly development of the riches of the country, leaving Armadas and adventures in Africa to richer rivals who may enjoy periodical bloodletting.

We only wish his Majesty could be induced to see that the first need of modern Italy is a good system of highroads, such as the genius of Napoleon conferred on France over a century ago. A hundred million lire spent on roads would make Italy the playground of the rich of all nations, and bring thousands of rich tourists and automobiles into the country every winter. Italy brags about its Bay of Naples, yet it is almost impossible to see it, and quite impossible to enjoy its varied beauties in a drive. Why does not the King this summer see to it, that there shall be one great highroad well-planned made from Venice to Florence, and from Florence through Rome and Naples down to Reggio, and thence to Brindisi? And why does not some patriotic Italian build a great boulevard, say from Naples to Castellamare, and thence round the promontory to Vietri or Salerno by way of Sorrento and Amalfi? To go from Naples to Salerno takes one whole day, though by road it is not more than twenty-five miles. If the road was decent, automobiles would do it in an hour. For every one who has seen the Temples at Paestum there would be a thousand. The cathedral at Salerno should be as well known as the cathedral at Chartres, were it only for the old Greek columns in it and the old marble sarcophagi; but it takes a whole day to get from Naples to Salerno, and a tiring day at that.

Italy has far greater riches in her art-treasures than in her watercourses. Good roads would necessitate good hotels, and bring crowds of rich visitors and new life into the poor and benighted country districts.

OUR PANTISOCRATS

THE creed of Socialism, put into a nutshell, amounts to this—Society will only be truly organised when all its members live by taking in one another's washing. It is a pretty formula, but, if itself sent to the wash of practice or sound thought, one that comes home in rags. How weird soever the theories of a certain section of the Socialist school may be, we must assume that, among its disciples, are many visionaries of beneficent intent. But then we also know how Hades is paved.

Any nation that once seriously adopted the principle of Socialism as its Magna Charta would automatically sign its own death-warrant as a community. The rate of progress of the industrial army would be brought down to that of the slowest marcher. Socialism is a negation of the great law of evolution by which humanity has struggled up a plane of progress. Order has been evolved from chaos in every unit of the universe under the stress of evolution. That the teaching of Socialism should have obtained any hold upon the minds of a community of thinkers and workers is surely proof of radical unsoundness in many departments of economics. It is a counsel of despair, and the State could not, any more than the individual, yield to the impulses which such counsel suggests and at the same time retain its sanity.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The lady who, on receipt of an intimation from her bankers that her account was overdrawn, forwarded them her own cheque for a larger sum with the remark that this would put matters straight, unconsciously illustrated the Socialist creed. The assumption that the working capital of a nation is a State affair, in which the individual need have no part or lot, that by it the internal forces of the State can be manipulated at will without affecting the national economy, is a proposition the statement of which is its own confutation. In any community in which the springs of industry were beyond the control of individual initiative, the incentive to work would cease to exist. There surely is no more undemocratic creed than that of Socialism, and its disciples rightly attack not only the individualism on which the economic security of a nation depends, but also the family relations on which the entire fabric of a civilised community ultimately rests.

In the year 1794 three youths loitered about Bristol City, full of wonderful dreams on the subject of joint emigration. That was not the phrase they used to describe their intentions. According to their talk they were going to found a "Pantisocracy" beyond the seas. Like Mr. Micawber, they thought that, before sailing, their natural course was to be "on the spot." Two of the youths were destined to fame, one to immortality. Coleridge was the immortal, Southey was a famous name, and Lovell the odd man of the trio. The spot upon which they had fixed their minds' eye was Susquehanna, a name that runs trippingly on the tongue, so as to satisfy a gourmet of sound. Perhaps that was why it was their objective. Certain little practical difficulties blocked their immediate course. One primary obstacle was the fact that they were without funds, a trivial trouble which they determined to overcome, like true literary knight-errants, at the pen's point. They were bound for a Promised Land, where, so they told themselves—two hours' labour a day on the land would suffice to supply their needs. The rest of their time they vowed should be spent in Socratic discussion of fate and freewill and idyllic musing. The first requisite in furnishing such an Eden was obviously the female element. They therefore decided that matrimony must be the initial step. They accordingly chose three sisters, whom in due course the three youths married. They were lucky enough to find a benevolent publisher to lift them out of their financial slough. His name was Amos Cottle, a prosaic name for one destined to prove the backer of Pegasus, and the "rich uncle" of the Muses. The name and the incident did not escape the acrid humour of Byron.

But now a marvel came to light. Having obtained a fancy price for their literary wares, the vision of a community overseas, where all property should be in common, where life could be spent in a lotus land of Avilion, apparently began to grow dim and fade away. The hard, prosaic facts relating to daily bread and butter and the periodical payment of butchers' bills were doubtless very troublesome. They had a luckless knack of recurring. Thus it came to pass that the trio slowly abandoned their cloud-world and came back to Mother Earth with disillusioned eyes. That they did not grow morbid misanthropes is to their credit.

That same revulsion of sentiment will surely overtake those communities who to-day are coquetting with Socialism. Its evangels are a strangely composite body, busy blowing bubbles of imagination in every corner of the world Wherever, literally from China to Peru, an undercurrent of discontent with the established order of things is apparent, the leaven of Socialism is at work. One cannot but admire the zeal and tactical skill with which the creed is being expounded. In Great Britain, from the professional classes down to the classes who depend upon the labour of their hands, rises a united chorus of discontent. Every class within these wide limits is crying out that its relative prosperity is less to-day than of old, that life yearly grows harder and competition more unscrupulous. Radical speakers answer such complaints by first of all denying the fact. They point to the increase in the collective wealth of the community and to the statistical diminution in the ratio of pauperism. They attribute the spirit of unrest throughout industrial Europe to the divine discontent of the worker, who, in view of a goal of better things, is rightly dissatisfied with his existing lot. It is true that the labour of women and children is now subject to humane legal restriction, but can it be denied that the present trend of things is to induce a tyranny more abject than that of mid-Victorian days? The population has increased to an inordinate extent, and although the volume of manufacture has also vastly risen, the relative predominance of Great Britain, as the workshop of the world, is being lost. Year by year industries are allowed to drift into foreign hands; markets in which British goods were wont to be predominant are passing to Germany and the United States; and the industrial pride of the British worker, under the stimulus of which work of the best and most enduring character used to be produced, is being frittered away.

The truth is that Cobdenism, a live creed in the 'sixties and 'seventies, is dying fast, and Socialism is trying hard to fit the crown of the dying king upon its own brow. One of two courses lies in the lap of the immediate future. Either our communities must be brought back to the elemental service of the land, or dry rot will set in in our overgrown centres of production. The fate of the Empires of the past, where vast and increasing hordes of men herded together for industrial purposes, will in the end befall Great Britain, the modern world's mart. She cannot hope to set economic laws at naught with impunity any more than they; and empirical attempts to do so will in the long run prove themselves merely temporary stop-gaps—permanently shams.

ART

DECEASED FRENCH ARTISTS

Mr. Van Wisselingh has collected an interesting group of pictures at his gallery in Grafton Street, though the exhibits are of somewhat unequal quality. There is in their work a curious note of uncertainty and groping after effects which have hardly taken shape in the minds of the painters, and therefore fail to get themselves expressed definitely upon canvas. Such work is mainly interesting as an early stage in development, and it lacks perforce the firm and decided touch that marks the man who knows what he is aiming at. But in the case of such masters as Millet and Puvis de Chavannes there is an especial interest in watching the tentative efforts of men who ultimately rose to the rank of masters. In Millet's case that interest is intensified by the presence of so fine a finished work as his "L'Église de Chailly," full of all that mystery and compelling charm of atmosphere that he came in the process of time to render with such perfection. Fantin-Latour is represented by some riotous excesses in paint, as well as by some wonderful copies from Titian and Paolo Veronese; his power and skill are always unquestionable, even when disguised in such blurred combinations of colour as some of those on the walls of this exhibition. Corot, whose rendering of atmosphere excelled even that of his great compatriot Millet, is represented here by some exquisite work, notably his "Ramasseuses d'Herbes," and Jongkind by two characteristically beautiful works, "Les Patineurs" and "Trouville." Carolus Duran and C. F. Daubigny are also worthily represented, and there are other striking works to be seen besides. Altogether, then, a meritorious show, which all art-lovers should visit.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE INTERNATIONAL SOCIETY

THE Eleventh Exhibition of the International Society of Sculptors, Painters, and Gravers, now open at the Grafton Galleries, contains much excellent work, as well as some that is merely eccentric, and more that is difficult to classify. Perhaps the most striking work exhibited is the statue-group by Rodin, "L'éternelle Idole," a marvellous and daring expression of overpowering sexual passion, which subdues by sheer mastery of genius, and raises the artist's choice of a subject above the reach of criticism. Another splendid work is Mr. J. Lavery's portrait of Anna Pavlova, the Russian dancer, in which the witchery of balanced movement is marvellous—boldly realised and convincingly expressed. As pitiless and uncompromising as Sargent, but quite without Sargent's power, is Mr. Harrington Mann's portrait of Miss Marie Tempest, and a strange and disillusioning but exceedingly clever work is Mrs. Willoughby's rendering of the Judgment of Paris in the style of the Greek vase-paintings. Did the creators of these immortal myths really visualise them in quite such coarse and grotesque fashion? It may be so, but we hope not, and we turn to Tennyson's "Œnone" again to take the taste out of our mouths.

A beautiful water-colour is that by Mrs. C. L. Adam, of Hayle, Cornwall—unpretentious, truthful, and full of feeling for the fine effects of sky and sea and river to be met with at that pleasant spot. The same artist gives a delightful study of "Stormy Weather;" and there is some excellent technique displayed in Mr. A. T. Benthall's "Toure de Faure." A very clever and virile portrait is that by Mr. William Nicholson of Mr. F. Nash, the Clerk of the Merchant Taylors' Company; and there is true pathos, as distinguished from cheap sentiment, in Mr. Harrington Mann's "Mother and Child." Miss Constance Rea's pretty eighteenth-century study, "A Maiden all Forlorn," is one that remains in the memory; and another fine and unpretentious portrait is Miss Ethel Walker's likeness of Mr. Arthur Abney Walker. The great French impressionists are represented by Claude Monet and Degas—the former with a study of a Dutch windmill and a view of the Thames at London, both very characteristic and clever works, the latter by one of his equally characteristic and clever ballet-girls. A fine piece of pure decorative work is Mr. R. Anning Bell's frieze, "The South Wind;" and Mr. Francis Newbury's portrait of Professor Gilbert Murray is a powerful piece of work. And a statue of real pathos, which remains a vivid image in the mind of him who has seen it, is Mr. Fleming Baxter's touching work, "The Blind Child"—a really exquisite piece of sculpture.

PICTURES BY MR. GARNET WOLSELEY AND MR. BERTRAM NICHOLLS

THERE is some very promising work, and some in which the promise may be said to have been fulfilled, by these two young artists at the St. George's Gallery, New Bond Street, and their appeal to the public is one which deserves attention. Mr. Wolseley is particularly happy in his rendering of children on the sea-shore; he is sure in his handling of wet sand, of sunshine, and the unstudied and beautiful attitudes of children playing. His sense of colour is particularly true and sympathetic, and the brilliancy with which he renders vivid tints which the slightest false step would make garish is particularly striking. His near relationship to the late Mr. Ruskin invests his promise and success with a special interest of its own. Mr. Nicholls' water-colours are of somewhat unequal quality, but they, too, contain much promising work.

THE POET'S HOLIDAY

X.—THE NEWSPAPER HABIT

PERHAPS one of the most striking differences between the national life of the English and the Belgians is the fact that the average Englishman reads the newspaper and the average Belgian does not. I do not think that there can be any argument as to the truth of this. I have found myself that by running through the Belgian newspapers every day—a feat that can easily be performed in half an hour by any one who has been brought up on the Times or the Daily Telegraph—I am better informed on current events in Belgium than any of the Belgians I meet. In this country, which in many respects is strangely primitive immediately below the surface, the gossip of the cafés and the streets is still the principal medium for the transmission of news. It would seem, however, that the days of this enviable freedom from the tyranny of the Press are numbered; some of the newspapers claim large circulations, and it is apparent that many Belgians make a practice of buying the newspapers though they have not yet acquired the vicious habit of reading them. They probably do not realise the risk they run in introducing these masses of print into the quietude of their homes. It may be granted that they have not the smallest intention of looking at them; but sooner or later—on a wet afternoon, perhaps, or in a moment of ennui—they will peep between the folded leaves and read an interesting paragraph concerning a thunderstorm in Colombo, or the latest telegram as to the defalcations of an omnibus-conductor in Nuremberg. From this it is but a step to the reading of leading articles and the rapt perusal of the advertisement columns. These are delights more insidious than alcohol or opium, and in a very short time they will become slaves to that craze for print to which Mr. Edgar Jepson once devoted an eloquent article in THE ACADEMY.

This aimless reading of daily newspapers is without doubt the most serious intellectual vice of modern England, although, like most important vices, it masquerades as a virtue. To take an interest in our country and in the doings of our fellow human beings is among the most obvious of our duties; but a critical examination of any copy of a modern newspaper will convince the unprejudiced observer that it is neither patriotism nor a broad spirit of humanity that inspires the supporters of our daily press. The newspapers cannot be blamed for endeavouring to give their readers what they want, and when we find that nine-tenths of their space is devoted to the sensational and the trivial we are justified in supposing that nine-tenths of their readers like that kind of thing. The trivial satisfies their curiosity, the sensational satisfies their lust for adventure, and the newspaper as a whole satisfies their too easily satisfied desire for culture. This is the enormous responsibility that the modern newspaper is apt to accept a little lightly—that with the large majority of its readers it takes the place of all other reading matter. It must be at once a Bible, an encyclopædia, and a handbook to politics; a cookery-book, a treatise on popular science and a sporting guide. It must be the Hundred Best Books, a child's Guide to Knowledge, and a Peerage; a textbook on botany, astronomy, and natural history. It must be sister to the moon in eclipse, and little brother to the giant gooseberry. It must be newer than the guide-book of the tourist, and older than the rocks among which he sits. It must know how to reconcile a high moral tone with its functions as a romantic Newgate Calendar, and play the judge and the criminal with an equal grace. It must defend the rich from the poor, and the poor from the rich, with a fervour that fails when it is not interesting. It must know how to estimate the value to humanity of passing events; a hundred columns for a good murder, six columns for the speech of a politician, and a quarter of a column to herald the appearance of a new masterpiece in art. It must rake the gutters of the world for crime, and be swift in chronicling accidents and disasters. It must condemn vice with vehemence, and strangle virtue with platitudes. It must deride minorities, and congratulate majorities on reflecting its opinions. It must be registered at the General Post Office as a newspaper, and must be large enough when unfolded to serve as a tablecloth for the lower classes.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Is this tirade exaggerated? At all events there is nothing in it that I regret except perhaps the reference to a famous and irritating passage of Walter Pater. It is generally agreed that the daily newspapers of England are the best in the world, and it is worth anybody's while to live abroad to avoid them. I speak on this point with the emphasis of a momentarily-reformed drunkard, for I confess that when I am in England I am as much the slave of this vice of newspaper reading as any one else. It is the mark of the newspaper inebriate that he does not very much mind which newspaper he reads, and that he reads them from one end to the other—politics, sport, City news and advertisements, with equal interest. To help him in this he brings a curious cunning to bear; he takes certain racehorses and politicians under his protection and is pleased when he finds a mention of their names. He makes friends with Steel Commons and Canadian Pacifics because they have a lively nature, and he watches their movements in the market with genuine excitement. He observes the stammering histories of the agony columns, and the normal dishonesty of advertisers in general. He reads the serial stories; indeed the passion for reading bad novels in arbitrary instalments is one of the most marked symptoms of the vice, and must not be mistaken for commonplace insanity. Your true newspaper-reader is best pleased when he can begin the serial in the middle and read every second instalment to the end. He does not wish his intellect to be disturbed by the significance of things. He seeks the tranquillity of words, words arranged in grammatical sentences that convey nothing in particular to his somnolent mind. When he is in a fantastic mood he seeks diversion in printers' errors, or in the cross-readings that made the fame of Caleb Whitefoord, and sometimes he has been known to make a collection of journalistic clichés in a small black pocket-book. But it is to the leading articles that he returns like a child to the lap of its mother. There, at all events, he is secure from the noisy irruption of ideas, the desires of ambitious thinkers, the disquieting audacities of youth. There he may drowse in the land where it is always the day before yesterday, lulled by a tide of words to which the most morbid reader can attach no human significance.

This absorbed reading of daily newspapers is a vice, because it rather provides a substitute for life than contributes to our enjoyment of it. It helps us to pass the hours, but it does not make us wiser either by precept or experience, and, at the end, we are only so many hours poorer without any spiritual or mental compensation. Few people realise how much time they waste in nodding sagely over the morning papers. Let them lay the habit aside for a week or two, and they will be astonished at the lengthening of the days, the growth of the period that separates lunch from breakfast. Let them at the same time lay aside the illusion that there is generally something important to be found in the newspapers if you look for it long enough. They have only to ask themselves every morning after they have finished the paper what they have gained by its perusal to be convinced of the emptiness of this theory. There is hardly ever anything in the daily newspapers that we are the richer for knowing; and for the most part men and women read them for that reason.

So when a week or two ago a Belgian novelist told me that he thought newspaper-reading was increasing in Belgium I did not congratulate him. On the other hand, I told him that in England the daily newspaper is killing the magazine, the review, the novel, the short story, and the drama; that it has already killed poetry and made politics impossible for a sane man. That it flings literature to the professors, and painting to the Royal Academicians. That it labours to confirm the common mind in its vulgar self-satisfaction, and is the avowed enemy of all that is original or noble in modern thought.

"But you have the best newspapers in the world!" exclaimed the novelist. And the queer part of it is that I honestly believe we have.

RICHARD MIDDLETON.

SHEFFIELD MUSICAL FESTIVAL

FOR the first time in the history of the great choral festivals, which are so important a feature of the provincial towns of England and Germany, the whole of the preparation and conduct of the music of one of them has been undertaken and carried out by one man. It is characteristic of Sir Henry Wood that he should ask to be given the opportunity of making so daring an experiment, and should incidentally make it the occasion of a number of minor experiments in the details of the choral training, interpretation, and platform arrangement. It is almost equally characteristic of him that he should carry it to a highly successful issue and have the confidence arising from conscious ability to tell his fellow-workers and the public that he has done it. It is a triumph of pertinacity and zeal, of ability and right—because effective—methods. Though he did not hesitate to take full advantage of the work of his predecessor (Dr. Henry Coward) in the most important work of training the chorus, his methods are so entirely different as to be opposed to Dr. Coward's in some important respects. Both are agreed, however, in the opinion that most of the traditions regarding the performance of the works of Bach and Handel are anything but what they should be, and a traditional rendering of the works of those composers in Sheffield, or in any place where the musical influence of that city reaches, is now almost an impossibility. As a consequence the chorus, consisting of three hundred voices selected with great care from a large body of applicants residing in the district, was as plastic and open to the impression of a conductor's and teacher's individuality as possible. Probably no conductor has ever before had material so perfectly suited to his purposes, and no chorus a conductor more fully acquainted with its possibilities. The mutual sympathy was exceptional.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

With these circumstances the results were of surpassing interest even where they were most open to criticism. The programme was interesting because of the anticipations of unconventionality it aroused. Handel's "Messiah" is a work which a few years ago was too uninteresting for the critic to attend or to do more than mention casually. Bach's "High Mass in B minor" and "The Passion according to St. Matthew" supplied opportunities of different types of technical achievement, but were regarded as beyond the appreciation of the ordinary musical amateur, and much farther beyond that of the uninstructed man in the street. Now we are able to find emotional elements in these works which appeal to every one possessing a human heart and mind; and this year's Sheffield Festival has made history by plumbing these to their deepest depths. Sometimes the expression jarred on those whose feelings are finer and more subtle than the majority, yet the spirit seemed to be the right one. Surely the greatest reverence that can be paid to a great master of the past is to make his work live and move the hearts of people in the present. This is what Sir Henry Wood and his assistants have done at Sheffield. "The Messiah" was as descriptive in the music as in the words; the dramatic qualities which Handel himself observed were realised, though in details some of the effects were overreached. The "Mass" was one great expression of faith in the eternal mysteries, and the great chorus "Cum Sancto Spiritu" comparable only to Doré's illustration to the twenty-seventh Canto of Dante's "Il Paradiso" with the added emotion of sound. "The Passion," in keeping with its character, had little or none of the virtuoso effects of the other two works, but was interpreted in a way that made the day seem a real Good Friday.

The fear of competition, which would have proved disastrous to both undertakings, made it impossible that Herr Denhof should present "The Ring of the Nibelungs" in Sheffield the same year as the Musical Festival. To make up to some extent for this a selection consisting of the closing scenes from the four dramas was included in the Festival programme, as well as the Grail Scene and Finale of "Parsifal." These, and particularly the latter, proved, first, the utter unsuitability of Wagner's later music for concert performance, and, secondly, Sir Henry Wood's weakness as a Wagnerian conductor. Experiments were made in creating the effect of distance in the Rhinemaidens' Song from "Das Rheingold," and the Voice of Titurel, the Boys' Voices and Youths' Voices in the dome from "Parsifal." The most effective of these was the first, though none was quite satisfactory. The architectural conditions of the hall were entirely opposed to this, and the screens used to cover the voices made it difficult for the singers to use their voices effectively or to follow the conductor with ease. Considering the greatness of the difficulties, however, they were surmounted with a fair measure of success. The sentiment of the Wagner numbers never attained dignity, and the phrasing and "analytical" reading of the works were not good.

The experiment of changing the time of the Festival from October to April apparently was not a success, for the audiences, except at the Friday evening concert, when Granville Bantock's popular "Omar Khayyám" and the "Parsifal" excerpt filled the programme, fell far short in numbers of those of previous years. The method of employing one man to fill the two offices of conductor and chorusmaster may be declared an unqualified success.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

By Lancelot Lawton

DIPLOMACY AND COMMERCE

Among the causes at different times advanced to account for the decline of British commercial interests in various parts of the world is that of inadequate support from official quarters. Repeatedly it is urged against our Foreign Office and against our diplomatic representatives abroad that their neglect in this respect places business men at a serious disadvantage as compared with foreign rivals, who invariably receive active assistance from their own Governments. It is highly probable that before long, either in Parliament or in the Press, or perhaps through the medium of some association organised specially for the purpose, an attempt will be made to invite public opinion on the question with the object of stimulating official energy. There can be no doubt that British diplomatists have a proper conception of their exalted duties—duties which, by their very nature, lend themselves to the accompaniment of dignified reserve; and it is no exaggeration to say that in consequence our Embassies and Legations are regarded by the peoples in whose midst they are placed as worthily in keeping with British traditions no less than with the best features of British character. At the same time, in order to maintain our pre-eminence as a commercial Power, we must recognise that even diplomacy should adapt itself to changing conditions. Nor is there any reason to believe that this recognition will necessarily involve the lowering of the prestige of our representatives abroad. Other countries have not been slow to discover that the present is essentially a business-like age requiring business-like methods, not only from the individual, but from every department of State.

The extension of communications to all parts of the world has had an important bearing upon the duties of a diplomatist. In former days, before cables linked remote ends of the earth together, Legations in distant countries were frequently called upon to deal with situations which allowed a wide margin of initiative. Now, as it were, they are at the end of a line stretching from Downing Street, and their responsibilities have been lightened by reason of the fact that within a few hours at most they can receive instructions from home. In another sphere, however, their duties have been appreciably increased. To-day business men think nothing of journeying several thousands of miles in search of openings for their enterprise. And, not unnaturally, they look to British representatives abroad for help in some way or other. Invariably they meet with a reception which, if not positively discouraging, is at least lukewarm, and which, as I have already observed, places them at a marked disadvantage in their competition with foreign rivals. Thus the frequent complaint is heard on all sides that British diplomatists have at heart a contempt for anything connected with commerce, or, in other words, that they look upon the advancement of commercial interests as altogether inconsistent with the dignity of their high office. When full allowance has been made for the undeniable fact that grumbling is somewhat chronic among business people, it is within the knowledge of all who have travelled far and wide that British enterprise suffers to no small extent in consequence of the failure of our representatives abroad to appreciate the importance of trade.

Let us turn for the moment to the example set by other nations. It does not follow that these examples are necessarily the embodiment of all that is wise when they are considered in relation to high policy; but some reference to them will at least afford an instructive comparison with British methods, or, to speak more accurately, with the lack of British methods. America has certainly led the way in combining business with diplomacy. Many of her Ambassadors and Ministers are selected because they have sound commercial knowledge. It will be within recollection that the name of Mr. John Hays Hammond, the eminent engineer, has been freely mentioned in connection with the representation at Berlin. Then it is alone due to the vigorous support of the Washington Government that American bankers are taking the lead in Chinese finance. These bankers have as their representative Mr. Willard Straight, who was formerly the Consul-General at Mukden. Whenever a prominent American business man arrives in any capital he is promptly taken "under the wing" of the representative of his country, who introduces him to Ministerial circles, and to the best society, and not infrequently arranges that he shall be given the honour of an audience with the reigning monarch.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Germans are equally energetic in the furtherance of their commercial interests. Certain financial institutions are openly and unceasingly accorded diplomatic support. On many occasions I have heard it said of an Ambassador or Minister that he was to all intents and purposes the "representative of Krupps." I recollect that during the Russo-Japanese War a German firm supplied the Japanese Government with a number of locomotives. This was their first order from the Japanese Government, and they were very anxious to give satisfaction. When a trial of the locomotives was being made the German Minister attended personally. Although a storm was raging, he stood patiently for several hours, under a soaking deluge, making notes of the few defects that were discovered. Subsequently he sent a report to his Government, and this report was communicated to the contracting firm, so that they would be in a position to remedy all faults in future orders. And, needless to add, the same firm did secure more orders. The Belgian diplomatists are also active in commercial matters. I knew a Belgian Minister in an Eastern capital who made no effort to conceal the fact that he was acting as the representative of an industrial syndicate.

The Russian Government, again, often lends the whole weight of its support to an application by one of its nationals for a concession, and a recent report from St. Petersburg states that, whenever possible, men with business knowledge will be appointed to diplomatic posts. It is well known that in China the Japanese Government uses political pressure as a means of promoting trade and commerce.

It is, of course, undesirable for many reasons, and it is not expected, that British diplomatists should allow themselves to become active agents of commerce or finance. Yet, unfortunately, it is too often the case at the present time that they exhibit in their relations with business men a timidity which has the effect of retarding British interests. I have in mind a British Ambassador who made no secret of the fact that his fixed policy was to prevent competition among his own countrymen. Therefore he steadfastly declined to do anything for anybody. Another instance of British impotence brought to my notice was that of a merchant who was on the eve of securing an enormous contract from a Government. The only condition remaining to be fulfilled was the production of a letter from his Ambassador setting forth simply that the firm he represented was of undoubted standing. The Ambassador declined to give this document. Happily, the merchant was a friend of the Ambassador of a foreign country, whose assurance on the point raised was accepted. But for this timely courtesy British industry would have lost a very valuable contract.

On the other hand, many occasions have occurred where "undesirable" persons, in the strict sense of the term, have been able to bring influence to bear upon the Foreign Office, as a consequence of which they have been furnished with letters of introduction to our diplomatic representatives asking that all possible favours should be extended to them. When business men of high reputation are not similarly treated, but, on the contrary, meet with scant consideration, it would seem that in commercial matters there is need for drastic reform in the methods of Downing Street. Perhaps it is not inopportune in an article of this kind to refer to the slackness which characterises the publication of Consular reports. It seldom happens that the annual trade reports are not hopelessly belated. When eventually they do appear, they are invariably found to be colourless documents devoid of information of any positive value, thus comparing very unfavourably with the German and American reports of a like nature. From many important places where Consular representatives reside, it is not deemed necessary to issue a report at all. It is true that, generally speaking, the Service is composed of men of ability, and sometimes of conspicuous ability, but their energies are restricted by official regulation and custom, and, not infrequently, are controlled by diplomatists whose attitude towards commerce, as we have seen, is far from enthusiastic. It is clear, then, that while the Foreign Office may acquit itself admirably in matters of high policy, too often it neglects to broaden the very foundations upon which that policy rests—the commercial enterprise of Great Britain in all parts of the world.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN LITERARY SOCIETY

At the Imperial Institute on Tuesday afternoon of last week a lecture was delivered by the Rev. R. S. Latimer, his subject being "Cross versus Crescent in Russia." The President of the Anglo-Russian Literary Society, Mr. E. A. Cazalet, occupied the chair.

The lecturer briefly reviewed the history of Islam within the Russian borders, referring to its champions in arms against Grand Dukes and Tsars, from the early Tartar Khans to Schamyl, the fierce prophet of the Caucasus. The policy of the Tsar towards his Muslim subjects was outlined and contrasted with the policy adopted by the Orthodox Church towards their fellow-Christians of other creeds. Mission work, both Orthodox and Protestant, among the Mohammedans of the Empire was treated of, with its many and great difficulties, its self-sacrifices, and its encouragements.

Mr. Latimer, in conclusion, examined the possible effects of Muslim Modernism, the new spirit that has arisen in Islam, upon the relations between Cross and Crescent in the land of the Tsar.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

I DO not think that any one will regret the passing of the account. It has been extremely melancholy. The fall in prices has not been severe, but we all expected so much. As a result our disappointment has been accentuated. In the City, however, no one looks back. All have their eyes fixed on the future. Some of us too much so—at any rate for the good of our pockets. Perhaps that is why the Jew is so successful, for he neither looks backwards nor forwards, but confines his energies to the affair of the instant; and whilst we Christians are calculating the sovereigns that we shall make in the forthcoming month he is annexing our pennies. The promoters show signs of fatigue. I am not surprised, for the public in almost every case has declined to shoulder the burden.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The Edward Lloyd shares were, however, a sound investment. The Mappin and Webb issue was also good. Indeed, I have very little to say against the Harrison and Crosfield 5½ per cent. prefs., for I think that Lampard is a clever man.

There are dozens of companies ready to come out. Manville and Martin have secured an extraordinary advertisement for Premier Omnibus Company, but whether it is the kind of reclaim they desire is doubtful. The irrepressible Dr. Pearson and his crowd are asking for 1,200,000 6 per cent. twelve-year Bonds on a Texas Land Company. They appear to me speculative. Mr. Redmond, of Leeds, desires £50,000 for a Western Galicia Petroleum Company, but the wells are old and require deepening. The long-delayed Balcobo Tin Mines are also to be brought out. I have heard of them so many times that I fancy they have a musty flavour.

Money.—The repayment of a batch of Treasury Bills gave the Money Market all it required. The account on the Stock Exchange has been reduced and the Government has fixed the date of the Budget. All this means that we shall gradually get a superfluity of cash in the City. Therefore it is quite possible that the Bank Rate will fall to 2½. At the present moment there are only two money centres where money is in demand, one is Berlin, the other is Montreal. I do not anticipate that the Montreal demand will become urgent before the autumn, and Berlin can always get whatever she wants from Paris. The Canadian Bank of Commerce has increased its capital, and this shows that it is in need of cash. I understand that all the other Banks in Canada are in a similar plight. They have been lending money to the promoters on schemes that have not yet been floated.

Foreigners.—The Foreign Market has not seen a bargain done during the whole account except in Perus. German Threes, however, have fallen, owing, it is said, to the necessity for money that exists in Germany. If this fall continues they should be purchased, as German Threes, French Rentes, and English Consols are the three leading stocks of the world and as good as gold.

Home Rails have dwindled by sixteenths and eighths during the whole account. The fall, however, looks as though it were coming to an end. The bull account has been largely reduced. After all, prices on the Stock Exchange are governed almost entirely by the state of the market, and the moment we get dealers short in Home Rails then wise people will begin to buy. I think that the fall in South Western deferred has been a little overdone. This company has some great schemes ahead, for which it requires large sums of money, and the market has charitably marked down the stock, knowing that it will be asked to place some of the new scrip. The agitation still goes on in favour of bearer securities. Why the great railway companies do not agree instantly is more than I can understand. The expense of transferring railway stock is serious, and few banks will lend unless they get a transfer. If we had bonds to bearer borrowing facilities would be enormously increased, and many people would invest their money in the best English railways and borrow money from their bank to take up the stock. They would make a profit on the transaction and would really be getting an option for nothing. In addition to this great advantage English railway stock in bearer bonds would be largely purchased on the Continent, and we should have a free market in Paris as well as in London. This would raise the price from 5 to 10 points.

Yankees.—The American market remains perfectly stagnant, and prices move a few dollars up, only to fall the next day. It is extraordinary that these Trust decisions should exercise such a numbing influence on the otherwise bold spirit of the American speculator. I am assured by people who have just returned from New York that no one will invest money in anything until they see which way the Supreme Court is going to act. The argument is that it is useless to buy to-day when by waiting people will be able to buy ten dollars lower down. But if everybody is waiting for the Trust decisions, then the expected panic which is to attend those decisions will not occur. A great many good judges hold that the decisions will have no effect whatever upon prices. Money is gradually accumulating in America, and it is said that the crops for the present year will be a record. It is early to speak about crops, but I am only repeating what I am told. Atchisons appear to be the only stock that is being purchased. This is a favourite Boston gamble. Good line, as it seems to me, fully valued to-day.

Rubber.—Surely Mr. Lampard, having obtained a fresh supply of money, will move up the market. Prices are now within a few shillings of a reasonable level. Indeed I advise a purchase of most of the best shares if they fall another shilling or two. There is a wild effort being made in Brazil to hoist up the price of fine hard-cured Para. I do not think that it will succeed. It is much more likely that those who are carrying stocks to-day will unload on the rash speculators. Nevertheless there is very little chance of a serious fall, and at present prices the good plantations that are moderately capitalised are doing well.

Oil.—The Oil share market is steady because the public does not buy and the promoters have enough money to lend punters who favour their specialities. Gambling in oil shares is confined to a very few people. No one would dream of buying an oil share as an investment. I have on different occasions mentioned which oil shares I consider good, but I again repeat that Black Sea, Burmah, California, and Spies are moderately good speculations, although all of them are as high as they should be. George Macdonald's Standard of Mexico has had great luck in securing the land immediately adjoining the Mexican Eagle gusher. If he can strike oil—and it seems only a question of money—then this concern should do extremely well.

Kaffirs.—The Kaffir market remains dead, but City Deeps and Knights are both worth buying at present prices, for they are good mines, and Knights yields a purchaser over 10 per cent. Its life is twenty-eight years, and in a couple of years' time it should pay 50 per cent. dividend. This should give those who buy to-day over 15 per cent. on their money.

Rhodesians.—The Rhodesian market had a very nasty shock, for Jumbos, which had been looked upon as a cheap share at 10s., suddenly fell to 5s. It was then discovered that Mr. Piper, the Consulting Engineer to the Goldfields, had written a very bad report. Someone must have known of this and operated upon it. It is these constant leakages of information that prevent the public from touching Rhodesian shares. I am not surprised, for the whole incident leaves a very nasty taste in the mouth. The feeling on the Stock Exchange was very strong. The Shamva continues to develop well, but the price of the shares is far too high for me to advise a purchase.

Omnibus shares have been one of the main topics of conversation during the whole week. At one time they fell to 84. As I write this they are over par. A circular has gone out and an agreement has been come to with the other passenger-carrying companies in London. The fluctuations in this stock are so violent that wise people keep out of the shares.

Raymond Radclyffe.

CORRESPONDENCE

"MARRIAGE AND COMMON SENSE"

To the Editor of The Academy

Sir,—My attention has been called to a letter signed "R. W.-S.," in which some exception is taken to my review of Mr. Chapman's book, "Marriage and Divorce."

Your correspondent's first point is that personalities in criticism are undesirable. I agree with him absolutely as to the general principle: I disagree with him as absolutely when he implies that I have been guilty of personalities in my notice of Mr Chapman's book.

"R. W.-S." gives two citations from the review in support of this charge. "He talks freely of immorality as if he knew what it meant;" this is one excerpt, and "R. W.-S." is apparently under the impression that it means: "Mr. Chapman talks so freely of immorality that he must be a very immoral person himself." This, however, is not the true signification of my phrase. My intent was that "morality"—the rule of right and wrong—has varied, and does still vary, in different times and among different peoples to such a huge extent that it is extremely difficult to lay down, offhand, any exact criterion of ethics—that is, if one once departs from the strict law of the Christian Church.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The other instance of supposed personal allusion is, says "R. W.-S.," to be found in the sentence, "Who is Mr. Chapman, to dismiss Islam and China and Japan as nests of immorality? One may strain the jurisdiction of Metropolitan Magistrate too far." This allusion to Mr. Chapman's avocation does not answer to my definition of "personality," using the word in its second intention as meaning an offensive and unwarrantable allusion to a man's private affairs. If the Archbishop of Canterbury wrote a book I should feel no compunction as a reviewer in alluding to the author's high office. The fact that Mr. Chapman is a Metropolitan Magistrate is not a secret or a private matter; it is announced on the title-page of his book. If a reviewer said, "What business has Mr. X. to talk about taste and morals, considering his red nose, his fondness for tripe and onions, and his habit of beating his wife every Saturday?" then, I think, one would have "personality" in the usual sense of the word.

"R. W.-S." is more interesting when he expresses his adherence to Mr. Chapman's dictum: "Greater individual freedom invariably creates a greater sense of individual responsibility."

A few weeks ago I met two officials of the British South Africa Company. These gentlemen were telling me about the Wawemba, the tribe which they help to govern. The Wawemba have great individual freedom with respect to marriage. The result is that all succession counts through the female line only, and one lady who came before the authorities turned out to have had seven "husbands" in eighteen months.

Another tribe of which I know something inhabits the United States of America. This tribe has great individual freedom with respect to marriage: the results of that freedom are of unsavoury and wide-world notoriety. In neither case has the freedom brought about the sense of responsibility—unless, in really advanced and thoughtful circles, "responsibility" means licensed concubinage.

Panurge in "Pantagruel," growing older, felt the dread of bad wine an increasing weight upon his heart. And I, growing older also, confute with an ever-increasing distaste (which will soon become nausea and loathing) the great argument that the only way to put down burglary is to hang the locksmiths and stick up a coloured sign, "This way to the silver spoons," near the open door.

ARTHUR MACHEN.

"THE PRINCESS VIRGINIA"

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—I begged Mr. Methuen, our publisher, not to have "Princess Virginia" sent to any papers for review, as she is twelve years old (very young for a girl, but extremely aged for a book of that sort!), merely touched up a little, and renamed from "The Adventure of Princess Sylvia." I thought Mr. Methuen had decided to do as I asked; for I was sure poor little "Virginia" was much too passée for the critics. Saying "I told you so!" to him may be a slight satisfaction, but it cannot make up for a misunderstanding in THE ACADEMY, whose good opinion my husband and I highly value.

I fancied there was a note in this 2s. edition to say that it was an old book; but as we spend the winters in France I didn't feel curious enough to send and make sure.

It would be extraordinarily nice of you if you could, and would, kindly say that a wail came from France announcing that "Princess Virginia" is a very old person disguised as a young girl of the moment in a 2s. frock.—Yours very truly,

ALICE WILLIAMSON.

Menton, May 5th.

THE STATE INSURANCE SCHEME

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—The attitude assumed by the Unionist Press in connection with Mr. Lloyd George's Insurance Scheme is a striking example of Opposition weakness. Indeed, it may be said to discover the actual cause of the present Government's impregnable position.

The very Gargantuan proportions of this scheme for the insular adjustment of things is an admittance, on the Government's own part, of the vast depravity of our industrial distress. Each party stands upon equal ground, in that each party is unanimous for a policy of national or constitutional reform. There is, therefore, a mutual acknowledgment of a national or constitutional clog in State affairs. The Liberals declare this clog to be due to a check upon national freedom—that is to say, to the Veto put by the Lords upon autocratic measures for supplies and redress introduced by a Liberal Cabinet. On the other hand, the Unionists declare this clog to be due to the vicious or tyrannical nature of the said measures.

Now, as a matter of fact, the Unionist party is right, its one fault existing in its failure to give a national or non-partisan tone to its Conservative attitude.

For instance, there cannot exist at the same time two national grounds for reform. Which, therefore, is the constitutional element which needs reforming—the governing or the non-governing element? The answer is as clear as daylight, for, as I have previously stated, the very Gargantuan proportions of the present Government's schemes is an admittance on the Government's own part of the needs required in a proper Government.

We arrive, then, at this point. No reform is needed with respect to the facilities possessed for checking preposterous measures for supplies and redress of grievances. Therefore no reform of the House of Lords is needed. For, apart from erratic rule, there could be no political deadlock—no supplies or redress of grievances asked for by a Government which could not be met without an arbitrary system of taxation.

If the Unionist party can be made to see it, this latest move on the part of the Chancellor is merely a trick to deceive the Opposition. Peradventure it is so clever a trick as to have deceived even the Chancellor himself. Sickness and unemployment are two such terrible facts as to demand the sympathies of one and all, no matter of what political views. But is the cure for such evils to be found apart from their causes? Surely, with our present-day knowledge we should be above quack treatment where national matters are concerned. Since when, for instance, has the lack of State insurance been the cause of such national evils as sickness or unemployment or, for that matter, of any of our national forms of distress? And if the lack of such insurance is not responsible, how, in the n me of reason, is such negative treatment to become identified with remedial results, except as a fostering remedy?

Surely, Sir, a Government which governs by anticipating its own incompetence to cope with evils arising out of national forms of oppression cannot lay claim to any positive, and therefore original, measures of rule? England's needs at the present time call for some positive action on the part of her rulers, and not for measures which, like the general run of Liberal measures, anticipate a continuation of the very evils which Government Acts are supposed to cure, and not to pamper or foster. The rottenness of the whole scheme of State Insurance is discovered when it is understood that, by such a system of positive waste (there can be no real form of economy where political action fails to arrest waste tendencies) the evils from which the country is suffering not only remain unchecked, but are legally encouraged. The Government, by this scheme, propound the incurable form of our national distresses. Our hope for any positive form of Government therefore rests with the Unionist party. But that party should beware of the latest blind on the part of the reigning Chancellor.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

When We are Rich: a Callow Chronicle of Frivolous Affairs. By Ward Muir. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.

The Evolution of Katherine. By E. Temple Thurston. Stanley Paul and Co. 6d.

For Braganza. By Michael W. Kaye. Greening and Co. 6s.

Ruth Werdress, Father O'Haralan, and Some New Christians: an Anglo-Irish Tale. By John Godwin Fitzgerald. William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.

The Garden of Resurrection: being the Love Story of an Ugly Man. By E. Temple Thurston. Chapman and Hall. 6s.

Wells Brothers, the Young Cattle Kings. By Andy Adams. Illustrated. Constable and Co. 6s.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

People of Popham. By Mrs. George Wemyss. Constable and Co. 6s.
Winding Paths. By Gertrude Page. Hurst and Blackett. 6s.
Honour's Fetters. By Mary Wynne. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Broken Butterfly: an Austrian Romance. By Ralph Deakin. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
Suffragette Sally. By G. Colmore. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Man with the Red Beard: a Story of Moscow and London. By David Whitelaw. Illustrated. Greening and Co. 6s.
Revelations of the Secret Service. Chronicled by William Le Queux. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
That Wicked Miss Keane. By F. C. Philips. F. V. White and Co. 2s. net.
Brumblingham Hall: the Story of a Strange Death. By James Blyth. F. V. White and Co. 6s.
The Girondin. By Hilaire Belloc. Coloured Frontispiece. T. Nelson and Sons. 2s. net.
Other Laws. By John Parkinson. John Lane. 6s.
Burning Daylight. By Jack London. William Heinemann. 6s.
Kapak. By Alexander Crawford. William Blackwood and Sons. 6s.
If it were Come to Pass. By Ivor Hamilton. Murray and Evenden. 6s.
The Shadow on the Quarter-Deck. By Major W. P. Drury. Chapman and Hall. 2s. net.
Men-at-Arms: Stories and Sketches. By Major W. P. Drury. Chapman and Hall. 2s. net.
In Fear of a Throne. By R. Andom. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 6s.
The Horseshoe. By Mrs. Fred Reynolds. Chapman and Hall. 6s.
Mrs. Alfred Trench. By the Author of "The Views of Christopher." Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

Police and Crime in India. By Sir Edmund C. Cox, Bart. Illustrated. Stanley Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.
D'Eon de Beaumont: his Life and Times. Compiled chiefly from Unpublished Papers and Letters by Octave Homberg and Fernand Jousselin, and now Translated into English by Alfred Rieu. Illustrated. Martin Secker. 10s. 6d. net.
Foreign Affairs for English Readers. By S. Verdad. Frank Palmer. 3s. 6d. net.
Some Old Devon Churches, their Rood Screens, Pulpits, Fonts, &c. By John Stabb. Vol. II. Illustrated. Simpkin, Marshall and Co. 7s. 6d. net.
An Historic Relation of Ceylon, together with Somewhat concerning Severall Remarkable Passages of my Life that hath hapned since my Deliverance out of my Captivity. By Robert Knox, a Captive there near Twenty Years. Illustrated. James MacLehose and Sons. 12s. 6d. net.
The Portrait Book of our Kings and Queens, 1066-1911. Edited by T. Leman Hare. T. C. and E. C. Jack. 2s. 6d. net.
The Family and Heirs of Sir Francis Drake. By Lady Eliott-Drake. 2 vols. Illustrated. Smith, Elder and Co. 31s. 6d. net.
Wordsworthshire. An Introduction to a Poet's Country written by Eric Robertson, M.A., and Illustrated by Arthur Tucker, R.B.A. Chatto and Windus. 7s. 6d. net.
The Mother of Goethe, "Frau Aja." By Margaret Reeks. Illustrated. John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.
Franz Liszt and his Music. By Arthur Hervey. With Portrait. John Lane. 4s. 6d. net.
The Land of Teck and its Neighbourhood. By S. Baring-Gould, M.A. Illustrated. John Lane. 10s. 6d. net.
Figures Littéraires: Ecrivains Français et Étrangers. By Lucien Maury. Perrin and Co., Paris. 3f. 50c.
Friendly Faces of Three Nationalities. By Miss Betham-Edwards. Illustrated. Chapman and Hall. 10s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

Chalkstream and Moorland: Thoughts on Trout Fishing. By Harold Russell. Smith, Elder and Co. 5s. net.
A Nook in Galloway. By Thomas Newbigging. Illustrated. J. R. and A. Kirkpatrick. Gatehouse-of-Fleet, N.B. 2s. net.
Plutarch on the Face which appears on the Orb of the Moon. Translation and Notes, with Appendix, by A. O. Prickard, M.A. Warren and Son, Winchester. 2s. 6d. net.
A History of British Mammals. (Part VI.) By Gerald E. H. Barrett-Hamilton, B.A., F.Z.S. Illustrated by Edward A. Wilson, B.A. Gurney and Jackson. 2s. 6d. net.
Debrett's Coronation Guide. Illustrated. Dean and Son. 1s. net.
Cheapside to Arcady. By Arthur Scammell. Andrew Melrose. 5s. net.
A Few Acres and a Cottage. By F. E. Green. Illustrated. Andrew Melrose. 3s. 6d. net.
Stranger than Fiction, being Tales from the Byways of Ghosts and Folk-Lore. By Mary L. Lewes. Wm. Rider and Son. 3s. 6d. net.
Latent Impulse in History and Politics. By R. N. Bradley, B.A. Murray and Evenden. 7s. 6d. net.
Three Plays by Brieux, Member of the French Academy. With a Preface by Bernard Shaw. The English Versions by Mrs. Bernard Shaw, St. John Hankin, and John Pollock. Portrait Frontispiece. A. C. Fifield. 5s. net.

THEOLOGY

S. Paul in the Light of Modern Research. By the Rev. J. R. Cohu. Edward Arnold. 5s. net.
"Forms of Prayer," etc. (Coronation Service). Eyre and Spottiswoode. 6s. 6d. and 3s. 6d. per 100.
The Coronation Service. Eyre and Spottiswoode. Official Edition. 2s. net. Souvenir Edition No. 1, 1s. net; Souvenir Edition No. 2, 4d. net.
The Transfiguration, with other Sermons, and Short Addresses for Fast and Festival. By Edward Curling, M.A. John Ouseley. 3s. 6d. net.
The King's Printers' Souvenir Prayer and Hymn Book, with Portraits of their Majesties, and the Coronation Anthem composed by Sir Frederick Bridge. Eyre and Spottiswoode. 4s. 4d.
Three Hymns for the Coronation of Their Most Gracious Majesties. By the Rev. H. S. Stephenson, M.A. The Walter Scott Publishing Co. 1s. per 100.

PERIODICALS

La Revue; Revue Critique; The Bibelot; Top-Notch; Land Union Journal; Bookseller; Church Quarterly Review; Cambridge University Reporter; Mount Tom; Peru To-Day; Literary Digest; Empire Review; Popular Magazine; School World; People's Magazine; Oxford and Cambridge Review; Wednesday Review; Publishers' Circular; The Idler; Mercure de France; Revue Bleue; The Papyrus; Tourist Magazine.

JACQUES ROSENTHAL

(Antiquarian Bookseller to H.M. the Emperor and King)

MUNICH (Bavaria) 47 BRIENNERSTR. 47

SPECIALITIES.—Fine Illuminated and other Manuscripts. Incunabula. Illustrated Books of the XVth and the beginning of the XVIth Century. Early Prints.

Highest Prices given for First-class Illuminated Manuscripts and Early Printed Books.

Address exactly: Mr. JACQUES ROSENTHAL, 47 BRIENNERSTR. 47, MUNICH, BAVARIA.

Catalogues to be had on application.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC
OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND
. . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,
62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE
TO
SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.
WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.
Vid the SUEZ CANAL.
Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.
(Hamburg and Antwerp.)
Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.
For further information apply to:—
DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.
Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE
PLEASURE CRUISES
LIVERPOOL
to the
MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC
by the
"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"
. . . Ports of Call . . .
CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.
For full particulars apply—
THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

THE NORTH BRITISH ACADEMY OF ARTS

"Tolstoi Award."

The North British Academy of Arts recently offered a Prize of five guineas for the best Essay on the most practical scheme for eliminating class hatred, promoting the mutual respect of one class for another, impelling them to work together amongst themselves and federate as a whole. The closing date announced was the 29th ulto. The Academy now desires to extend the date to the 31st inst., in the hope that the additional time thus given may induce a larger number of competitors to enter.

All MSS. are to be addressed to Mr. W. J. MORGAN, Hon. Sec., North British Academy of Arts, Claremont Buildings, Newcastle-on-Tyne.

"THE BOOK MONTHLY."

The May "Book Monthly," which is now ready, Sixpence net, contains an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the well-known novelist. It also has various other articles of a literary interest, and all the news about the new books. Its illustrations are an engaging feature as usual, and, in fine, the May "Book Monthly" is worth getting. The publishers are Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send a specimen copy free on application.

P & O Passenger Services.
EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports
(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)
Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises Throughout the Year, according to Season.
AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.
Programme on Application.
For Passage, Freight and all information apply—
PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,
122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P. THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.
(Royal Charter dated 1839.)
Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—
ARGENTINA & BRAZIL
via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.
WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.
From LONDON to—
MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,
EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.
(By Shire Line.)
For further particulars apply to
THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY
18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by ODHAMS LTD., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

"THE ACADEMY," MAY 20, 1911

Special Empire Number

THE CARNEGIE LIBRARY,
THE PA. STATE COLLEGE,
STATE COLLEGE, PA.

THE ACADEMY

AND LITERATURE

No. 2037 [Registered as a Newspaper.] MAY 20, 1911 PRICE THREEPENCE

'SWIFT' Books that Compel

THE PARTY SYSTEM. By Hilaire Belloc and Cecil Chesterton. Cloth, 3s. 6d. net.
Every man and woman in England should read this searching indictment of Parliamentary shams. "Says in plain English what everybody in touch with reality thinks."—The Star.
Lord Hugh Cecil, in a recent debate in the House of Commons, said: "The very striking book called 'The Party System' . . . contained some great truths."
The Rt. Hon. A. J. Balfour, in the same debate, referred to this book as follows: "I read the first two pages of it, and it is that which has given me an appetite for reading the remainder."

PARISIAN PORTRAITS. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
This is an entirely new work by one of the most striking literary figures of our time. Mr. Grierson is at the present moment being hailed in America as a genius of extraordinary powers.

THE VALLEY OF SHADOWS. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 6s. net.
Vivid memories of Lincoln's country before the Civil War. "With a wonderful touch Mr. Grierson depicts scene after scene . . . with bold, impressive strokes."—Daily Telegraph.

MODERN MYSTICISM. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
Original, incisive, subtle, acute. MAURICE MAETERLINCK says:—". . . Full of thoughts of the very highest order."

THE CELTIC TEMPERAMENT. By Francis Grierson. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net.
The late Professor WILLIAM JAMES said:—"I find 'The Celtic Temperament' charming and full of wisdom." The Glasgow Herald says:—"A remarkable book by a remarkable man."

LONELY ENGLAND. By Maude Goldring. With Three Coloured Illustrations and several Pen and Ink Sketches by Agnes Pike. Cloth, 5s. net.
Suggests, with light and subtle power, that to-day, as ever, fairyland lurks in all the neglected countryside. Songs and verses are scattered about, and the wind of the heath blows through all the book.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF A DON. By G. F. Abbot. Cloth, 5s. net.
A highly diverting and thought-provoking presentment of two radically opposed intellectual forces at work in England to-day.

EIGHT CENTURIES OF PORTUGUESE MONARCHY. By Bragança Cunha. Demy 8vo., 15 Pencil Portraits, 15s. net.
This book reveals the series of causes, both political and social, which have brought Portugal to its present condition and affected the character of the people.

TRIUMPHANT VULGARITY. By Charles J. Whitby, M.D. 3s. 6d. net.
This book records a disillusioned impression of modernity. It is a rebuke to optimists and a warning to dreamers. The author exposes the morbidity of exaggerated sympathy, and adumbrates the formation of a new Secret Order for the promotion of ideal ends.

THE RECTOR OF ST. JACOBS. By Senex Rusticanus. 6s.
This is the first work of one who will shortly enter his eightieth year. But the book is not only a "prodigy of age," it is a searching study of thought, motive, and action, and the types of character so vividly depicted are in our midst to-day.

SOME NEIGHBOURS: Stories, Sketches, and Studies. By Charles Granville. 2nd Edition. 6s.
Mr. Granville writes with "sympathy and charm," and this, his latest book, is "full of clever characterisation" and that quality of humour "which perceives the sense of tears in human things." "His art is so sure that he puts a world of life and reality into a few pages."

THE MAIDS' COMEDY. A Chivalric Romance in Thirteen Chapters. 3s. 6d. net.

CIVIL WAR. A Play in Four Acts by Ashley Dukes. 2s. net.
This play is not in any sense imitative of Mr. Bernard Shaw. It is at once effective and original. The portrait of life in a colony of revolutionists alone should make it something of a dramatic curiosity.

SIR EDWARD. By a Fellow of the Literary Society. Cloth, 1s. net.
An Æsopian biography. . . . An irresistible satire on the drifting ideas and false ideals of a muddled civilisation . . . exquisitely humorous.

Send for complete Prospectus of "Books that Compel."

LONDON: STEPHEN SWIFT
10 John Street, Adelphi

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Free Insurance Coupon to readers of "The Academy."
(Not to be detached.)

The Gresham Fire and Accident Insurance Society, Limited,
of
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY, LONDON, E.C.,
will pay
£100 (One hundred pounds) to the legal personal representative of the bonâ fide holder of this Coupon, if he or she be killed solely and directly by an accident within the United Kingdom to any Railway Company's Train, a Tramcar, Omnibus, Cab, or other Licensed Vehicle plying for public hire, in which the holder is travelling as an ordinary ticket-bearing or fare-paying passenger, subject always to the following special conditions which are to be taken as incorporated in the contract:—

(a) That death result within thirty days after the accident (b) that notice thereof be given within seven days to the Society at its Head Office in London (c) that such reasonable evidence of the cause of death be given as the Society may require (d) that the holder shall have written in ink prior to the accident his or her usual signature in the space provided therefor (e) that the Society shall not be liable to any one person in respect of more than one Coupon in this or any other publication (f) that this insurance shall not be available to persons under twelve or over seventy years of age, and shall hold good for seven days from 12 o'clock noon of the day of issue.

Signature of Holder .....

Address .....

CONSULT

The Gresham

On all Matters of

LIFE, FIRE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE.

Many Special Features.

Write for Prospectus; it will pay you.

Liberal Terms to recognised Brokers and Agents.

HEAD OFFICES:
ST. MILDRED'S HOUSE, POULTRY,
LONDON, E.C.
JAMES H. SCOTT, General Manager.

MUDIE'S SELECT LIBRARY, LTD.,
30-34, New Oxford Street, LONDON, W.C.

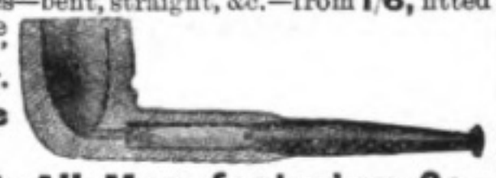
The Pioneer of Circulating Libraries, and the largest and best-equipped Library in the United Kingdom. More than a Million Books circulated in 14 Languages.

Subscriptions from 10s. 6d. per annum.

Country Subscribers supplied by rail or post.

Prospectus, with full terms, sent on application.

Books, in every language, offered in good Second-hand condition. Rare and out-of-print works readily procured.



THE SORB-ALL FRENCH BRIAR PIPE

Recommended by the medical faculty, is offered direct to the public for the first time. The SORB-ALL plug is the most absorbent on the market.

COOLEST, SWEETEST, AND DRIEST.

The SORB ALL can be smoked without a particle of nicotine or juice entering the mouth. Sold in various shapes—bent, straight, &c.—from 1/6, fitted with the "SORBALL" hygienic plug.

Note the Plug.

The Sorb-All Manufacturing Co.,
88, Chancery Lane, London, E.C.

WESTMINSTER SCHOOL.—An Examination will be held on June 28, 29, and 30, to fill up not less than Six Residential and Four Non-residential Scholarships, and also some Exhibitions.—For particulars apply by letter to the Bursar, Little Dean's Yard, London, S.W.

YOUNG AUTHORS.—Success in journalism. Full criticism and advice for publication given by literary and journalistic experts. Full particulars, write J. Murray, Leylands, Wells, Norfolk.

ANNUAL CATALOGUE, 1911.

GLAISHER'S NEW ANNUAL CATALOGUE OF PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS

is now ready, and will be sent on application.
Comprises a great variety of books in all departments of literature at special BARGAIN PRICES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER, Ltd.,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.
Librarians should apply for this useful Catalogue.

To INVENTORS.

Recognising the many difficulties experienced by the Inventor unaided in applying for a Patent, and in rendering the same subsequently a commercial success, this Bureau has been established for the purpose of affording information and providing assistance to Inventors upon especially moderate terms, not only with regard to the filing of the Patent Applications (British and Foreign), but also with respect to introducing inventions into likely channels to effect a profitable working of the same, or a successful sale of the Patent rights.

Inventors transacting their business through this office obtain the following (amongst other) advantages:—

1. Information upon all matters pertaining to the patenting and development of their ideas free.
2. Free entry upon Sales Register.
3. Negotiations for the Sale or Licensing of Patents upon an agreed commission only.
4. Specially reduced charges for British and Foreign Patent Applications.

THE INVENTOR'S INFORMATION BUREAU,
100, FETTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.

As you write use the best Ink. The best is AZURYTE. Order it at your Stationer's.
F. MORDAN & CO., 326, CITY ROAD, LONDON, E.C

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. accurately and promptly typewritten, 10d. per 1,000 words.—The Literary Typewriting Bureau, Dept. A, Laindon Hills, Romford.

TYPEWRITING promptly and accurately done. 10d. per 1,000 words. Specimens and references.—Address Miss MESSER, The Orchard, Cotterill Road, Surbiton, S.W.

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS. neatly and quickly typed. 8d. per 1,000 words. Actors' Parts and Songs at moderate charges.—Box 209, "Academy," 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields.

BOOKS.—Folkard's Sailing Boat, 31s. 6d., for 7s. 6d.; Wright's Life of Pater, 2 vols., 24s., for 10s. 6d.; Goethe's Faust, large paper, illus. by Pogány, 42s., for 21s.; Nettlefold's Practical Housing, 1s.; Max Beerbohm's Caricatures, 21s., for 10s. 6d.; Geo. Eliot's Works, 21 vols., 52s. 6d., for 35s.; Symonds' Days Spent on a Doge's Farm, 10s. 6d., for 5s.; Letters of Queen Victoria, 3 vols., £3 3s., for 25s.; Aubrey Beardsley's Early and Later Works, 2 vols., net £5 5s.; Oscar Wilde's Salome, illus. by Beardsley, 25s. If you can't spare the cash, send me your old books and I'll exchange with you; also send for Catalogue. I have always 100,000 Bargains on hand. If you want a book and have failed to find it elsewhere, try me. I am the most expert Book-finder extant.—BAKER'S GREAT BOOK-SHOP, JOHN BRIGHT STREET, BIRMINGHAM.

EDWARD WHISTLER,
11, Strand, Charing Cross, London.
DIAMOND MERCHANT, JEWELLER, and SILVERSMITH.

A large stock of New and Second-hand Diamond and Gem Jewellery, Antique and Modern Silver Plate, always on hand, at bargain prices, for cash.

Fine Pearls, Emeralds, Diamonds, and early specimens of Antique Silver Plate wanted. High Prices given in Cash. Full Value allowed in Exchange.

Valuations made for Probate and other purposes.

GUN DEPARTMENT.

HAMMERLESS SECOND-HAND GUNS,
British Made, from £6 10s.
Nitro Proof. The Cheapest Gun in the Market combined with Quality.

Also HAMMERLESS EJECTORS,
By Best London Makers, at Greatly Reduced Prices.

CORDITE RIFLES, ·400, ·500, ·600 Bores.

Catalogue and Price List on Application Gratis.
Telephone No.: 2033 GERRARD.

GEORGE ODELL,
31, KING STREET, ST. JAMES', LONDON, S.W.

OPHTHALMIC AND MATHEMATICAL OPTICIAN
Inventor of the Porter-Odell Patent Lens.

SPECTACLES AND EYEGLASSES
made to the individual facial measurements, thereby assuring accuracy and comfort. To enable the fitting of the innumerable variety of faces my different patterns have already run into the hundreds.

LORGNETTES in Gold, Metal and Tortoiseshell.
BAROMETERS. THERMOMETERS.
FIELD AND OPERA GLASSES.

THE ODELL LUMEX PRISM BINOCULAR
pronounced by Naval and Military Officers to be the best (see testimonials).

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

CONTENTS

	Page
Review of the Week	603
A Seventh Birthday	604
The Nation as Arbiter	604
Empire Day and Empire Difficulties	605
The Anglo-Saxon Peace	606
Reviews:—
The Land of Promise	608
The Black Art	609
Our Lady of the Snows	610
Shorter Reviews	610
Fiction	612
Balzac	613
The Theatre	615
Art	617
Imperial Domesticity	617
The Continental Rôle	619
Canada and Canadian Banking	620
India, in the British Empire	622
Thackeray as Artist	623
Racial Questions: The Colonies' Last Word	624
The Empire Movement	625
Foreign Affairs	626
Some Characteristics of Modern Irish Poetry—II.	627
Colonial Investments	628
In the Temple of Mammon	630
Correspondence	632
Books Received	634
Empire Supplement
John Bull's Lethargy	1
The Festival of Empire	2
Australasian Literature	3
South Africa	5
The Boiling Lake in Dominica	5
The Foreign Policy and Higher Defence of the Empire	6
Verse — Britannia; England; Scotland; Ireland	8

Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail Matter. Transmissible to Canada at the Canadian Magazine rate of Postage Subscriptions: Inland 15s.; Foreign 17s. 6d. a year, post free.

All communications intended for the Editor should be sent to 63, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C.

THE ACADEMY is published by MESSRS. ODHAMS, LIMITED 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C., to whom all letters with reference to publication must be addressed.

Applications referring to Advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, 27, Chancery Lane.

The Editor cannot undertake to return unsolicited Manuscripts which are not accompanied by a stamped addressed envelope. The receipt of a proof does not imply the acceptance of an article.

THE ACADEMY is now obtainable at Messrs. W. H. Smith & Sons, Messrs. Wyman's, and Messrs. Willing's bookstalls and shops.

REVIEW OF THE WEEK

THE Odes of Empire which appear in the pages of this number are by Sir Charles Walpole, whom many remember as the poet of his Etonian days.

We are glad to observe that the income-tax payer has another champion besides ourselves. His patience under any burden which his tormentors, philanthropists to the core—at his expense—choose to place on him, led us to make a quotation lately, and it was this:—"An ass endures his burden, but not more than his burden." The super-ass will, we added, apparently endure any addition to his load. How about State Insurance? This is what the Bystander hazards:—

> What about the income-tax payer? The man on whom the Government depends for its twopences a week is excluded from any chance to benefit himself by the scheme, which is confined to those who contribute nothing to the upkeep of the State. That is a question that is going one of these days to be asked. The success of the Suffragettes in forcing their Bill on Parliament suggests imitation on the part of income-tax payers. They pay the piper, and will refuse to be permanently prevented from calling the tune.

Quite good, so far as it goes, but the writer does not bring out that the Income-tax payer is a man of many rôles, and at present the Government take good care to take toll of him in all of them. For instance, under the Insurance scheme the Income-tax payer in his capacity of employer will be relieved of threepence weekly for each employee in addition to his share—the lion's share—of the contribution by the State. Under the People's Budget the same bodies or men pay tax over and over again. Although ranged under different headings, these taxes are all income-taxes, because they are taxes on resources, on enterprise, and success. The scheme which any Government would adopt if it wished to institute a logical and fair system, would be to co-ordinate the contributions made under various headings to the State by each body or individual and measure the taxable capacity of such body or person by reference to his total contribution to State revenue. It is obvious that the haphazard method of philanthropy by indiscriminately piling up taxes upon the same person without reference to his taxable capacity must eventuate in paralysing industry and sapping the taxable reserves of the country.

The rousing welcome given by the people of London to the German Emperor on Tuesday last is a gratifying proof of the progress towards that unity of interest and cordial friendship between the two great nations which of late years has been on the increase. Many times in these columns we have deprecated the possibility of bad blood between two countries who mutually respect and admire each other's literature, institutions, abilities, and achievements in the fields of science and research, and the acclamations which greeted the Kaiser, the Kaiserin, and their daughter indicate the existence of a much more sane mood on the part of the Press and the people than was to be found a few years ago. For the populace takes its tone from the Press, too easily, and one injudicious alarmist let loose with a fountain-pen can do more damage in an hour to the cause of peace and amity than half a dozen thoughtful writers can retrieve in a whole week. Thus, however little political significance may be attached to a season of fraternising such as the present, the Vossische Zeitung is perfectly correct when it observes that "the German nation feels the attentions shown to the Emperor, Empress, and their daughter on the free soil of England as a friendly act performed towards itself."

In the stately memorial to Queen Victoria, at the unveiling of which the Emperor was the welcome guest, we have perhaps the most beautiful public monument that London has seen for many years. The days of the stiff, unimpressive, unpoetic statue are surely past, never to return, and although the face of Queen Victoria looks somewhat sternly set, the graceful conception of the whole figure, supported as it is by artistic curves and majestic masses of marble, and softened subtly by the presence of running water, must be very highly praised. The knighthood of Mr. Thomas Brock, R.A., the sculptor, is a proof of the King's appreciation of his noble effort. Buckingham Palace, frowning grimly, makes from some points of view a most striking and suitable background for the pure whiteness of the new memorial; but perhaps the best approach of all is from Piccadilly down the main avenue of the Green Park. From this position the beauty of the idea which the sculptor has so finely carried out becomes gradually and effectively manifest.

Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, who is visiting England at the present season, was the guest of honour at a luncheon given by Messrs. Gay and Hancock last week in the Connaught Rooms. Representatives of the leading journals and reviews attended, and several well-known people of the literary and publishing worlds—which do not always, we imagine, touch so closely—were present at the very pleasant gathering.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

A SEVENTH BIRTHDAY

My girlie, gleaming milestones seven
Now part you from the gate of heaven,
  A gate not closed, but lighting yet
  The pathway where your foot is set;
And backward as the past years run,
Though dim that light, the earth's own sun
  Shall then your firmer footsteps greet
  And wake God's flowers about your feet.
Girlie, though downward swoop the days
That steal your well-loved infant ways,
  Not without purpose is their part
  To twine you closer round my heart.
Sweet prattler, with your fairy talk
Enlivening every country walk,
  Fair half-unfolded mind that shows
  Rich glimpses of the full-formed rose,
Perfumed with breath of dayspring new,
And glistening yet with morning dew,
  Live to rejoice full many a heart
  When wide in bloom the petals part;
Give freely, stint not neither strain
Love which no measure may contain,
  Love that the world's weight lifts and leavens,
  Knowing no bound of seventy sevens,
  But limitless as yon blue heavens.

GUY KENDALL

THE NATION AS ARBITER

So the promises made at the General Election solely out of natural love and affection are to be redeemed. How stand to-day the Radical-Socialist gladiators who during the Election

"Walked backward with averted gaze"

when their leaders uttered no obscure pronouncements as to what the future would hold in store for their supporters? Virtue, if not affronted, was at least coy. The Master of Elibank could, we think, "unfold a tale," or at least disclose a list, which would make excellent reading. The self-denying 500 must, however, be experiencing a certain amount of discomfort just now. What if the members of the House of Lords are to be unsalaried? Perish the thought! If a mere member of the House of Commons is to receive a quantum meruit, on what scale of remuneration can a Peer of Parliament be expected to support his dignity and to adhere to his political persuasion?

This is a trifling matter which appears to have escaped Lord Lansdowne and Lord Curzon. The new elements in their Utopian House of Lords must positively receive wages. Lazarus can scarcely share the red benches with Dives. "Who goes home?" Dives to Belgrave Square; Lazarus to the Embankment?

Of course we are aware that in the ideal Socialist State every one will be paid by the State. The State is the taxpayer; the taxpayer is he who has something to pay. Therefore, Dives must in those halcyon days pay the wages of Lazarus.

There is another difficulty in arriving at a quantum meruit for Lazarus. Under the Commons' Charter the Parliamentary Bill—there is very little that is useful left for the Lords to do. But for schemes of reform introducing unpicturesque ingredients, they might have continued in a condition of suspended animation, not to be touched, and only to be viewed from a respectful distance. They might have remained in dignified and splendid isolation. That refuge is, however, to be denied to them because the horny-handed sons of toil, professors of various esoteric forms of worship, Lord Mayors, Chairmen of various vestral bodies, and odds-and-ends out of the highways and byways are to be added to them—all prepared, with much compunction, to accept handsome salaries.

We now know that the hire of the labourer in the arid vineyard of the House of Commons is to be one pound six and eightpence per working day, without pensions or travelling expenses. How much per hour for an all-night sitting of twenty hours? Hardly a living wage, we think and most abominable sweating.

On these lines, on what scale can you estimate the value of the titled pedagogues and others who will enjoy leisured idleness in a temple of luxury and ease? Their main function apparently will be to register the decisions of the Lower House, composed of much the same elements as themselves, but bereft of their splendour, enjoying a wage and working hours which would throw any decent Union into paroxysms of fury and bad grammar. But the office of registering other people's decisions is clerk's work. Will clerk's pay be the quantum meruit of the brand-new brand of Lord of Parliament? If that is so, will not the office go begging? There will be none so poor as to do it reverence. The net result will be that you will have created a position for which no one is a competitor. A poor result after the expenditure of much labour, many words, and some excursions into the language of the Eastern districts of London.

The bi-cameral system will die of inanition, because a succession of specialists have overdosed the Upper Chamber with patent foods, instead of diagnosing the requirement of the patient as the necessity of abstaining from nostrums of all kinds and calmly pursuing the even tenour of its way.

We are very doubtful whether the House of Commons or House of Lords have any authority to introduce grave constitutional changes without a Referendum, which would include qualified women. The stability, the progress, the religion of the nation may well be at stake when revolutionary measures are proposed, and are, for various reasons and in various interests, allowed to masquerade as the decision of the nation. The Parliament Bill is nothing of the kind. It is simply a violent measure deriving such sanction as it has from a polluted source—a temporary coalition of log-rollers. The House of Lords' Reform Bill is an attempt to change the Constitution of the country at a moment's notice at the instance of unreasoning panic. The pigeon-holes of various persons who in former years, in search of advertisement, fathered schemes which attracted no attention have been ransacked, and an accomplished snipper has culled a bit here and a piece there and stuck the result together. From more or less cohesive plans, none of which were wanted and which died stillborn, a patchwork and a medley scheme has been produced, and is forthwith labelled a great constructive measure.

We claim that a wider audience, a more untrammelled

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

and less impressionable tribunal should appraise the merits of the rival twins—the Parliament Bill and the Lansdowne experiment.

CECIL COWPER.

EMPIRE DAY AND EMPIRE DIFFICULTIES

BY EARL WINTERTON

No one who takes up his pen to write about the consolidation of the Empire can fail to realise the enormous amount of ink that has already been expended upon this subject; nor can he, I think, help being depressed by the fact that so much has been written and said, so little actually done: for we stand to-day almost where we stood five years ago, so far as reaching a solution of the difficulties of closer practical unity is concerned, while all the time the things that may make for, and, if not dealt with, will make for, gradual disunion have been growing apace; everything is changing in the Empire, except the indomitable irresponsibility of the average man at home.

The apathy of the heart of the Empire upon this subject is really amazing. While there is scarcely a responsible politician or a thinking man who denies the value of the Empire to those who live in it, and while there is no man who can read who does not know that history shows the permanent unity of widely scattered territory, however closely akin in sentiment and sympathy, to be the most difficult of human achievements, not one man in ten gives serious or continuous attention to the vital question of how to retain and consolidate the British Empire. Making due allowance for the limitations upon his vision and capacity to grapple with this vast problem which environment imposes upon the average elector at home, a great deal of this apathy is due to a totally wrong conception of the growth and present status of the Dominions.

The most injurious fallacy, for instance, exists in the minds of many people in thinking that the British Empire has rounded that dangerous turning-point in the history of Empires where the daughter States, having attained their full womanhood and feeling strong enough to stand alone, choose to sever themselves from the family and set up house on their own accord. It is assumed that this particular period of growth has been long left behind by the British Empire, and that the daughter States have broken all precedents of former Empires and elected to remain within the fold. That is a most deplorable half-truth. We are only now at the commencement of that period.

Let us consider the facts. What was the position of Canada twenty or even fifteen years ago before the boom came? She had a very small population of slow growth, with a mighty nation to the south of her which was taking from her many of the best of her sons, and at the same time adopting towards her a half-contemptuous attitude, intermixed with threats of ultimate annexation. To-day, now that Canada is a great, growing, progressive Community, a true nation within an Empire, no one can force her to do what she does not want. Twenty years ago, though her dislike of annexation was even more deep-rooted than it is to-day, her position was far less secure, and the Imperial connection was vital if she was to retain her independence, which, paradoxically enough (and of that I shall have something to say later), she could obtain inside the Empire, but was in danger of losing if she severed her connection with the Mother Country. Much the same is true of Australia and New Zealand. A few years ago those two Dominions, with but a very small part of their territories developed, on adequate means of defence, and an almost stationary population, had perforce to rely on the British Navy to protect them against the dark shadow from the North, the menace of the yellow races. But with a closer settlement, a quite respectable immigration, universal military training, and the formation of a Navy, that menace is far smaller to-day, and must eventually disappear, since, whatever Japan or China's feelings may be towards the two dominions, no nation can, in these days, effectually conquer another nation, however much smaller its population, where every man is able to use a rifle.

In South Africa the case is even more obvious. Until the South African union, it would have been madness for the English Colonies to have cut the strings. Since the union the position is wholly altered.

I do not wish it to be supposed for a moment that I suggest or even hint at the near possibility of either of the four dominions leaving the Empire. I wish merely to justify two contentions that I have already laid down, to the effect that material circumstances making for disunion are far greater than they were half a generation ago, and that the period of real danger, that period which has proved so fatal in the case of former Empires, is only just being reached. As against the tendency of natural evolution towards disunion we have, of course, one great advantage to set off—the surprising progressive growth of Imperialist sentiment within the Empire. I do not deny its force, especially when based largely upon loyalty to a common Throne, near kinship, and belief in common principles, but I do assert that sentiment of itself is too slender a band to rely on where the relations of nations—and it is with nations that we are dealing—are concerned. The history and the map of Europe are both powerful witnesses to this fact.

Sentiment, to my mind, is the most valuable binding material superimposed upon a solid foundation of close trade relations, a common foreign policy, and a mutual scheme of defence in which the burdens shall be equally divided according to the capacity of each State.

On the first, and, as I believe, the most important, I have little to say, since I have endeavoured, so far as possible, to write this paper from a non-party standpoint. I will only say that Mr. Chamberlain's Preference Policy remains the first great constructive policy of Empire consolidation, and that its adherents will never abandon it, except for a better, which is hardly likely to be forthcoming, since eight years have not produced a rival to Preference. On the second question, its pressing need must be obvious to every one who has given a moment's heed to Imperial questions. Asiatic immigration, the Japanese Treaty, the disposition of the Fleet in the Pacific, are all of them questions upon which a grave divergence of interests between the different States of the Empire now exists, a divergence which at any time might cause serious friction. How a common policy can best be reached I do not presume to suggest. An advisory Imperial Council on Foreign Affairs, with a representative from each State, whose proceedings shall be absolutely private, is one solution. The question can certainly not be solved by the present system, nor—if I may say so without unkindness—while the Foreign Minister of this country is a man like Sir Edward Grey, who has travelled but slightly, and can hardly speak a word of any foreign language.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

In the case of mutual defences we see a deplorable lack of advance. Much has been written and said, especially by the present War Minister, but little solid achievement attained. The hour calls for a British Minister with the courage to face the situation, who will put to the Imperial representatives who are now assembling the case for a real and water-tight scheme of Imperial defence, with an equal distribution of burdens. The chance of anything being done is unfortunately remote.

I have ventured to sketch out in this little paper what I conceive to be the vital dangers and vital needs of the Empire. That the Empire can be made as nearly permanent as anything in this world is permanent I have little doubt, but that it will remain a vital force, useful to all its States and their inhabitants, for even twenty years longer in its present loose connection I have grave doubts. And of this I am certain, that unreasoning belief in the theory that we can afford to neglect every lesson of history because Providence has a special interest in our Empire is by far the gravest danger we have.

THE ANGLO-SAXON PEACE

By E. Ashmead-Bartlett

There exists in the minds of a great number of usually well-informed people a belief that there is little goodwill in the United States towards the British Empire. The idea is prevalent that the Americans regard us as their most active competitors in the world's markets, and therefore our interests are inimical; that they dislike our manners, and, above all, resent our holding such an enormous stretch of land on their northern frontier, which geographically should form part of their own country. But those who have spent any length of time in the United States quickly discover how groundless these fears are, and how little foundation for them really exists. For more than a century there was little love lost between England and America, but in the last ten years a complete change has come over our relations. The Venezuelan incident was the high-water mark of Anglo-American illwill, and since then the tide of bitterness, misunderstanding, and jealousy has ebbed so steadily that the sands of friendship and prolonged peace are never likely to be submerged. The great American public has certain peculiarities which are not always understood or appreciated by the Englishman.

Twisting the lion's tail is still a favourite pastime. They love to make fun of the Englishman, more especially of a certain type of Englishman who travels in that peculiar, semi-exclusive, semi-aggressive manner which has made him a byword the world over. In New York no comic play is complete without a travelling Englishman or a stagey Peer, and this winter there were half-a-dozen plays, each containing an Englishman cast in stereotyped lines whose eccentricities never failed to bring down the house. Then the American nature is peculiarly sensitive to criticism. They all want to know, but hate to hear, what Europe is thinking of them, and a feeling seems to exist amongst a great many of them that the average Englishman considers himself a superior being whose sole desire is to criticise their national peculiarities.

Without a doubt there are vast differences in the manners, lives, ideals, and temperament of the average Englishman and American. In spite of the fact that both speak the same language and both live under the same laws, an Englishman feels himself far more at home in many Continental countries than he does in the United States; and the same is true of the American, the vast majority of whom much prefer to spend their time on the Continent than in England. They complain, justly, of the aloofness of the Englishmen, how difficult they are to know, how lacking in outward cordiality. What causes this vast difference in the deportment of two races speaking a common language and largely descended from the same stock? It is not altogether easy to explain, but perhaps the opening word of Lincoln's Gettysburg address makes clear the secret, "Four-score years ago," it runs, "your ancestors founded on this soil a Republic based on the proposition that all men are equal." Personal equality in all things except those that appertain to finance, is the keystone of the American character. Every child is brought up in this flattering illusion that all men are born equal. Therefore there exists none of those class distinctions, none of that love of tradition and respect for ancient things, and none of that innate sense of obedience and respect for superior authority which is so deeply ingrained in the average Englishman's character. Now it would be a hopeless task to educate the English people in the belief that all men are born equal. Those who would be the chief gainers by the universal admittance of this untruthful axiom would be the first to repudiate the honour it was proposed to confer on them. The old family retainers would have nothing to do with it; humble villagers would be horrified were they to be suddenly informed that the inmates of the castle were on an absolute equality with themselves. They would not feel at all elevated by this comforting assurance; they would merely be embarrassed. It is a notorious fact that in the Army the private soldier much prefers an officer who belongs to the upper classes to one who has risen from the ranks, and the fact that year after year the most coveted reward of the successful man of all shades of political opinion is to be made a peer, even when that body is threatened with the loss of its political privileges, proves how vigorously we still cling to our old beliefs.

In the Southern States the Englishman finds himself far more at home and far better understood than in the North or West. The Southerns are of almost pure English lineage of our finest stock, and they possess in a marked manner the peculiarities and ideals of Englishmen. The American Civil War was the outcome of this divergency of feeling between the English old feudal ideal and those which have sprung from the doctrine that all men are born equal. The Southern States fought in the Civil War for those political principles and their resulting personal characteristics which make the Englishman misunderstood in the States to-day. It was the Civil War which rendered a war between ourselves and the United States unnecessary, because after it was over the two schools of thought commenced to look for a modus vivendi and to meet each other half way.

But during the last ten years there has been a tremendous informal rapprochement between England and America, and although twisting the lion's tail may still enjoy a certain popularity, it is only indulged in as a harmless pastime, and the mass of Americans regard England in a most friendly manner. The initial step towards a better understanding was the work of King Edward VII., who in America, as everywhere else, enjoyed enormous personal popularity. His well-known partiality towards Americans, the unique position many of them acquired as his most intimate friends, did more towards sealing the bonds of lasting amity than any official rapprochement between the two

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

Governments could possibly have done. Of all the qualities required in a modern monarch the most valuable is to be a thorough man of the world. King Edward possessed this attribute to an eminently marked degree. He understood and appreciated the point of view of almost all the European nations. Thus wherever he went he adapted himself to his surroundings. When he left England he left behind him all except her best interests, entered freely into the life of the country he was visiting, and made the foreigner believe that our insular prejudice had vanished, and that the Englishman's proclivities and sympathies were almost identical with his own. No nation appreciated this salient characteristic of our late monarch more than America. Then, again, our financial interests have become so indissolubly bound together as to render any separation of them in the future nothing less than a financial disaster to both nations. The bonds of friendship have been further cemented by the numerous Anglo-American marriages which have taken place of recent years.

Thus the idea of a war between England and the United States can be entirely eliminated. It is outside the bounds of probability, and would throw back the ideal of world-wide Anglo-Saxon peace, which is growing stronger year by year, indefinitely. But it may be argued that there are active signs which point to a more speedy understanding between Canada and the United States rather than between the United States and England which may lead to ill-feeling. The recent Reciprocity Treaty has aroused the greatest alarm in many circles of political and economic thought. But if we examine impartially this tendency between the United States and Canada and place on one side party prejudices, which so often affect our maturer judgment, there remains little cause for alarm—rather there should be extreme satisfaction. It is not as if Canada had refused closer commercial relations with this country, and had deliberately thrown in her lot with a foreign Power; it is England which, up to the present, has refused closer commercial relations with Canada. The old danger which has been pointed out on tens of thousands of Tariff Reform platforms during the last eight years has at length assumed definite form, and one of our great dependencies, despairing of entering into closer fiscal relations with the Mother-country, has gone her own way, and has fallen back on her natural geographical partner for an exchange of those commercial concessions essential to the prosperity of both. At first sight this is an alarming sign of the times. It is the first great example of the change which is gradually creeping over world politics, when two business nations place their commercial relations above purely sentimental ties of blood and flag. But need we be alarmed? Are not our fears due mainly to a hazy appreciation of what this Reciprocity movement really means? Many fear that it is the first step towards the gradual disintegration of the British Empire; but is it not rather the first step towards a world-wide Anglo-Saxon rapprochement? At the time, when the Reciprocity agreement was first broached we heard wild outcries against annexation on this side, and discussions on its future possibilities in America. But in every country are to be found alarmists, who love to fish in troubled waters. President Taft was the first to repudiate any idea of annexation. He knew well, apart from all other considerations, that any such wild talk would jeopardise the project in the Canadian Parliament, because if a certain section of the community live in constant dread of annexation over here, there is still a larger section of the people of Canada who dislike the idea still more.

Indeed, the outlook for a union of all branches of the Anglo-Saxon race was never brighter than at the present time. Tariff Reform will seal the bonds between ourselves and our Colonies and between ourselves and the United States. American business men are amazed at the callousness with which we regard our commercial interests. We are looked upon as good-natured commercial philanthropists who are rapidly drifting towards bankruptcy. The American nation is not going to be annoyed at our placing a tariff on its goods and negotiating with it for an entry on better terms into their markets—it is going to admire us for it, and grasp us warmly by the hand as men who have learnt a little of that commercial acumen which its business men possess in such an eminently marked degree themselves. Certain politicians on this side would have us believe that no close union with the United States is possible until we have settled the eternal Irish question, and that the Irish element in America is inimical to our interests. But this is far from the truth. The Irish in New York are a comparatively small and unimportant element in the population, and they look upon Home Rule with very mixed feelings. When stirred up to a certain pitch of excitement on St. Patrick's Day they will sing the usual Irish melodies and indulge in the usual patriotic parades, but on normal occasions they feel no animosity towards the British Empire.

To all except incurable pessimists the outlook for peace was never brighter than it is to-day. Our interests and those of the United States do not clash anywhere; our language is the same, our literature is a common heritage, our laws spring from the same source, and, as a bright American lawyer once remarked, the only articles admitted free of duty into the United States are the decisions of the English judges. If the British Empire and the United States pool their interests, overlook each other's pecularities, and unite in mutual support the peace of the world is assured. There is no combination of the nations which could resist us. The absurd racial jealousies and divergent interests which continually threaten the peace of Europe are laughed at in America. In the United States you have a community almost all of whom have descended from those who have left Europe because they were discontented with their lack of opportunity in the Old World. They went to America to "make good," to use an expressive phrase, and there is no prouder day in an American's life than when he returns to the scenes of his childhood with enough money to buy up the whole community of which he was once a member. In spite of its splendid history and glorious traditions, the American Army is probably the only Army which does not confer certain social distinctions on its members. The military profession is looked down upon in times of peace by the mass of the population, although its pay and advantages are far higher in the United States than in any other country. When you have a Republic based on the proposition that all men are equal, where there are no class prejudices, where there is no Court, no nobility and other artificial honours, the only way in which the ambitious citizen can upset the illusion that all men are equal is by superior material prosperity to his neighbour. Thus it is the ambition of every good American to learn Mr. Lincoln's Gettysburg speech by heart as a child, and then to upset its doctrines by quickly proving himself to have greater commercial acumen than his neighbour. Wealth alone confers class distinction in the United States. Thus war, which upsets the commercial equilibrium of a nation, is peculiarly repugnant to the ambitious American. War and aggression will not pay for his trips to the land of his or of his ancestors' birth; war will not build him castles and bejewelled yachts. It is in peace alone that he can prove his superiority, and when he enters into relations with Canada for the advancement of their common interests, the American does not regard it as the first step in a vital blow at the British Empire, but rather as an invitation to the whole Anglo-Saxon world to come into his commercial fold and worship at the shrine of the God of Wealth.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

REVIEWS

THE LAND OF PROMISE

Yesterday and To-day in Canada. By the Duke of Argyll. (George Allen and Sons. 6s. net.)

Certainly Canada is the land of promise. How far it is also a land of fulfilment is a question that is exercising considerable perplexity in many minds to-day. There is a continual stream of emigration from England to the Land of the Maple-leaf, not only of men who have failed in this country, but also of men who have been successful here, who consider that the field presented to them is not sufficiently wide for their powers. Such men leave these shores, and no more is heard of them. Hitherto there has been no guide to counsel or advise them save the emigration-agents, who are interested in swelling the outgoing stream of humanity. It has been as though an outer darkness has sucked up all emigrants, leaving their fellows with no facts culled from vital experience on which to proceed. Lately, however, a persistent voice has begun to return, and it has taken the form of dissatisfaction and complaint. We have heard that the "Britisher" has been looked at askance, while the American has been hailed over the border as a brother and an ally. Much of this has been readily intelligible, for the farming element at present left in England is not large in proportion to the bulk of the population. Moreover, however many there be, the body of emigrants has not largely been recruited from their number. There is not much occasion for a fearless pioneer spirit on an average English farm, whereas Canada not only wants farmers, but farmer-pioneers. We are laying more and more stress here on brain, while Canada is laying stress on muscle and bodily vigour. It is difficult to resist the temptation of indulging in a discussion of the purpose and chief glory of man on this earth; but, leaving this relentlessly on one side, the ungarnished fact is that Englishmen are looked at in Canada with the same humorous, and even cold, contempt that a bucolic might meet with in Mincing-lane. They are both out of their element. Furthermore, they are in the way; their ignorance is not only ignorance, it is incapacity, and consequently a waste of hard-pressed energy. On the other hand, the American in Minnesota and North Dakota is engaged in precisely the same manner of life as the Canadian in Manitoba and Ontario. All the east to west development cannot frustrate the immediacy of this. The fact that this incongruity is now asserting itself to the detriment of the British emigrant is, from the English standpoint, the acutest of all matters in questions Canadian.

Realising the importance of this from a somewhat close examination of the question, we were rather disappointed to discover that the Duke of Argyll rather avoided the subject. In his introductory chapters, where he deals in detail with all the various provinces from Nova Scotia to British Columbia, he goes fully into the question of farming prospects. But there seldom seems any realisation of the potential fact that the American farmer is not only just over the way, but that he is continually passing the border. He does, indeed, quote Sir William Van Horne's opinion on the question of a reciprocity agreement between Canada and the United States, which reads rather strangely in parts in view of the present Agreement awaiting ratification in each country. He quotes him, too, as saying:—

> As to encouragement of British emigrants, it is perhaps only necessary that they should know that, if they are able and willing to work with their hands, they can get on well in Canada, and soon become independent. The right kind will easily find their way out. It is easy to get there; but those who are unaccustomed to work, or who do not know how to do something in particular, might have a hard time of it, and had better not go.

Apart from the fact that this seems to set a light regard on some of the difficulties which attend the proposing emigrant, it neglects altogether the deeper matter, that there seems to be, according to reports from most reliable quarters, a prejudice against the "Britisher" and a tendency to favour the American. Such reports are slowly spreading; and they can be trusted to stem the tide of emigration more effectually than most things. It is very admirable to examine and commend the findings of the various Colonial Conferences, as the Duke of Argyll does; but these prejudices are more urgent than Colonial Conferences because they are mightier. Colonial Conferences can but settle the politics affecting the great confederation of sister-States that we call the British Empire; but these things rule the underlying characteristics of their mutual relations. It is much like speaking of the paper alliance at present ruling between Austria and Italy, when it is patent that the tempers of the peoples of the two countries are in such a condition that the alliance, in case of need, is scarcely worth the paper upon which it is printed. Policies may mean much or little, but the tempers of the peoples will rule policies in the end.

Naturally the truth regarding such matters is hard to discover, and especially so for one occupying so lofty a station as the Duke of Argyll. The very dignity of his rank precludes him from learning of the irritations that befall the humble emigrant. He can but deal with what one may call effects: with Statistics, with Treaties and Agreements, with Histories and Conferences, and with Railways. The causes for these effects, however, lie back in the years. Other influences are at work now, whose results will reach forward into the next decade; and it is with these that we are interested. Take the case of railways. In most countries railways are not an effect; they take rank as a cause. But in Canada they are an effect. In a country whose natural development is north and south, to see the main avenues of approach run east and west is obviously to see a deeper cause at work, the cause of a strong feeling of nationality. But if frontier distinctions are being overridden by a moving population, then obviously new causes are at work. If the results affected by these new causes were to set up new effects in trunk lines running north and south (as would infalliby happen if the stream of emigration from the east were also to cease owing to growing dissatisfaction), then these very results would themselves in turn become powerful causes, with further results that are not very difficult to foresee.

In tracing the history of the past the Duke of Argyll puts us in possession of most valuable data. The statistics he provides, for instance, in his chapter on the "National Highways of Canada" are invaluable. It would be difficult to state another source where they can be discovered in so complete and accessible a form. The Canadian Pacific Company, the Grand Trunk Western, the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, all receive detailed attention and analysis. So, too, his chapter on "Naval and Military Defence" deals adequately and fully with the authoritative voices on this perplexed question: the voices that have been heard in England, at Conferences, and otherwise, no less than the voices in Canada. Similarly the letterpress, and particularly the tables in his chapter "Valuable Statistics" are of the highest value. The tables, indeed, are not only of value as touching Canada, for they comprise statistics regarding all the sister-States of the Empire, and they cannot fail to be of vital use for reference in future Imperial discussions. On this side of the question the Duke of Argyll has given us a most valuable handbook. And if he avoids close discussion on some of the more immediate questions, that is only part of the penalty that must needs be imposed on a man of so lofty a station.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE BLACK ART

The Book of Ceremonial Magic. By ARTHUR EDWARD WAITE. (Rider. 15s. net.)

"THE cesspools of spiritual life and the pit of the second death"—these are the words with which Mr. Waite describes the extraordinary mass of material which he has in this volume edited and elucidated; if a region compounded of Tartarus and Bedlam may be considered as capable of elucidation. Of course there are many people who will chide Mr. Waite for having wasted his time in commenting on these frantic follies. I think that any such persons will be wrong, and for the following reason.

There is deeply implanted in every sane human heart the love of mystery, the desire of wonder. Indeed, it is not too much to say that the man without this desire is no longer a man; for this aspiration for the mysterious, the secret, and the marvellous is but one expression of that quality which makes man to be what he is, which differentiates him from the cleverest of monkeys and the wisest of pigs; and causes a human community, however vicious and senseless, to be something infinitely above the best regulated ant-hill or beehive. It is the sense of wonder which lies behind all religion and every art; it is this consciousness of a hidden, awful, and transcendent reality latent in the whole process of the material universe, from the grain of sand up to the great circle of the starry heavens, that makes us human, and not bestial. Hence it is of the utmost and most vital importance that this sense, that this desire, should be regarded as a pure well of supersubstantial water springing up to eternal life. These fountains, at least, are not to be defiled; no one, if we can help it, shall adulterate the springs of everlasting bliss. Yet, in the nature of the case, when man desires pure drink, there always have been, and always will be, the false taverners and the vintners of Sodom and Gomorrah with their poisonous, "substituted" drenches, their vats holding nothing but venom, who are always ready in the way, who stand in the streets and in the market-places holding out their chalices of perdition and madness. There is Theosophy, there is "New Thought," there is "Christian Science;" there is Spiritualism, "Liberal Christianity," Gnosticism; the list is interminable; to the catalogue of follies, past and present, there is no end. What is the result? The exhibition of these poisons may turn out in one or another of two ways. One man tastes, and, having a strong palate of common sense, perceives that the draught offered him is rubbish and poisonous rubbish. He turns away, loathing; but in too many cases he confuses the adulterated draught with the pure and true springs; perceiving that occultism is nauseous nonsense, he includes the veritable marvels in his sentence of disgust, and says in his heart that there is no God, that the world of vision has no real existence. This is bad enough; but the fate of him who swallows what is proffered and rejoices in it, and believes that he has found the truth is even more lamentable; he becomes an occultist; he joins the ranks of that dreary host who march to the land of everlasting nonsense.

Hence the importance of detecting the imposture, of prosecuting the vendors of wicked absurdities with all the rigour of the critical law, of displaying the foolery that lies behind all occultism so clearly and manifestly that the most credulous may see and beware and avoid. This, as I conceive it, is the office of "Ceremonial Magic," and Mr. Waite has well discharged a duty which he has undertaken before. Who has not felt the glamour of the word "Rosicrucian"? who has not cherished a vague but inspiring belief that there was once on a time a secret Rosicrucian Society, and that it did wonderful things? Well, Mr. Waite wrote many years ago a book called "The Real History of the Rosicrucians;" and the famous order evaporates, turns out to be nothing more or less than the jeu d'esprit of a German scholar who concocted an entertaining mixture of Lutheranism and Paracelsianism. There never was a Christian Rosencreutz, there never were any Rosicrucians in the proper sense of the word, any more than there was an Abbey of Thelema save in the imagination of Rabelais.

A similar work has been done by Mr. Waite in the book before me. I have often cherished a kind of uncritical belief in the wonder of magic rituals. They may be, and very likely are, utterly futile, I have said to myself, but no doubt they possess a certain weird and awful splendour; the evocations will, no doubt, fail to bring up an inhabitant of the spiritual world but they will shake the heart with their dark solemnity. So I suffered myself to fancy; finding in the revelations of Madame Blavatsky, in the comment of Mrs. Besant, in the fooleries and trickeries and futilities of spiritualists nothing but tedium; I still harboured a child-like faith in the dignity of ancient magic. And this is ancient magic!—

> PROCEL appears in the form of an angel, and is a great and strong duke. He speaks mystically of hidden things, teaches geometry and the liberal sciences, and at the command of the operator will make a great commotion like that of running waters; he also warms waters and tempers baths. He was of the Order of the Powers before his fall.

He seems to combine the virtues of Mr. Wackford Squeers, of Dotheboys Hall, with those of a bath-geyser. There are better things in ceremonial magic than this specification of a fiend; some of the invocations have a certain ring about them, though the scraps of Hebrew are mostly ridiculously corrupted. But there are also worse things—matters which are disgusting as well as silly; and the language which the editor uses to describe his material is not too severe. And if the methods used for compelling the fiend to appear are ridiculous—I have just noticed that in one conjuration the spirit is evoked on the authority of "GENIO and LIACHIDE, Ministers of the Tartarean seat, chief princes of the seat of APOLOGIA"!—the uses to which you put your demon when you have got him are squalid and earthly to the last degree. The devil is brought up from the abhorred and flaming lake that the magician may know Euclid without the trouble of learning it, get money without the toil of earning it, and be taught a royal, if infernal, road to the affections of the cook and housemaid. In a word, black magic is stuff, and very sad stuff at that; it is as silly and futile as modern occultism, than which no more dismal sentence may be pronounced.

There are, however, one or two interesting considerations which arise from this book. Firstly, there is the literary and historical point: are the documents illustrated by Mr. Waite "the real thing"? Some of them go back as far as the late Middle Ages; more are concoctions of the eighteenth century, a fruitful period in false doctrines and sick inventions: how far are any of them invented in good faith by people who really believed that by killing poultry and talking a lot of nonsense you could compel the spirits of eternity to become manifest? Personally, I am inclined to think that almost all of the conjurations and evocations and formulæ were "made to sell;" I do not think that the authors of the nonsense believed in it. So far as one can see, the formulæ are the dregs and lees of the Jewish Cabala in its most unworthy aspect; they are the work of a kind of pseudo-scholarship; but one fails to detect in them any real root of genuine popular tradition. There are still those in England who have preserved in lonely cottages, in dwellings by dark woods, and in wild places the ancient tradition of witchcraft. It is still possible, if you know the right quarter, to procure the making and wasting of the waxen man. But those initiated in these secrets know nothing, we may be sure, of the demon PROCEL, or of the infernal region called APOLOGIA. And there is another aspect of the subject which I hope to treat in some subsequent number of THE ACADEMY.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

ARTHUR MACHEN.

OUR LADY OF THE SNOWS

The Fair Dominion. By R. E. VERNEDE. (Kegan Paul and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

MUCH has been written of late on Canada; but this book of Mr. Vernede's (which contains twelve illustrations in colour from drawings by Cyrus Cuneo) must be welcomed as a very desirable addition to the number. We learn a great deal from the work; but the knowledge here is given us in so pleasant a form that, wrapped up in the narrative of the author's personal experiences, the more serious points are acquired without the slightest effort. Mr. Vernede undertook his journey with the object of seeing Canadian life in all its aspects. To this end he conscientiously set out from England to the Fair Dominion as a steerage passenger. Thus we have local colour from the very start, and an amusing account of the amenities of the steerage and of the occasional horseplay that still obtains amongst the emigrants.

It is gratifying to note that the author speaks very favourably of his reception in the character of emigrant by the Canadian authorities, who appear to have despatched the necessary formalities with a commendable absence of red tape. After this he fended for himself in Quebec, and was not long in making acquaintances, and in gleaning a few of the local opinions of which, among other things, he had come in search. One of the very first with which he came into contact deals with a question that, as a matter of fact, is of the greatest importance to British manufacturers. The inattention of these latter to Canada's real needs was loudly condemned by a patriotic commercial traveller. His complaint against the methods of the British industrial folk lay in the fact that they were wont to supply an article of too good and durable a type "while the States jumped in with inferior goods more suited to the moment." The author has done well to lay stress upon this experience, for the question is rapidly becoming acute, and extends from the manufacture of railway-engines to that of the most insignificant agricultural implement. The American contention, of course, is that an efficient object can be contrived at a price sufficiently cheap to enable the owner to "scrap" it after a year or two without material loss, when it may be replaced by another equally cheap that has the advantage of the very latest improvements. From a purely commercial point of view it is not easy to combat this theory, provided that the increased risk of accident and loss of human life is ignored.

Mr. Vernede's sense of humour is seldom lacking throughout the book. He tells a very excellent story of a young French Canadian whom he accompanied on a pilgrimage to Ste. Anne de Beaupré. There the impressionable pilgrim vowed never again to partake of whisky, and returned completely obsessed by the solemnity of the spot, until a few hours later his reviving temperament imbued him with the brilliant idea of substituting the love of women for that of the spirit. As amusing a narrative as any is that of an encounter with an American negro hotel porter at Niagara. The latter, having learned the nationality of the author, introduced him solemnly as a fellow-countryman to the lift-boy, "a typical little stunted, anæmic street-arab from one of our Northern cities." Shortly afterwards the coal-black citizen expounded his views on the stupidity of the Canadian. "Look at Toronto," he said, "do you think there'd be any hustle in that place if the Canadians had been left to themselves? No, Sah. But we came along and lent them our brains and our enterpri e, and I guess now it's a big, fine city."

Once fairly established in the Dominion, the reader must accompany the author on a trip from the east to the farthest west. It was not a hurried expedition, since it was broken by many delightful halts and episodes. There is an account of fishing on the French River, and of camping in the birch-woods, where pine-boughs made a couch at night. There are tales of excursions into the Rockies, and the story of a solitary ride into the Yoho Valley. In all these the writer compels our interest from the merits of the descriptive passages.

So much for the more adventurous incidents of the procession from east to west. From the industrial and political points of view there is considerably more to be said. For instance, the author notes that, although the movement of settlers from east to west still continues, it is not increasing, since a new tendency to the northward has now set in. Some remarks concerning the actual material value to the Dominion of the recent influx of American farmers should be received with special attention. They are an undoubted gain to Canada in so far as they possess energy, capital, a knowledge of the local conditions, versatility, and adaptability. But they are there in order to "get rich quick," and their methods are bad for the land from which they are wont to take all and to render nothing back.

Mr. Vernede makes it clear that he admires the Canadian, and that he was not disappointed in the energy he expected to find in the Dominion. The remarks of the Victorian crowd in the Far West on the occasion of a disastrous fire were instructive. "This'll create more work," said one man fervidly. "Just what the town needed," said another enthusiast. "The author even heard some of the men who had rushed out of their burning offices talking keenly and proudly of the sort of buildings they'd have to start putting up next day—much better buildings." This is the spirit of a live country indeed!

SHORTER REVIEWS

Letters from Finland. By ROSALIND TRAVERS. (Kegan Paul and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

PROBABLY the first thought that will occur to the reader of this book is one connected with the purely commercial aspects of quantity and price. We admit that on first handling the bulky volume we were in momentary doubt as to whether it had not been evolved by accident from the field of reprints rather than from that of original editions. An excellently produced book of more than four hundred pages of fairly close print, containing, moreover, thirty fair illustrations and a map, at the cost of little more than a third of a guinea, is not to be looked at askance by that decreasing, but still important, section of the public that purchases for itself instead of relying upon the lists of subscription

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

libraries. This, of course, provided that the quality is equal to the quantity, which is here emphatically the case.

The "Letters from Finland" are concerned, in the first place with excursions through the country during the brief but charming season when summer and early autumn hold their own. Miss Travers has a keen sense of the beautiful in nature, and she has rendered the silver and golden tints of the dying summer in an admirable fashion. The romance of Finland must be far deeper than is generally known when, with the author, we "thread our way through an absolute tangle of land and water, by narrow passages, islands, peninsulas, and interlocking headlands, such as only a Finnish pilot could remember. We look down forest glades and see wild paths and woodland meadows, lonely isles of sunshine that perhaps nobody but the wolves have explored." The book abounds with vivid descriptions of nature and with animated accounts of life and customs amidst the islands, forests, and lakes.

With the advent of the cold season Miss Travers, as was only fitting, forsook the country and went into urban winter quarters. From this source we obtain sketches of Finnish society, literature, art, politics, and a good deal beyond. Undoubtedly one of the most interesting features of the political and social life of the little country is the position attained by women. The women of Finland have gained more than the mere suffrage: two dozen and one of their number have seats in Parliament itself. "There is in no sense a woman's party in the Landtdag," explains Miss Travers, "for the twenty-five female members are divided among the political groups in a way almost strictly proportionate to the size of these." Now how do these good ladies obtain the privileges for which in England so many antics and strange pantomimes have been performed all in vain? "They got it by deserving it!" answers a Finnish lady, which seems to clinch the matter. But it would be unfair to Miss Travers to permit the reader to believe that the subject was dismissed in so trivial a fashion as this. Her sympathies are strongly expressed for the Finnish women, who have progressed so far in so short a time.

As is evident from the title of the book, the episode is conveyed in the form of letters, a fashion not invariably to be commended, but in this case eminently successful. From them may be gathered a charming picture of the simple folk and romantic landscape of the country over which looms the shadow of Russia.

Mrs. Alfred Trench. By the Author of "The Views of Christopher." (Elkin Mathews. 2s. 6d. net.)

VERY delicately, and with a sympathy which never degenerates into sentimentalism, has the author of "The Views of Christopher" told the tragic history of "Mrs. Alfred Trench." Tragedy it certainly must be called, although there are no violent scenes or lurid pictures; it is the quiet sadness of the life of a woman "born to be a hostess," married to a man who is absolutely selfish, who even makes up his quarrels with her chiefly because he then "feels better" and can work at his art more satisfactorily. In such a situation the tertium quid is bound to appear; but the author does not descend to the hackneyed situations of the average writer who uses "incompatibility of temperament" as his theme. Margaret is severely tried in the furnace of temptation, and is on the point of yielding, but in the end she emerges victoriously. The difficulty is that Trench, her husband, the intolerable poseur, after all does really love her in his own poor fashion: if he were only a little worse, if he actually ill-treated her physically, things might have been different. Frere, the successful doctor, who has loved Margaret in her youth and succumbs to her pathos and her beauty in his middle-age, is sympathetically drawn, and the reader is compelled to share his honest detestation for the man who carried off the prize by his showy person.

The story is not unrelieved by humour. There is a neat swift picture of a provincial congregation on page 107 "The choir triumphantly secured the last verse, when the congregation suddenly roused to a sense of its privileges and hastened to dispute with it the final Amen," then all settled into their places "with expressions more or less expectant of doctrine or doze." We could wish for more detail regarding the delightful little "blotted, mis-spelt letters" from the boy Jim to his mother. "I love you awfuly," he writes, "and I have had my first fite." We could also wish for a more lucid finish to the story, but nowadays it is considered artistic to leave the reader in a slight haze as to the ultimate happiness of the characters, so on this point perhaps we are needlessly critical. At any rate, the book is thoroughly well written and cleverly conceived.

The Corner of Harley-street: being some Familiar Correspondence of Peter Harding, M.D. (Constable and Co. 4s. 6d. net.)

THESE letters, purporting to be those of a Harley-street M.D. who has made his mark in his profession, are all written in the same year to members of his family, patients, old friends, and others, and cover, as might be expected, a wide ground. Among the subjects dealt with are fly-fishing and the delights of a Devonshire vacation, short in time but full of enjoyment to a hard-worked London medical man; advice to a son who is in doubt as to the profession he shall follow, particularly setting out the advantages and disadvantages of medicine as a profession; criticisms of art to an artist-etcher friend, and a communication on golf, to which we are glad to see our doctor is not a slave. There is also a very sensible letter to an overworked barrister as to the best way to deal with his complaint. In short, all the letters form very interesting reading.

A letter to a lady on the death of her much-loved husband seems to us to be a little out of the touch of personal sympathy. It deals with the matter from the purely medical point of view. "Alive everything—dead nothing." It may be correct, but it seems hard in tone even if strictly true in fact.

The author's views on religion are somewhat divergent, but so are those of most people under varying conditions.

However, there is only one morbid epistle, and the others, on a wide range of subjects, are, as we have said, interesting reading.

The Book of Roses. By LOUIS DURAND. (John Lane. 2s. 6d. net.)

WE have here one of the admirable series of handbooks of practical gardening edited by Mr. Harry Roberts. A book of this size can obviously serve only as an introduction to such a wide subject, and this little volume subserves that purpose admirably. The amateur rose-grower will not go very far wrong if he follows the principles of cultivation therein laid down, nor will his choice of varieties be other than good if the author's suggestions are adopted. This, too, is nowadays one of the most serious problems which confront the rosarian, for the name of distinct varieties is legion. Personally we should have thought the space devoted to proving that the rose is worthy of cultivation might more profitably have been devoted to a fuller index, but that is a matter of taste and de gustibus non disputandum. We should also have welcomed a few hints upon the cultivation of roses under glass. We are also of opinion that mere photographs of single blooms, of which the majority of the plates appearing here consist, are of little if any value either to the grower or to anybody else. To be of real value one must be enabled to judge by them of the form, habit, and, if possible, of the colour of any particular rose.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Les Muses Romaines et Florentines. By PIERRE JEAN JOUVE. (Librairie Léon Vanier. A. Messein, Successeur, Paris. 3f. 50c.)

MONSIEUR JOUVE has compiled a slight volume of poems with a rather disproportionate seasoning of introduction. This introduction aims at being an outline "Ars Poetica," and raises high expectations, which, we must confess, are subsequently disappointed. Monsieur Jouve is making no very daring allegation when he says that this age is unfavourable to poetry, and that he does not expect that his "Ars Poetica" will greatly recommend his verses, but he is perhaps rather original in recommending a return to the classical theories of the seventeenth century, with lyrical developments to suit the times. He seems to carry a very laudable contempt for evolution too far. As to the poems themselves, they hardly suggest the first blast of a trumpet of revolution. They are mostly short odes, not without charm, to the landmarks of Rome and Florence, or apostrophes to Michael Angelo. They somehow remind us of students' day at the National Gallery. We cannot refrain from an allusion to another "Ars Poetica," and to what the Dr. Johnson of "Rejected Addresses" translated majestically as "muscipular abortions."

Forms of Prayer with Thanksgiving to Almighty God. (Eyre and Spottiswoode. 6s. 6d. 3s. 6d. per 100.)

The Book of Common Prayer. (Eyre and Spottiswoode. 4s. 4d.)

The Coronation Service. (Eyre and Spottiswoode. 2s. 1s. 4d. net.)

The King's Letter to the Nation. (Raphael Tuck and Sons.)

The Portrait Book of our Kings and Queens, 1066-1911. Edited by T. LEMAN HARE. (T. C. and E. C. Jack. 5s. and 2s. 6d. net.)

Debrett's Coronation Guide. Illustrated. (Dean and Son. 2s. 6d. and 1s. net.)

THE King's Printers, Messrs. Eyre and Spottiswoode, have now issued their edition of the Forms of Prayer for general use on the 22nd June. The same firm is also responsible for a very handsome Book of Common Prayer, containing portraits of the King and Queen, together with the Coronation Anthem composed by Sir Frederick Bridge, which is daintily printed in gold, as well as an Official and two Souvenir Editions of the Coronation Service, the first of which is nicely bound in a royal blue cover with the King's Arms in front, and is a facsimile of the one to be supplied to Westminster Abbey. Of the same size and type is No. 1 of the Souvenir Editions, which is printed on antique paper with a beautifully-designed cover in three colours. No. 2 also has an illuminated cover, and is well printed in red and black on good art paper.

From Messrs. Raphael Tuck and Sons we have received both a large and a small reproduction of King George's affectionate letter to his people, written at the time of King Edward's death. The original of the beautiful border, designed by Sir L. Alma-Tadema, is exhibited in this year's Royal Academy, and the whole of the proceeds from the sale of the Letter will be distributed to charitable institutions selected by his Majesty.

The contents of Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack's "Portrait Book of our Kings and Queens" are likely to be found of more than passing interest, for the series of portraits of the Kings and Queens of England since the Norman Conquest, which are reproduced in colours from rare prints in the British Museum and from originals in the national and private collections, together with their collateral matter, makes the book especially acceptable to youthful students of history, while its bright and gay appearance stamps it at once of equal value as a Coronation souvenir.

"Debrett's Coronation Guide," issued by Messrs. Dean and Son of Rag Book fame, will supply a very useful reference-book for visitors to London during the all-important event of the year. Messrs. Dean and Son always manage to put in as concise a form as possible the quantity of information they collect, and the present volume in no way falls short of their usual custom. The explanations are arranged in alphabetical order and given in the form of short articles. There is a copious Index of nearly one thousand headings, and a very handy Appendix containing the names of the foreign and colonial representatives for the Coronation.

FICTION

Haunted. By GERTRUDE WARDEN. Coloured Frontispiece. (Ward, Lock and Co. 6s.)

THERE are no real ghosts in this story and nothing of the truly supernatural; nevertheless it is likely to haunt the reader for some time after its perusal, and therein lies its merit, for the thrilling incidents with which it is crammed throughout over three hundred pages are quite plausible, though perhaps occasionally a little far-fetched. The villain—if, strictly speaking, a villain he can be called—is certainly a most versatile one and a remarkable adept in the art of disguises. As the reader advances through the story he will form various conclusions as to what it is all about, only to find later on that he is wrong; and this is where Miss Gertrude Warden distinctly scores, for she frequently, and very successfully, leads one along a false scent. We cannot say that we were very much enamoured of the Lady Anne, for we cannot conceive any woman secretly marrying a man who shot her betrothed at the altar on her wedding-day and then made good his escape. The susceptible young hero, however, being ignorant of this, fell head over heels in love with her at first sight; and perhaps he was to be excused, for listen to the description of the lady in question:—

> Picture to yourself a tall, white garden lily turned into a woman, and you see Lady Anne. A skin of satin and snow, a long white throat, a head with a natural crown of gold, a line from the nape of the neck to the waist which would send a sculptor wild with longing to model her, eyes like the sea in the sun on a June morning, a way of walking as though she moved to slow music, the music of her lovely thoughts, and a voice veiled and low, like the ripple of a wood stream hidden by ferns; that was Lady Anne.

But that was before the tragedy at the church. She had no lovely thoughts afterwards, and became "a broken lily," in spite of, or rather because of, her secret marriage to the ne'er-do-weel and assassin who is the cause of all the trouble. The story will engross the reader's interest from start to finish.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Mrs. Elmsley. By HECTOR MUNRO. (Constable and Co. 6s.)

MR. HECTOR MUNRO has written a book which the most contemptuous reviewer must treat with respect, and about which the most flippant would find it hard to jest. That is not to say that it is preternaturally solemn, but its particular atmosphere is that thoughtful one which seizes upon people of normal and unexciting lives when they turn to the consideration of "the things that matter." Mr. Munro's hero, Colin Liddel, is an accomplished person. He is intellectually a wanderer when we meet him, and has not yet made his "landfall." He is rather too critical to be quite happy. His work at the oil mill, of which he is manager, occupies but does not satisfy him, and, being self-conscious to a vice, he has few acquaintances and no friends. Difficulties come upon the mill owing to the extravagance of Mr. Elmsley, its nominal head, and, in the ccurse of straightening them out, Liddel meets Mrs. Elmsley, and is profoundly impressed by her. They converse in an intellectual manner and gradually fall in love with one another in a restrained fashion suitable to their years and tempers. She treats him, as it seems to the mere reader, rather harshly, forcing from him confessions of his early love affairs and taunting him with his aimlessness. Meanwhile the mill, re-established under Liddel's direction, begins to interest him more, and, as he grows stronger in character, the story blossoms in a contest between—not love and convention—but love and the risk of spoiling love by fruitless unconventionality. There are, of course, side issues, chief among which are the affairs of Dolores Colonbotti, a budding cantatrice, whom Liddel has big-brothered since her childhood. In the end Liddel and Mrs. Elmsley, assisted by fate, arrange their affairs on a satisfactory basis. The book contains a good deal of rather clever talk, and much analysis done in the quiet and assured way which is Mr. Munro's style. The fault of the book is dulness. With plot enough for a short story, it is worked—it would be unjust to say spun—out to the length of 422 pages. The style is always scholarly, and the situations handled in a restrained manner, but Mr. Munro is lacking in zest. It seems to be interested too much in mere intellectuality and its catchwords, and his point of view is rather suburban. For all that "Mrs. Elmsley" is not to be confounded with the ordinary style of fiction.

The Bread upon the Waters. By GEORGETTE AGNEW. (Heinemann. 6s.)

MISS AGNEW undoubtedly has the knack of creating atmosphere. Her old-world farmhouse, sleepy and quiet in the hot noonday sun, lulled by the cooing of doves, and full of fragrant honeysuckle, is very restful and charming and real—an ideal spot to which to bring the invalid actress, Iris Hawthorne. The place is invested with a hundred artistic little details, which have the effect of making the reader think he has been there. There is also some quite skilful characterisation of a rather out-of-the-way kind—out of the way in that they are people whom one has never met, nor is likely ever to meet, in real life. The Gregorie family is idealised out of all resemblance to humanity. They are Arcadians. Every little feeling which passes through one strikes an answering chord in all the others. If the boy has not shaved before breakfast, or forgets to provide himself with a handkerchief, his mother, father, and even his sister go into agonies of apprehension and wonder. Some awful thing must have happened, or will happen inevitably. The terms of endearment employed in quite ordinary conversation by this unique quartet, the frequency with which they embrace and fling arms round necks, is not only surprising, but nauseating. One suspects hypocrisy. Their very names—Hawise, Armine, Rosanna, Quentin—give them away, smacking as they do of the penny novelette devoured by "tweenies" and scullery-maids. For her previous book Miss Agnew received some very flattering notices. That she must have lost her style or capabilities is evident from the curious form in which she has written her present novel. She has given way to the fascination of dots and dashes to so great an extent that the words seem to be incidental to the dashes. This method is apparently used with the intention of giving the writing a sense of emotion, of deep feeling and second thoughts. The only emotions it aroused during the reading of the book were irritation and anger.

BALZAC

BY FRANK HARRIS

IN the House Beautiful are many sweet singers and skilful decorators; but few prophets and very few magicians, very few who can move one to awe, very few whose power seems to transcend human endowment. To me there are only three, Shakespeare, Rembrandt, and Balzac, and while writing the names I am inclined to doubt whether Rembrandt should be included. For with him I am never rapt beyond criticism, lost in wonder; the moment I think of him his limitations strike me. Balzac has far greater faults, but they all shrivel into nothingness before the heat and splendour of his accomplishment. These two, Shakespeare and Balzac, are the only two who remind me of the Genius of the Lamp of "The Arabian Nights." I can see them both almost as distinctly as if I had known them in the flesh: Shakespeare of middle height or under, but "handsome and well-shap'd," well-dressed, too, walking on Bankside—quick, gay, voluble, with all sorts of possibilities in the brooding hazel eyes; and Balzac very stout and short—"yet he never seemed small," said one who knew him—with long hair, green coat and trousers, worn long to hide if possible the ungainly shortness of his thick legs; I see him in a restaurant eating voraciously, or in his white monk's dress drinking coffee at dawn after a night of prodigious labour: I see the real men, I say, and know them, could tell you their little tricks of speech and gesture; but when I think of what they did in their fifty years of life they expand before me and take on superhuman proportions, and my eyes follow them as they swell and grow till I become envious.

Frenchmen praise Racine on all occasions; they perpetually couple him with Shakespeare, utterly unconscious of the ludicrous disproportion both in gift and genius; some of them talk of Rabelais as a glory, and others of Hugo, but not one of them, so far as I know, imagines that Balzac is their man of men, the greatest whom they have yet produced. This ought to be sun-clear to any one with a ray of creative intelligence in him. It seems to me that Racine and Hugo and Rabelais could all be included in Balzac: give him a singing voice, and he would be greater than all three put together. In beauty of proportion, in sheer artistry, "Le Curé de Tours" is finer than Phèdre or Athalie, and Vautrin stretches as far beyond the hero of "Les Misérables" as "Les Chouans" surpasses "Notre Dame." A good many of us prefer Balzac's "Contes Drolatiques" to anything of Rabelais, and beyond and beside all these are a dozen masterpieces which are among the best in the world's fiction—"La Recherche de l'Absolu," "Cousine Bette," "Eugénie Grandet," "Cousin Pons," "César Birotteau"—to say nothing of a dozen short stories; cameos like "El Verdugo," "Seraphita," "Une Autre Étude de Femme," "Un Chef d'Œuvre Inconnu," "Jésus Christ en Flandre," and so on and on.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

But though Balzac has not come to his own yet, even in France, he is drawing nearer to it. Men of talent now, sixty years after his death, are beginning to show an extraordinary interest in everything concerning him—in the various places in which he lived and worked, in the people he met, in even the apparently trivial circumstances of his life. Here, for example, is Maurice Serval in the Mercure de France, the first literary review in French at present, giving twenty-five pages to a study of Balzac's novel "La Rabouilleuse," in connection with Issoudun and Balzac's stay in that provincial town. Most readers, I fancy, will know "La Rabouilleuse" better under its first title, "Les Deux Frères." The novel appeared in La Presse in 1842 in two parts separated by an interval of a year: the first part is a study of Parisian life, the second a study of life in a provincial town.

M. Serval shows with some intelligence how Balzac used real life · he can find you the street (la Narette) and even the house in which Balzac lodged his chief personages; the stunted lime-trees ("tilleuls rabougris") are still to be seen; the Faubourg des Capucins, too, where the famous duel took place between Philippe Bridau and Naxence Gillet, remains as it was; but the psychological inference to be drawn from all this escapes M. Serval, though it is surely plain enough.

One takes from real life such particulars as one's imagination has difficulty in inventing. Balzac takes the names of the streets and their description from reality because his imagination is occupied with the souls of his personages, and not with places and names. This trait in him was already sufficiently known. Some one has told us—if I am not mistaken it was Theophile Gautier—how Balzac spent a whole day in the streets of Paris searching for a man's name, and how at length he found Marcas—Z. Marcas. Many of Balzac's names are excellent; Gobseck and César Birrotteau, and in this novel la mère Cognette, are marvels; but Balzac in this department was not the equal of Dickens; Dickens used what imagination he had in the names and the description of the outsides of his persons; Chadband and Pecksniff—the names are infinitely superior to the soul-portraiture.

When dealing with the personages of the story M. Serval is luckier still. Thirty years ago he tells us a poor old woman called La Rabouilleuse was still living in Issoudun who had once been the servant-mistress of a doctor of the town. She did not die, however, as Balzac made his character die; old and ill and dreadfully poor, she threw herself down a well, and so put an end to the long disease of living.

The doctor, it appears, had left her by will a little house and some money, but his heirs contested the will and finally succeeded in stripping her of everything. Balzac told the story of the struggle of the heirs of Doctor Rouget with his mistress some forty years before reality reproduced the tragedy of his imagining.

Some of the secondary characters Balzac seems to have borrowed from real life. The old miser Hochon, the provincial diplomatist with the tight lips, was evidently, M. Serval tells us, modelled after the son of a Senator and whilom Prefect, one Cochon de Lapparent. This son, it appears, was always called Cochon by the populace because of his meanness, and Balzac's pun on the name "les cinq Hochons" was also suggested by the fact; for the family was made up of Hochon, his wife, and three children.

Secondary characters, then, Balzac took willingly from real life, and such infrequent gleams of humour, or rather of fun, as visited him were given to him by reality and not invented by him.

All this one had divined before the proof. Balzac concentrated himself with such intensity on the realisation of his chief characters that he had usually no energy left over for the secondary people, and his humour is so slight, the comic traits are so rare and so common one would have sworn that they were due to memory and not to imagination.

Balzac used to go to Issoudun to stay with Mme. Carraud, who had been a school-friend of his sister Laure. Mme. Carraud owned Frapesle, a little chalet just outside the town, of a couple of stories surrounded by forest trees and a sort of park. The Carrauds spent most of the year in Angoulême, where M. Carraud commanded a battery of artillery, and only went to Frapesle for a short holiday in the summer. In 1838 Carraud retired from active service, and the family went to live at Frapesle altogether. Balzac came to regard the house as a place of refuge from his Paris creditors. One may infer that the idea of "La Rabouilleuse" occurred to him in 1839, during his first long stay at Frapesle. While adoring her husband and her children, Mme. Carraud had an intense sympathy with Balzac and a profound admiration of his genius. He was always welcome at Frapesle, his two rooms always ready for him, and both husband and wife delighted to see him. Balzac repaid their affection and kindness with equal love and devotion. In 1850, a few days after his marriage with the Countess Hanska in Poland, he wrote a long letter to Mme. Carraud, who had just lost her husband and been forced to sell Frapesle. The letter is such a letter as a brother might write to a beloved sister. In it Balzac comforts and encourages Mme. Carraud, while begging her to come and stay with him and his wife in Paris, and thus share a happiness which she had "helped to make possible." Alas! the happiness was destined to be brief, a St. Martin's summer of barely three months; a mere gleam of light as from setting sun, and then—the long night.

One story from the earlier days at Frapesle may be told here. Georges Sand came to Issoudun to visit Balzac, and invited him to dine with her at the Hôtel de la Cloche, an inn which figures in "La Rabouilleuse," but which has long ceased to exist. Mme. Sand was on her way to Nohant, and had brought her doctor with her, who did not know Balzac. In the course of the meal the conversation fell on madmen, and the doctor asserted that he could recognise at first sight any tendency to insanity. Meanwhile Balzac went on eating furiously, his face in his plate, his long hair waving about his ears following every movement of his arms.

"None of us is likely to be afflicted with that disease," remarked Georges Sand at length.

"H'm," replied the doctor, nodding his head towards Balzac, "I don't know so much about that. In my opinion that gentleman has every characteristic of incipient lunacy."

Georges Sand burst out laughing, and introduced the doctor to Balzac, who laughed, too, uproariously, while condemning the doctor to pay for the dinner.

There are one or two facts about Balzac which are not sufficiently known. He wrote fifty volumes before "Les Chouans," which now appears as the first of his published works—fifty volumes which have disappeared and are utterly forgotten. No wonder he wrote to his sister, "sans génie je suis flambé," which, being interpreted, means "I have no parlour tricks, no magic of style; if I have not absolute genius, I am making a fool of myself by trying to write." And that was the very truth. Never since St. Paul was there such a style. It is a torrent in which everything may be found—images, pictures, trees torn up by the roots, dead animals and living, a torrent in spate. Look how he begins his "Père Goriot"!—page after page describing a Paris boarding-house which one cannot visualise after he has finished. Then he tells how the boarding-house mistress comes downstairs in the morning with heelless slippers—flip-flap, flip-flap. She enters the dining-room, about which there hangs a smell of last night's dinner, and finds the cat drinking the milk of her favourite lodger; she chases it off the table. There we have the picture of the boarding-house once for all—the cat on the table drinking the milk; the old woman with the heelless slippers; that is all one wants to know.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Balzac builds a palace, but he forgets to take away the scaffolding surrounding it, or rather he is in such a hurry to begin another that he does not clean up as he goes. But for all that what a workman he is, what a creative genius—with as many masterpieces to his credit as Shakespeare in even a shorter life.

Just before he died this man, with a hundred volumes behind him, wrote: "I've just learned how to write, and if I live another ten years I'll show them what I can do." He did not live ten weeks: Fate came with her shears and snipped the frail thread, and ours is the loss unspeakable.

THE THEATRE

"PLAYING WITH FIRE" AT THE COMEDY THEATRE

Whoever adapted "Die Leibgardist" for Mr. George Edwardes did his work badly. When this play was produced in Germany it was welcomed as a very bright and amusing piece, well constructed, full of witty lines, and containing two delightfully-drawn portraits. It had a well-deserved success. At the Comedy Theatre the play has misfired. The dialogue is dull and commonplace. The characters are made unattractive, and the whole of the comicality of the situation is missed entirely. This is the more astonishing because the chief parts are in the hands of Mr. Robert Loraine and Miss Alexandra Carlisle, and both have never done better work. As the jealous husband Mr. Loraine is most excellent. He is less excellent when disguised as the Prince, because he seemed to take the thing too seriously. He lacked the flamboyance which seemed to us to be necessary, and which was adopted by the German actor, and he forgot the fundamental improbability of the whole story, with its wild farcicality, and endeavoured to make us believe in him. The second Act, therefore, suffered greatly and was out of key with the first and last Acts. In the third Act, when Mr. Loraine resumed his own character, his performance was admirable. Miss Alexandra Carlisle has never done anything better. Her acting throughout the play showed genuine humour, a very nice sense of comedy, and when in the last Act she turned the tables upon her husband she astonished us with an outburst of emotionalism which we had not expected of her. And yet, handicapped as they were by the ineptitude of the adaptation, Mr. Loraine and Miss Carlisle were unable to do anything more than work up an episodic interest in the play. There are limits even to farce, and it was unwise of the adaptor to ask us to believe that an actress would take her dresser—an impossibly vulgar creature who was frequently called "Ma"—to the Royal box at Covent Garden Theatre during the Grand Opera season. The musical-comedy vulgarity of this character was most tiresome and irritating, and did much to spoil the evening. It seemed to us to be unwise to intrust the part of the friend of the family to Mr. Beveridge. It should have been given to a younger and more attractive personality. We think, too, that the most unwise thing of all was to make the home of the young couple so grotesque and hideous. There is no reason, so far as we know, why an actor married to an actress should live in a house which looks like a Chinese tea-shop at an exhibition at Earl's Court. The decorations of the first and third Acts distracted the attention of the audience, and gave them suspicions as to the sanity of the characters. The second scene, on the contrary, was admirably put on, and was a very realistic representation of the Royal box. Once again it is proved that, however admirable the acting may be, the play remains the thing; and once again it has been shown how difficult it is to transplant the action of a play from one country to another. Foreigners may do things which English people can never do.

THE FOLLIES AT THE APOLLO THEATRE

We spent an hilarious evening with Mr. Pelissier and his clever troupe. Part 1. of the programme was wholly delightful. It contained several quite charming songs. "The Big Bamboo," with band effects by the company, was pretty and ingenious. Mr. Lewis Sydney told several amusing stories with the assistance of his comic eyebrows and restless mouth. Mr. Pelissier and Miss Ethel Allandale sang a song about antiques, in which they were assisted by Mr. Lewis Sydney, which was extremely funny and satirical; and Mr. Morris Harvey, who cannot sing, gave a burlesque of well-known actors which was quite clever. And then came the gem of the performance, when Mr. Pelissier burlesqued a Maud Allan matinée. To describe Mr. Pelissier, thinly disguised as Miss Maud Allan, in a series of descriptive dances, which included Sartor Resartus and Adam Bede, to the accompaniment of a grotesque band, is impossible. It must be seen to be believed. The sight of Mr. Pelissier, in his Gargantuan gambollings, his plump limbs encased in rosy pink tights, his head bewigged, his cheeks rouged, his muscular arms fluttering, is enough to make a sphinx guffaw. The whole thing is burlesque of the highest order, full of humour, shrewd observation, and kindly satire. The Potted Plays in Part II. are not quite so funny, although Mr. Pelissier gives irresistible imitations of Mr. Hawtrey in "Inconstant George," Sir Herbert Tree in "Henry VIII.," and Miss Lily Brayton in "Count Hannibal." All the members of his company showed great cleverness in their imitations of the methods and style of other actors who appeared in these plays. Mr. Sydney as Mr. Aubrey Smith was absurdly realistic, and almost persuaded one that he stood six foot three in his stockings. Mr. Morris Harvey, though lacking the rotundity of Mr. Bourchier as Henry VIII., caught his voice and his modernity, to put it as pleasantly as we can, to the life. As for Mr. Pelissier as Cardinal Wolsey, he was more like Sir Herbert Tree than Sir Herbert Tree ever is. Not only did his burlesque of this great actor include an exact imitation of enunciation and facial expression, but an almost cruel suggestion of his keen sense of the ridiculous and his love of horseplay. Mr. Pelissier cannot be too highly complimented.

The Voice Trial, which occupied the whole of Part III., was a little disappointing, although it contained a really wonderful piece of characterisation on the part of Miss Gwennie Mars as a theatre-cleaner. It seemed to us that Mr. Pelissier was himself mainly responsible for many dull moments. He has been so long the enfant gâté of playgoers that he is inclined to take advantage of their kindness, and amuses himself without amusing them by cracking unrehearsed jokes to the members of his company, who, being unable to resist their apparent humour, forget their parts and laugh uproariously. To our mind Mr. Pelissier breaks all the rules both of the theatre and good taste in giving way to this temptation, and we beg that he will take a kindly hint in this regard before he wearies his admirers. Apart from this all too noticeable fault, the entertainment given by the Follies is quite unique. Perhaps Mr. Pelissier would be wise if he were to make more use of the excellent voices of his company, and if we were to devote less time to "Potted Plays" and more to songs.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

THE HIPPODROME

THERE are three items at the Hippodrome this week which require to be seen. The first is the performance of Monsieur Jules Moy, who is described as a Parisian Humorist; the second, the dances of the Moscow Æsthetic Troupe, including Madame Elena Knipper-Rabeneck; and the third the acting of the Sicilians, headed by Giovanni Grasso. Monsieur Jules Moy is much more than an ordinary entertainer at the piano. He is an exceptionally able actor who gives character sketches to his own accompaniment, and he sings as well as he acts. The way in which he turns himself, without any make-up, wig, or accessory, into a ballet chorus master, and conducts a rehearsal with an unseen typical prima ballerina is really a thing to remember. His attempts at diplomacy, which give way to artistic despair, his sudden leapings away from the piano to give personal advice of the most intricate nature, and his illustrations of intricate dance movements are inimitable. He is a master of imitation, and not to see him is to lose an agony of laughter.

Of the Moscow Æsthetic dancers it is difficult to speak too highly. For the most part they are very young and beautiful women, who give a series of delicate and imaginative interpretations of the music of Grieg, Schumann, Schubert, Gretry, and Rameau. They enter a stage devoid of all garish scenery and hung with curtains of plain colours. They are dressed in kilt-like diaphanous garments, and all their movements and postures are classical and exquisitely graceful. The whole "turn" is original, delicious, and refreshing. Of its kind it is the best that has been seen in London. There is no Mordkin to strike a jarring note.

As for the acting of Giovanni Grasso it is a revelation. There is nothing that he cannot and does not do. It is as easy for him to be comic as tragic, gay as grave. His is the acme of acting. There is no actor on the French stage who can be placed in the same class, and he reduces English acting to a pitiful absurdity. He has nothing to help him. He is in no sense of the word good looking. He plays men of the people in their hideous Epping Forest-like clothes, with bell trousers and cap, but his sincerity is so tremendous, his art so perfect and so spontaneous that he holds his audience spellbound. He is that rare thing, a genius.

Miss Marie Tempest is also on the bill. She makes her appearance in what is described as a "playlet" called "The Shearing of Samson." It is a feeble little thing, in which Miss Tempest sings two songs. The French one is, perhaps, worth hearing.

"GHOSTS" AT THE IBSEN CLUB

A MOST interesting performance of a play that is doomed, as a rule, to be merely read—Ibsen's "Ghosts"—was given at the Studio of the Ibsen Club on Sunday evening last. The strenuous part of Mrs. Alving was very capably interpreted by Miss Catherine Lewis, the indefatigable secretary, and Mr. Walter Pearce overcame the difficulties of the principal character, Oswald Alving, in a masterly manner. Great skill is required to portray the terrible breaking-up of the vital forces in this victim of heredity, and Mr. Pearce succeeded in giving his audience some genuine shudders at his realistic portrayal. Miss Pax Robertson had a less arduous task than in "Peer Gynt," but her acting as Regina was thoroughly good; she has the charm of quietness and strength—a rare combination. Pastor Manders was in the hands of Mr. Cyril Percy, who conveyed the conventional side of life admirably and enforced his part by clever facial expression, while Mr. Robert Atkins was loudly applauded for his excellent presentation of Jacob Engstrand. We understand that Ibsen's play, "Olaf Liliekrans," translated into English by Miss C. A. Arfwedson, will be produced for the first time in England on June 18th. That the Ibsen Club is doing good work will be recognised by the fact that its repertoire will then consist of ten plays of the great Norwegian artist.

THREE PLAYS AT THE KINGSWAY THEATRE

WE left the Kingsway Theatre on Saturday evening wondering how it happened that two of the three one-act plays then presented survived the test of rehearsal. "Mrs. Pleasance," by Frederick Dreffel, might possibly have been made effective had it been severely cut down; in its present form it is very weak. Mrs. Pleasance, thinking her husband dead, betroths herself to one of the other servants of the college in whose "gyp-room" the action takes place; the husband turns up, has a scene with his wife; and the wife retracts her promise to her lover with many tears. That is all; we had not even the satisfaction of seeing the manly lover punch the head of the caddish husband—an action which might be weak morally, but which would have given us at least a welcome thrill. "The Bear," a farce from the Russian of Anton Tchekoff, left us equally unresponsive. We can imagine an audience of bucolics rocking with laughter at the antics of the "Servant," or at the shoutings and sighings of "He" and "She," but such fare is not for a London gathering. Mr. Norman Trevor, Miss Blanche Grand, and Mr. E. Cresfan did their best with a difficult task, but left us convinced that the Russian ideas of what is funny must be very different from ours.

When, however, we come to consider the central play, in which Madame Yavorska herself took the principal part, we are in another sphere altogether. "Rosamond," a drama in one act, by John Pollock, added one more triumph to Madame Yavorska's list. There is no doubt of her wonderful power as an actress both in tragedy and comedy; as "Queen of the Lombards" she was an incarnation of the terrible fascination that led to ruin and death. Her scene with the skull was passionate, and avoided completely what might very easily have been ludicrous in less delicate hands, and her outburst with Gelmer, the shieldbearer, showed how remarkably she can enter into the very heart of the conception. One sentence which occurred in the play was curiously appropriate: "I am a stranger in the land—my speech betrays me," said the Queen. It is true; Madame Yavorska is a stranger in our land, but thrice welcome. Her speech does betray her, but it adds an indefinable charm to all she utters. As to the play itself, some of its declamations were too ornate, and the purport might perhaps have been made clearer for the benefit of those to whom the legend was unfamiliar, but the acting carried it safely through to success. Other parts were necessarily somewhat subordinate. Mr. Lewis Willoughby as Gelmer was exceedingly good; Mr. Norman Trevor—who had little to do but die properly when stabbed—spoke his lines with his usual resonance and skill, and Miss Jean Bloomfield, as the Queen's maid, formed a good foil to the extraordinary vivacity and energy of her mistress. It is a pity that so fine a performance as "Rosamond" should be bracketed with two items which can only be termed tedious and unimportant.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

ART

WATER-COLOURS AND DRAWINGS

A NUMBER of "one-man shows" are open at the moment. First we would place Mr. Nelson Dawson's water-colour drawings of the Alps in the Reynolds Room at the Leicester Galleries. These pictures are often beautiful in colour and in their firm, skilful treatment of the cloud-mists and snow in the high mountains. Miss Helen Donald-Smith's exhibition of water-colours of Venice and London at the Dowdeswell Galleries might, we think, have been pruned with advantage. Many of the pictures seem to have been overworked and lack freshness; but when an artist can paint anything so good as "Dirty Weather," it is a pity that such an unsatisfactory picture as the "Doge's Palace" should hang in the same exhibition. In striking contrast to Miss Donald-Smith's work is the series of sketches of Polperro and others by Mr. Tom Simpson, now on view at the Victoria Galleries in Victoria-street. Mr. Simpson's treatment of delightful corners and byways in Cornwall and elsewhere is broad, swift, and simple, and his sketches have all the charm of direct work from Nature, most of them having been done "right away" in the course of a few hours. As exemplified in "By Runnymede," Mr. Simpson's method is surely justified.

Very different in aim and execution are the series of small half-decorative pastels by Mr. Simon Bussy to be seen in one of the upper rooms at the Goupil Gallery. One or two stand out from the rest for beauty of colour and arrangement. We would mention "Paysage Ecossairs," "Paysage Mediterranéen," and "Ferme Provençale."

In the Entrance Room of the Leicester Galleries one is in another world. There are a few small things here over which one lingers with a different pleasure. They are chiefly drawings by English and foreign artists—with one or two exceptions no longer "modern"—and include several of Burne-Jones's and Albert Moore's studies, two of Mauve's soft and delicate landscapes, an exquisite little design for an almanack by Kate Greenaway, and a portrait-study by Mr. Augustus John.

THE LEICESTER GALLERIES

MR. MAX BEERBOHM'S collection of one hundred caricatures is attracting a good deal of attention at the Leicester Galleries. In spite of the praises that have been so lavishly showered upon them, we venture to think that the majority do not exemplify the highest form of humour. It is all rather too obvious, and does not leave enough to the imagination. The "Mr. G. K. Chesterton" is a typical example. Yet many of the sketches are delightful, of course—"The Fabian Society" and "Lord Hugh Cecil hurling at the Labour Party the last enchantments of the Middle Age," to name two, seem to us to have a good deal of that quality which is lacking in the "Mr. G. K. Chesterton." It is the difference between the humour of a Jane Austen and that of a Dickens. The sketches have, however, another quality which cannot remain unnoticed—Mr. Beerbohm's use of design and colour. The appearance of the walls as one enters the Gallery, in spite of the overcrowding, has a sort of Japanese effect which is delightful.

THE CHENIL GALLERY

WE would call attention to an exhibition at the Chenil Gallery, Chelsea, of some of the beautiful work of Mr. Walter Bayes, who is surely one of the most original of modern English painters. Not only are his pictures unlike those of any one else; they are also unlike each other. When one has been admiring the "Placida l'orde, prosper il vento" or "Culmination"—their beauty of design and colour, their directness and simple, broad treatment, it is something of a surprise to find round the corner in the adjoining room such a picture as the "Cornfield" and "Woodland Scene," or again to come suddenly upon the "Garden in a Wood," almost pre-Raphaelite in detail, exquisite in colour, half decorative, and half natural in treatment, but full of the indescribable "quality" which is the beauty of them all.

THE GOUPIL GALLERY

THE exhibition of Mr. William Nicholson's pictures at the Goupil Gallery must have given pleasure to many. The several beautiful qualities of Mr. Nicholson's art appeal differently, no doubt, to different people, but one supposes that all must have been impressed by the wonderful skill of hand which could paint "Nancy with the Mug," the "White Pond at Hampstead," and the exquisite bits of still life which appear in so many of the pictures. We are apt to speak of technical skill as though it were something apart from the other qualities proper for a painter, and sometimes, no doubt, we tend to over-estimate the importance of it. One does undoubtedly see pictures in which the underlying thought seemed hardly worthy of the execution. Yet, on the other hand, it is said that only a painter can properly appreciate the value of good workmanship because only he understands the difficulties that have been overcome. And since, after all, expression is the essence of all art, the ideal is, no doubt, that the expression should so clothe the thought as to seem part of it. In Mr. Nicholson's work one feels that this has been achieved in a unique way. Possibly this is what some people mean by art for art's sake; and perhaps this is why it is possible to come away from the Goupil Gallery thinking less of Mr. Nicholson's pictures than of his wonderful brush-strokes.

IMPERIAL DOMESTICITY

By W. H. KOEBEL

IT has become the fashion amongst a certain class to mock at the word Imperialism. Its significance, according to these folk, is blatant, and its fullest efflorescence occurs within the precincts of the music-halls. In their opinion it is a species of national ornamentation which may be assumed or doffed at the will of a political party. There are some who go the length of branding it a mere phase, and a shallow one at that, mischievous to the true spirit of the country, to the thoughtful, sober, and industrious life that counts. Therefore it is to be deprecated, if not openly damned.

Now, is Imperialism in reality any of these things? Before entering more deeply into the question, let us ascertain what manner of people these are who thus attack the association implied by the word. That they should find themselves in a minority does not necessarily affect the importance of their views. The fact is noteworthy that these opponents of the larger dominion are recruited almost to a man from a class that has enjoyed small opportunity of seeing beyond its own shores. Personal experience may have rendered them more or less familiar with portions of Europe; but they know nothing of the Far East, the remote West, nor of the Antipodes.

An abrupt classification of the kind may savour unduly of the dogmatic. Yet I have put it to the test on innumerable occasions, and rarely indeed has it been found at fault. On the other hand, the Imperialist spirit is almost invariably to be met with in those Englishmen who are familiar with the oversea dominions and colonies. From a purely practical point of view which of the two classes is likely to pronounce the sounder judgment? The question was not superfluous concerning him "who only England knows." Nevertheless, the pith of the subject is not to be extracted in this vicarious fashion. It is obviously unfair to value an opinion from the mere ability of its holder.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

I have no desire to exalt the intelligence of the travelled at the expense of that of the untravelled. The one has seen where the other, perhaps, has read. It is clear that the latter is less able to appreciate the wide distinctions between a colonising nation and one whose direct interests end with its original frontiers. The existence of a State innocent of offshoots resembles a river with a current that, however broad and steady, is unfed, and therefore sluggish in vitality. The life of a people related by birth and family ties to others in various parts of the world is a stream continually refreshed by tributaries, its waters tinged and deepened by the inpourings from contrasting sources.

The evidence of this, shorn of its metaphor, is not only to be met with in conferences, processions, and affairs of State. It enters into the everyday home-life of the nation. The pulse of each dependency, however insignificant, has found its echo in the domestic circles of England. There are curious bonds that unite not only the scattered members of the one race, but white men with yellow and black, and civilisation with the aftermath of recent savagery. How many fashions in clothes, games, food, furniture, morals, manners, and speech have not to hark back to some remote corner of the earth for their origin? In many cases so deeply have they taken root that their source has been overlooked. They are popularly accepted as integral attributes of an insular life, by which means an unconscious homage is paid to Imperialism even by those who choose to decry the word.

Were this evidence to be met with only amongst the wealthier classes it would lose infinitely in importance. Fortunately this is not so. The echoes of the Colonies are as marked in the cottage as elsewhere. Even here too abound the more bizarre objects that evoke the oversea associations. A fragment of New Zealand greenstone, an assegai from Zululand, a silver-leaf from the Cape—these and a thousand similar treasures must not be confused with the public exhibits of a museum. Neither are they mere curiosities, since their intrinsic interest is a secondary matter. They are mementoes of relatives who have voyaged to the wider lands, and in the minds of their owners the personality of the sender is indissolubly blended with the gift.

It is a truism to say that the same applies in a more important degree to the wealthier classes. In how many houses of the plainest brick do not repose idols with glaring eyes, South Sea spears, Eastern pottery, Maori feather mats, African arrows, Red Indian knives, and—but it is impossible to conclude the catalogue! They likewise breathe out a double significance. It is seldom that the later history of the objects is not recorded. More often than not the tale seems to bring a tranquil English family into close touch with the far-off desert, jungle, and morass.

Some of these objects, I admit, appear gruesome and grotesque at the first glimpse; the significance of others is sufficiently deep to reveal itself only bit by bit. I have such a one in mind as I write. It is a low-pitched, low-backed chair of a dark colour that forms part of the furniture in a South Devon country house. Its place is in the drawing-room near the French windows that open out upon a shaven green lawn, and that let in the sweet scents of the English flowers. You are at liberty to treat the chair as quite an ordinary place of repose. You may sit upon it and stare beyond the flowers and velvet turf at the peaceful fields and red earth of the West Country. There are times, although the establishment is innocent of males, when you may even rest within it to smoke, and incidentally to wonder why you and others ever left a land that could hold so fair a scene.

If of an unobservant nature, you will notice nothing peculiar about the chair, and—if you give the matter a thought at all—you will leave the house under the impression that you have reposed upon an ordinary specimen of the cabinet-maker's art. But have you? A closer inspection will show that the brass which studs the framework is composed of the ends of cartridges with the maker's names plain upon them. Moreover the supposed hide of the seat and back is curiously lined. Across the dusky surface run veins that resemble rivers on a map.

Then, if you ask, you will learn the significance of the chair. The texture of the seat and back is that of human skin. The dusky hue of the timber is the relic of a once brighter red that splashed and stained the wood. The thing has been drenched with blood on countless occasions. When Prempeh of Ashanti sat upon it in Kumasi's sacred grove it stood for the centre of scenes that are better imagined than described.

So here is one of Prempeh's chairs in the drawing-room of an English lady, assisting at afternoon tea, dusted by maids in caps, supporting fair-haired youngsters—a grimmer veteran never held a child upon its knee! Is its presence an outrage? Not at all. It has come into the family circle by means of personal introduction. It no longer breathes the fetid air of its early days. Its horror lost, it has become part and parcel of the family furniture—just as the people of its native land have become part and parcel of the Empire. That is why I have laid so much stress upon the chair.

I know that there are some who, ignorant of the true manner of its absorption, would consider the domesticated object as a mere piece of spoil, a crude symbol of the militant side of Imperialism. They would give it back with the rest of the birthright, including all the rites that it has witnessed. That done, they would cross their hands, lean back in an easy chair, and reflect with a satisfied sigh upon duty achieved. Yet far back in the minds of these very people I think that the sense of national kinship is latent. Or perhaps it is an instinct that they have trained themselves to suppress. They are conscientious folk, these, who would perish rather than admit its existence, as the historical fact—that has until now remained quite innocent of exception—that a nation that has once mothered others must continue in her part to the end. Having breathed the wider sympathies, there is no going back to the narrowness of the beginning. There is no return to the first conditions—that is to say, without stagnation, atrophy, and decay.

One eventuality, it is true, would almost certainly strike into life the latent affections of those who maintain that their business ends with the coasts of England. I have little doubt that the actual loss of an oversea possession would reveal within them depths such as they had never realised. But would the experiment be worth the cost? Doors may be barred, bolted, and banged—when the stable is empty! In this case they would be closed, too late, against a very subtle thief—indifference!

Fortunately the great mass of Englishmen are no longer at the mercy of this latter. And I think the number is decreasing of those who are given to allude to the association of kindred peoples as empty thunder and a meaningless blaze of trumpets. To my mind that which is known as Imperialism is a very quiet and weighty thing, a deep sense of national responsibility.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

THE CONTINENTAL RÔLE

By H. Belloc

For many centuries Europe has been divided into certain great states, each controlled by its central government and each independent of the others.

The political consequences of this are so familiar to us that we do not see the arrangement for what it is: something particular to our epoch and to our division of the globe. For these great sovereign nations, each, in theory, utterly independent of the rest, are closely bound in a common civilisation, obey, even in minute details, a large number of restricting conventions in the conduct of war, and seem possessed by a common instinct which forbids them to permit a conflict that would gravely imperil the general culture of the wanton transgression by mere force, of what they have come to consider as "national" rights.

Necessary and unquestioned as this arrangement seems to us, we shall not find a parallel to it in all history except, perhaps, on a small scale, and for a very short time, in ancient Greece. It is a state of affairs which breeds certain political consequences of the highest moment, and in particular a tendency for passing coalitions to arise; arrangements of this group against that, according as the strength, the ambition, or the irritability of one or more Powers threatens the security of the rest, or the common interests of the whole. Logically such a state of affairs should, perhaps, have ended in a Federal European State imposing peace within its own boundaries. In practice, the curiously high differentiation of nation from nation, each with its distinctive official language and wholly separate armed organisation, has not only endured for centuries but with the advent of rapid communication in materials and ideas seems only to have intensified.

The position of this country in these groups and regroupings of Powers which have been the mark of Europe for more than four hundred years is a peculiar one.

British foreign policy in Europe is often spoken of both at home and abroad as something completely isolated in its nature: as directed only to the advantage of Great Britain and as wholly neglecting the common interests of Europe. It is difficult to say whether the intellectual or the moral crudity of such an attitude is the greater. Great Britain must necessarily feel the moral reactions and the movements of culture which are common to our whole civilisation. Indeed, it has been made something of a reproach against her that public opinion has too vigorously expressed itself in matters affecting European morals or culture in foreign countries, where it believed those morals or that culture to be offended. But the position of Great Britain in the international groups of the past has been marked by three conditions peculiar to herself.

First: The national unity and its continuous direction under one governing or aristocratic class was expressed with more vigour, and that vigour more regularly maintained, than was the case with any Continental Power. Thus France works like one machine under the strong government of Louis IV., seems to lose directness of vision in the reign succeeding, is again all one great army in the latter part of the Revolution, is twice divided against itself in the next two generations. German unity is seen dissolving for centuries and reconstructed only in our own time, and then only partially. Again, the frontiers of every other country change slightly with varying fortune. The frontier of Britain, which is the sea, remains inviolate. The continuity of British foreign policy tells the same tale of permanence and fixed direction.

The second characteristic in which Great Britain differs from her European neighbours lies in the fact that her immediate approach to any field of action is by sea—that is, her communications are universal if she has what is called (by a rather violent metaphor) "command" of the sea. When she occupies that favoured position her alliance can act upon all the seaboard of Europe. The advantage is one of choice of action; it may be compared to that of the queen upon a chess-board. Great Britain alone, for instance, of all the European coalition could join forces with the Spaniards and Portuguese in their Peninsula against Napoleon.

Thirdly, Great Britain has been essentially in the past not only an aristocratic but a commercial State, and the British Empire has arisen upon a basis of commercial experiments which explain the Colonies as they do the Dependencies and the retention of small points scattered throughout the globe; points which are the pivots of our commercial communications; many unfortunately (though the national optimism is loth to admit it) singularly ill-placed for the purposes of war.

Now these three characters determine the peculiar action of Great Britain when she joins a group of Powers during peace, or acts in the field with one group against another in time of war.

Her action will be untrammelled by internal dissension or anxiety for exposed frontiers. The field where her action will be available must be expected to lie near the sea. Finally, what she does must be conditioned by her obligations in every part of the globe: that outlook for new markets and empty countries open to development, which once preoccupied British action in Europe, is now replaced by an anxiety concerning their retention and defence in case of war.

Apart from these permanent factors in the situation of England with regard to European grouping or conflict, two quite modern and novel factors have appeared. The first is that England is no longer self-supporting, and that therefore in any campaign its effect upon her food supply must be considered. The second is that England is no longer the one wealthy Power which can subsidise allies during a Continental struggle.

These novel factors mean, first, that the rôle of England in any military action upon the Continent is less than it was in the past; secondly, that her naval supremacy has become the motive of all her foreign policy. We all feel this to be the case. We all write and speak upon the assumption of it, and foreign policy, though it has no longer the precision and continuity which it could once boast, reflects the public mind in the matter.

It is none the less a grave error to imagine either that a British contingent need never be seen again in arms upon the Continent or that any useful arrangement with any Continental group could be made which did not presuppose the landing of a force in support of the allies of this country. That such a force should be very large there is no need; that it should be immediately available, and should correspond to that immediate power of transport which Great Britain alone possesses, is absolutely essential. The strategics of Britain's position in Europe demand to-day, more than ever before, a striking force immediately ready, and such as an allied Power can reckon to be, number for number, the equals of its own troops. Now the last point in this list is perhaps the most important. It is that, under modern conditions, under the conditions of the moment at least, the old capital importance of the Low Countries as a theatre of operations for such a force has reappeared.

That the Low Countries would be our objective in case of war is a commonplace when the understanding with France is quoted; but the major point of the consideration is that a landing upon this coast will remain our objective whether that understanding holds or no.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Boys at school and at the University are commonly taught that the policy of Great Britain must invariably be, and has invariably been, the support of the weaker against the stronger grouping of Continental Powers. History and experience give no hint of so simple a rule of thumb, nor indeed can any solid reason be found for it.

The truth is rather that Great Britain must incline, and has inclined, to support the stronger against the weaker when—as was most often the case—this support made for her own security, and for that of Europe; the rare occasions where the rule has been reversed have been those in which some Power had already proved itself so formidable in the field, and that for so long a time, that its domination threatened the general security, and our own security along with the rest.

Thus we find the Government of this country working with Napoleon III. when he had established his strength. When he had fallen before the rising power of Prussia English policy for a generation stood in support of the new, and what then was the strongest, Continental force. On the other hand, the Government of this country was not concerned to provoke, but somewhat tardily to join, the coalition against the power of France, whether in the wars of Louis XIV. or in those of the Revolution.

The days in which we live have introduced quite another factor into the general problem, which is the presence (through the rapid growth of wealth during the last forty years in other countries, and the growing importance also of their oversea imports) of navies comparable to our own. This can but mean that in the future we shall, and must, throw our weight into the scale against whatever Power for the moment contemplates the creation of a formidable fleet. If the German Empire occupies that position, then we must find ourselves inevitably attached to the opposing group of the national weights that balance Europe. If, as any development of the near future may discover, some other Power—Eastern or Mediterranean, or Western—promises a similar rivalry, it is against that Power that the direction of our policy will ultimately generally turn.

Now in any case, and not only in the particular case of the rivalry which every one is considering to-day, the place where action upon land would be demanded of us lies behind that flat shore which stretches from Grisnez to the dykes of Holland. It would lie there for the very simple reason that this is the one part of Europe where great rival forces are intimately opposed at a point vulnerable to the open sea, and yet where no powerful and highly trained forces can occupy before the outbreak of war the territory lying open to our transports.

There is no other spot where an auxiliary force immediately available through our ample transport power, backed by our still existing maritime supremacy, could be driven as a wedge between any other two of the great nationally grouped armies upon the map of Europe.

If any one doubts this let him consider that map and judge where he would land a couple of army corps to act upon the flank of either force in a duel between any two contiguous countries he may choose to pick out, saving the rivals that face each other across the Belgian plains.

So far all that has been noted here is a point of theory alone, and of theory so generally accepted throughout Europe as to be almost axiomatic; but there is based upon that theory a very practical set of considerations, which, unfortunately, can only be dealt with by suggesting them in a series of questions, as I do here.

This considerable expeditionary force is our asset because we have the power of its immediate transport; but of what value is the power transport if the force itself be not immediately available?

Britain can no longer subsidise one Continental Power with money to act against another—there is no longer, unfortunately, a sufficient difference in wealth between this country and her rivals—but she can offer the expeditionary force in question to act in flank of her allies and to support them. Of what value is that modern form of subsidy, the only one available to-day, a subsidy in men, if the men cannot be upon the spot in the first hours of the campaign? Great bodies of troops cannot be moved at the first advance over hostile or neutral territory by rail, but a concentration round Mézières and a concentration south of Aix la Chapelle would, when the double advance began, involve an action within three days. If, as the present writer believes, the fortified Meuse is a serious obstacle, the heavy work might begin in the very first hours of the campaign. Troops breaking camp at dawn beyond the Belgian-German Frontier will have established contact upon the line of the Meuse in the middle of the second day. Of what value then would numbers, or even training, be if an expeditionary force could not be immediately despatched?

Finally, a military convention exists with regard to this matter, and nothing but the absurd mystification of the modern Press prevents its open discussion. It has existed for years. But is its basis as strong as it was three or four years ago? Is our power of landing an expeditionary force with the precision and rapidity the circumstances require still credited on the Continent? If we have not some such consideration in our hand to offer, how are we to prevent the neutrality of either of the great rivals in the case of conflict between ourselves and the other? And if we cannot prevent that neutrality, how should we conduct the campaign?

There are still men who pretend that national duels can be decided without armies and solely by the superiority of engines at sea. Those who cling to this opinion may find a useful occupation in attempting the answer of the last of the questions here set.

CANADA AND CANADIAN BANKING

We bring you fruit and lumber,
And corn enough for all,
A land to rear your children,
To make them strong and tall.
And when the foe attacks you,
Our ships and men are yours,
We'll stand beside each other
As long as time endures.

Before the Colonial Section of the Royal Society of Arts, on Tuesday, May 9th, Mr. F. Williams Taylor, London manager of the Bank of Montreal, read an interesting paper on the subject of "Canada and Canadian Banking," the Duke of Argyll being in the presidential chair. Mr. Taylor did not attempt to deal with the matter technically and theoretically. His aim was to present to those not conversant with the facts a survey of the country, its natural resources, the industries which have followed in sequence, and the practical side of banking as applied to the financing of such industries, and providing financial accommodation generally in a new country where conditions necessarily differ greatly from those prevailing in older centres of civilisation.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Thirty-four years ago, said the lecturer, Canada was constitutionally a vast disjointed territory stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from the international boundary line north to "a land where the mountains are nameless." Under the ever-memorable administration of Sir John Macdonald, the process of political integration known as confederation was inaugurated in 1867, and presently the whole country became welded into the Dominion of Canada. The far-seeing fathers of Confederation recognised the potential wealth of the western prairie country and the vital necessity of linking it to British Columbia on the Pacific coast and to the Eastern Provinces—hence the Government support accorded to the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

It will be obvious to all that a country of some 3,500 miles in width, extending from the boundary of the United States almost to the North Pole, must have a variety of climates, of physical features, and of natural resources. Mr. Taylor dealt seriatim with the provinces, describing their characters and indicating the nature of the industries carried on. Though there are different climates, different resources, mixtures of nationalities, and various provincial governments, the entire country is united in its respect for Anglo-Saxon laws and institutions and in devotion to the Mother-country. The whole territory is served by twenty-eight banks with about 2,500 branches, the combined paid-up capital and reserves being about £38,000,000. The Bank of Montreal was established in 1817. The Quebec Bank came into being in 1818, the Bank of New Brunswick in 1820, the Bank of Nova Scotia in 1832, others following in due course.

In Canada, as in all countries, the banking system is the result of a slow process of evolution. Canada started right, thanks to the Scotsmen who were conspicuous in the administration of the affairs of the country and in the promotion of its earliest banking institutions. "It is the case," said Mr. Taylor, "that the aim on the part of the bankers of Canada to adapt themselves to the requirements of the people, with the wise co-operation of the Government, has been a factor in the development of the country, its trade, its commerce, its transportation facilities, its resources, its financial stability, and in natural sequence in our national credit—particularly in London—the importance of which is beyond computation."

The Canadian system is in effect a unifying and co-operative one. The bank, acting as a medium, receives deposits from the prosperous farmers in agricultural districts where there is little demand for borrowed capital, lending it throughout the length and breadth of the land, where it is absorbed by the business requirements of merchants, manufacturers, miners, millers, and financial houses. The rate of interest allowed on what are called "savings accounts" is 3 per cent. throughout the whole Dominion, and the rate charged on loans varies little, the difference being not more than, say, 2 per cent., between the rate paid by the trader in some remote Atlantic fishing village, the rich merchant or manufacturer in the commercial centres, the lumber-man, the miner—even the farmer in the North-west or the tradesman in British Columbia. The Bank Act of Canada aims at protecting the public against the creation of weak or improperly managed banking institutions, and so prohibits the use of the name "bank," except under Government charter.

Mr. Taylor went on to explain the system of lending on the borrower's own "warehouse receipts," describing it as a system "which has enabled banks to an incalculable extent to assist in the development of the trade of the country," giving as an illustration the financing of the great cereal crop of the West. The grain-dealer borrows from the bank on his personal warehouse receipts to pay the farmer; presently, when the grain is moved east, the railway bill of lading takes the place of the receipt. The bill of lading is later exchanged for an elevator receipt, which in due course is exchanged for the sale and ocean bill of lading which accompanies the draft drawn on the firms abroad to whom the grain is sold, and from the proceeds of this draft the banker is reimbursed.

The system of bank-inspection in Canada corresponds in general principle with that prevailing in this country, and in dealing with commercial customers in Canada it is a sine qua non that borrowers furnish the bank with detailed information regarding their affairs, together with balance-sheet, profit and loss accounts, &c. The Canadian Bank Act does not permit a bank to lend on real estate or upon the security of real estate mortgages. Any bank failures that have occurred in Canada have resulted not from defects of the banking system but from lack of ability or the dishonesty of individuals. In Canada, as in England, general managers of banks are trained bankers. The general manager is from circumstances somewhat of an autocrat, and though this may have its disadvantages as well as its advantages, autocracy is a simple, safe, and effective form of government or administration, provided that the autocrat is fully qualified for his great responsibility. Canada has been singularly fortunate in this respect.

Mr. Williams Taylor then said: "No section of the community appreciates more keenly than Canadian banks the vital necessity of an uninterrupted inflow of capital. American money will be forthcoming, as in the past, for the development of private enterprise, and English money for such purposes will doubtless follow in ever-increasing volume, but the Federal Government, the Provincial Governments, the municipalities and the great transportation companies must be financed in London, and that is one reason why the safeguarding of the national credit of Canada, in this the greatest of all money-markets, has been, is to-day, and will continue to be, one of the most important accepted duties and responsibilities of Canadian banks, and it also explains why Canadian banks with branches in London have so persistently declined to stand sponsors to doubtful public emissions."

Mr. Taylor concluded by referring, as a Canadian who had had the advantage of residing in the United States, and of knowing that country from end to end, to "the subconscious fear haunting every Englishman, and the pleasing dream of every American, that some day Canada will become part of the United States." "As one with an enormous acquaintance in Canada," said the lecturer, "and who has visited and revisited every city, town and section of the community, I tell you with pride, my Lord Duke, my lords, ladies and gentlemen, that I do not know one single Canadian who believes in such an eventuality, who harbours a thought so disloyal to our traditions—so contrary to our ambitions. Our earnest desire is to live on friendly terms with the United States, and to settle by arbitration any possible disputes that may arise, but our determination is to retain our political entity."

His Grace the Duke of Argyll referred in a brief speech to the lecturer's ability and the capable manner in which he had handled a difficult subject, and various points of the paper were discussed by Sir Felix Schuster, Sir Charles Tupper, and other well-known authorities. The audience was very large, and applauded the lecturer heartily.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

INDIA, IN THE BRITISH EMPIRE

India, Ceylon, and Burmah,
And far Malaya too,
Races and creeds unnumbered,
Send their salaams to you;
Over the great black water
We carry with one accord,
Gold, rubber, tea, and spices,
Gifts for the Overlord.

THE possession of India, it has been well said, has made England an Empire; but this statement is not meant to disparage the over-sea Dominions which have sprung from the Colonies of emigrants from our shores: Dominions, of which undoubtedly in time to come the populations will expand enormously; Dominions and Crown Colonies which it is the object of constructive statesmanship to attach by some Imperial nexus to the mother country. The value and importance of these Colonial portions of the Empire depend on their English-speaking communities, and their potentialities for the future include Trade and assistance in war. The numbers of their populations are small as compared with India. They amount, all told, to comparatively few millions, whereas the latest Indian figures show 315 millions. By being a Dependency, India differs from the Colonies. It has a long and picturesque past. Alexander the Great just failed to incorporate it in his Empire: the Roman armies never reached it. But various Empires have had their days in the Indian peninsula. There the Buddhist Asoka (272-232 B.C.), by his rock-and-pillar edicts, proclaimed his principles of government and ethics; Kanishka (about 120 A.D.) included much of Northern India in his extensive Empire; the Gupta Dynasty in the fourth century, the White Huns in the sixth, Harsha in the seventh, are known to history for their wide rule; the Muhammadans invaded about 1000 A.D., and three hundred years later the whole of India was subject to the Afghans. They gave way to the Moguls in the sixteenth century: the disruption of the Mogul Empire is within the range of modern history. The Empires that have passed away left their marks on the land. The Buddhist remains, Bodh Gaya, the ruins of Gaur, Delhi, Fatehpur Sikri, the Taj at Agra, the Madura temples, are worthy relics of Imperial builders, though so much has been destroyed by time, climate, and wars: etiam periere ruinae. The Kohinoor has descended as an Imperial gem to adorn the dress of English Queens. The British Empire in India differs greatly from its predecessors, in this respect as in others, that measures have been taken to conserve the monuments of departed dynasties.

Lord Curzon has pointed out that, in the strict use of the term, India is the only part of the British Empire which is an Empire. The British Empire is "a loose commonwealth of free States, united to a number of subordinate dependencies." The term Empire and its meaning come down from Roman times. In India the King-Emperor wields the powers of the Roman Imperator whose title he has inherited; he has no Parliament in India to restrain him, though his Ministers are responsible to the Parliament at Westminster. India's right to be designated an Empire rests upon her history, her geographical position, and her magnitude. The peninsula contains not one people, but the descendants of many peoples, races, and tribes, who established themselves in remote ages as sovereign and independent powers. Its position makes India the greatest power in Asia, capable of dominating the politics of the Near East and of influencing the fortunes of Australia and China. Napoleon's eagle eye saw the supreme value of India as the centre and secret of Imperial dominion, said Lord Curzon, adding De Tocqueville's remark that the conquest and government of India were really the achievements that had given to England her place in the eyes of the world. The Indian Empire is considerably larger and more populous that the Empire of Napoleon at its height. Its magnitude can be expressed in figures. According to the Census of 1901, the Indian Empire covers over 1,760,000 square miles, being greater by 12,000 square miles than the whole of Europe, including Russia. More than a million square miles, or 61 per cent. of the whole, are under British administration. The population amounts to one-fifth of the inhabitants of the globe. India is a crowded territory, with an ancient civilisation, with languages, religions, philosophies, and literatures of its own.

Our Indian Empire is often compared with that of Rome. As to the latter's size we may refer to Gibbon, who endeavoured to give a just image, as he said, of her greatness by describing it as above two thousand miles in breadth, and exceeding three thousand in length, and as being supposed to contain some 1,600,000 square miles, for the most part of fertile and well-cultivated land. The analogy with Rome must not be pressed too far. Lord Cromer examined it in his "Ancient and Modern Imperialism." Rome's attitude to her provincials was not the same as that of England, which makes no distinction of race, colour or religion among the natives of India, towards her Indian subjects. Rome drew a tribute from her conquests, which England has never done. On the other hand, the cause of the growth of the two Empires has been very similar. The contact of a superior Power with inferior races has had similar results. Each step in advance has been accompanied by misgivings. Even the great and valiant Clive, who "turned a trading company into a political power," advocated the limitation rather than the advance of British rule. Warren Hastings and his successors, Wellesley, Lord Hastings, Dalhousie, and Dufferin, gradually built up the Empire; the maintenance of peace was their policy, the acquisition of territory was its result. England, like Rome, in dealing with her neighbours in India was "impelled onwards by the imperious and irresistible necessity of acquiring defensible frontiers;" it was not the lust of conquest or the desire for aggrandisement that urged her on, but the difficulty of stopping short of some stupendous mountain barrier. England, again like Rome, has been largely aided by the auxiliaries drawn from the countries which they conquered. Sir John Seeley, who regarded our acquisition of India as having been made blindly, observed that the nations of India have been conquered by an army of which on the average about a fifth part was English, and Indians have been utilised in other ways for the service of the Empire. Unlike Rome, however, England was not contiguous to her conquests as they advanced. But her command of the sea gave her more power than Rome ever enjoyed over the shores of the Mediterranean. Rome had no difficulty in assimilating her new subjects; the English have never been able to overcome the difficulties presented by climate, which renders colonisation impossible—caste, religion, customs, which keep them and the Indian population socially distinct, while united as subjects to the same Crown. Rome, too, was in her day without a rival, mistress of the world. Great Britain has been one of several competitors for India; she had to contend with Portuguese, Dutch, and French before she could pose as the Paramount Power to the native Princes and peoples.

It was Lord Beaconsfield who first gave official expression to the fact that England possessed an Empire in India by passing, with Queen Victoria's consent, the Royal Titles Act of 1876, which authorised Her Majesty to assume the title of Empress of India. The visit of his Majesty King Edward VII., as Prince of Wales, to India in 1875 had pre pared the way for this new departure. The presence of their future Sovereign in their midst had aroused feelings of loyalty among the Indian Princes which had never before been so awakened. Disraeli's words in the House of Commons came true that the visit of the Prince to the proudest Dominion of the Queen of Great Britain must be productive of results and influence of a beneficial character. It was Disraeli who said, "Touch and satisfy the imagination of nations, for that is an element which no Government can despise." And when the Imperial assemblage was held at Delhi, the capital of the Mogul and preceding Empires, on January 1st, 1877, to proclaim the Imperial title, Lord Lytton, in his address to the gathered Princes, chiefs, and nobles, said that "of all her Majesty's possessions throughout the world—possessions comprising a seventh part of the earth's surface and three hundred millions of its inhabitants—there is not one that she regards with deeper interest than this great and ancient Empire." He added, "This Empire, acquired by her ancestors, and consolidated by herself, the Queen regards as a glorious inheritance to be maintained and transmitted intact to her descendants; and she recognises in the possession of it the most solemn obligations to use her great power for the welfare of all its people, with scrupulous regard to the rights of its feudatory Princes." The title of Empress was to be to all the princes and peoples of India the permanent symbol of its union with their interests and its claim upon their loyal allegiance.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

The contemplated Durbar of the King-Emperor to be held at Delhi next December is calculated to remind all India that it forms the brightest jewel in the Imperial Crown, and to kindle sentiments of supreme loyalty. The peoples should never be allowed to forget that India is governed for their good, not for any selfish advantage to England, though admittedly India affords a field for British commerce and that of other nations equally. India should remember, too, that the English are indispensable to her: the idea of Indian nationality is as Utopian as the possibility of self-government. It is essential for India's welfare that the British supremacy should be maintained unimpaired in this great portion of England's world-wide Empire.

THACKERAY AS ARTIST

If we except Du Maurier (who was, after all, an artist writing round his pictures), Thackeray is our notable example of the writer illustrating his own works; and he shows us very clearly both the occasional value and the serious defects of illustrations to imaginative writing. His drawings, indeed, would stand even higher than they do could they be considered apart from their texts. It is to Thackeray rather than to the professional caricaturists of his time that one turns to find the humour of the types and fashions of the Early Victorians.

The first and most evident quality in his drawings is the independence of their humour, the second is a tender, indeed poetic, quality to be found even in the broadest of his caricatures. For Thackeray never falls into that savage grossness of caricature which to the modern eye spoils so much of the work of his contemporaries. All his types have kindliness, jollity, and that humour which is called infectious, and the secret of it is that they are all, as it were, conspirators in his jest. They rob laughter of all malice because they seem to be laughing with you. They are all posing; they all seem to watch the reader, some openly, some covertly, to catch his smile. This is true of the solemn as well as of the extravagant types; of Mr. Hicks, the poet, as of The Mulligan; and Mr. Ranville Ranville, turning his card at whist with magnificent gravity, is as conscious of the amused eye of the reader upon him as is Betty, the maidservant in "Vanity Fair," who strikes the most roguish of attitudes to make the reader smile, while she pretends to discover Becky's note on the pincushion. So, too, with Thackeray's children, who have the prettiest air of precocity. In one and all there is the same suggestion of posing, the same jolly consciousness of being laughable, and the same invitation to the reader to laugh. This it is which gives to Thackeray's drawing the quality of infectious and independent humour. His figures have the proper characteristic of all humorous drawing—that they are funny in themselves. Their humour does not depend upon what they say or do, but belongs to them; they are laughable by what they are, by their droll looks and poses and the fashion of their clothes. And to read the text to which they belong is to add nothing to their humour. One might taste fully the fancy and the satire of Thackeray as an artist without having read a word of his writing.

When Thackeray is submitted to the narrower and severer tests which apply to the illustrator his drawings suffer. Yet if we make the inevitable comparison with Dickens, we see how rarely fortunate he was in his own powers as an artist. Dickens' illustrators served him very ill. They seemed to miss entirely the finer Dickens, and were content to exaggerate into grossness his most farcical moods. Dickens, indeed, by his volatility, his quick changes of feeling, his continual swing between the extremes of riotous comedy and high and serious sentiment, would defy the efforts of the most sympathetic of artists. The comparison, by its contrast, serves to throw into relief the fine qualities of Thackeray's illustrations. But it is valuable for another reason. For where Thackeray failed it was by precisely the same fault, though it is less apparent and less gross, as the illustrators of Dickens.

It is not only possible, but necessary, to separate the essays and burlesques from the novels. The illustrations to the novels fall, as do the illustrations to all long imaginative works, into a special compartment of æsthetics; and there they are subject to peculiar tests, of which the most severe is the criticism that such works should not be illustrated at all. But of the essays and burlesques it may be said that their illustrations fit them to perfection. Thackeray's pen and pencil worked together in complete accord. Each had the same delicate fancy, the same merry humour, the same mock gravity. It is easier to feel than to describe their companionship, for at the root of it is this, that in Thackeray's drawing, just as in his writing, the satire is without malice. That is the quality which informs all his work, and he deserves the praise which Coleridge gave to Hogarth—"The satirist never extinguished that love of beauty which belonged to him as a poet." Beside this perfection of companionship in the essays the shortcomings of the drawings to the one or two novels which he illustrated with his own hand are very apparent, and this for two reasons.

In all imaginative writing which invites the reader to a certain intimacy with its characters and scenes, the longer and the more engrossing the work the less content is the reader to remain a mere recipient of the author's impressions. As his sympathy is caught and his interest fired, he will tend to contribute to the characters and scenes out of his own experience, and to colour them by his own imagination. He will resent the artist's attempt to fix the author's descriptions, and the resentment will vary with his own sensitiveness, imagination, and power to visualise what he reads. Thus the mere length of an imaginative work sets up so many personal and arbitrary standards which it is hopeless for the artist to attempt to satisfy. Beyond this general principle there is a particular reason for rating Thackeray's illustrations to his novels (considered strictly as illustrations) below those of the essays. Thackeray as artist was incapable of the same serious flights as Thackeray the author. His pencil had a much narrower range than his pen. The broader his humour, the merrier his burlesque, the happier do his illustrations appear. He is at his best as artist in "Mr. Perkins' Ball," in "Our Street," and in that gay extravagance "Rebecca and Rowena." But beyond that his pencil could not go. It could not follow him into his scenes of warm sentiment and high tragedy. Thackeray began "Vanity Fair," as Dickens began "Pickwick," in a spirit of burlesque; but as he warmed to his subject, and his sympathy with his own characters grew, the note of his humour was sensibly modulated. This subtle change he was incapable of making in his drawing. And so we find a steadily increasing incongruity between text and illustrations until (notably in the drawings of Dobbin) all companionship is gone.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Yet when every criticism has been made, there remains in all Thackeray's drawing a vivacity of fancy, an independent quality of humour, and a vitality to which few if any of the other comic drawings of his time can lay claim.

RACIAL QUESTIONS: THE COLONIES' LAST WORD

By H. Hobden

Among the problems to be discussed at the forthcoming Imperial Conference there is one in which the difficulties embraced are so complex and the issues involved so tremendous that, far from anticipating a solution, we hardly dare hope for an agreement as to a general definition of principle. I refer to the problem presented by the movement of Asiatic population towards the outlying dominions of the British Empire. For many years past the Colonies, side by side with the Western States of America, have been enacting legislation designed to check the inflow of the coloured races upon their shores; and from time to time incidents have occurred in which the white man has displayed a fierce spirit of racial antagonism. Around these incidents, and the great questions underlying them, controversy has seethed and simmered until two distinct schools of thought have become crystallised—those who favour the free entry of the coloured races into the white man's territories and those who demand their exclusion.

In a brief investigation of the questions that arise from the problem of Asiatic immigration it is unnecessary to meet the arguments advanced by the former school. I say it is unnecessary to meet such arguments because they support a doctrine, the doctrine of universal brotherhood, that will not find practical application until mankind shall develop attributes that will place him among the gods. Eliminating, then, the idealist and his ethics, the discussion is narrowed to questions of expediency, political, social, and economic. And here we find that there is yet a third school of thinkers, a select little coterie of superior philosophers, unaffected by the clamour of controversy, whose attitude of omniscient detachment, admirable enough in a world of ideals, is likely to be lifted high in the scales against the dead weight of human passions. This last school pleads for judicious compromise, pointing on the one hand to the susceptibilities of our Eastern ally, and on the other to the growing aspirations of those subject-millions who owe allegiance to the British Crown. These advocates of toleration base their plea on what they choose to accept finally as a fundamental truth when they claim that by Japan's admission to the comity of nations, and the potential issues this involved, the West is compelled to pause and revise its formulas.

Is the West under any such compulsion? Are we not prone to accept too glibly the conclusions of a few observers who interpret the lessons of the Manchurian battlefields as the triumph not alone of Japan, but of Asia as a whole? Just as an obsession in contemporary affairs is apt to cloud the historic perspective, so is the historic sense, when made to apply arbitrarily and on all occasions to contemporary affairs, liable to lead to grotesque distortion. It is picturesque, but hardly accurate, to compare Mukden to Marathon. There were a thousand causes to explain Russian reverses, a thousand reasons to account for Japanese victories. But the seer has not yet spoken who can show convincingly that the lesson of those victories and reverses points to so stupendous a culmination as the decline of white leadership in the march of nations. Indeed, the evidence is overwhelmingly on the other side. It is as absurd to attach too deep a significance to the signs that are apparent of an awakening Asia as it is to deny the existence of such a phenomenon. Who can look upon the giant activities of Russia; the culture and chivalry of France; the efficient and purposeful progress of Germany; the virility and achievement of the sister nations on the North American continent; the indomitable energy and the vigorous initiative of the Australasian countries and of the subcontinent of the African Union; and, finally, the wealth, the power, and the magnificent resource of Great Britain—who can look upon these massive pillars supporting the edifice of Western civilisation and still tremble for the safety of that edifice?

It is, then, devoutly to be hoped that in any debate which, during the next few weeks, may centre round the questions of Asiatic immigration into the territories of the dominions, no feeble counsel inspired by the terror of an imaginary Yellow Peril will be allowed to intrude. It is to be feared, however, that the philosophic school to which I have alluded will raise their voice in advocacy of compromise, justfying their position on the grounds of the political expediency of the moment, for it is precisely at this point that the question at issue enters the domain of Imperial foreign policy. Here will come the conflict of wholly irreconcilable aims. His Majesty's Government will find it a difficult matter to preserve a sympathetic demeanour in the face of Colonial requirements. Overseas representatives, bearing what are practically the mandates of nations, will have little or no margin for adjustment, and consequently cannot be expected to depart from an attitude of stubborn insistence upon original demands. They will leave the Conference chamber disappointed and disillusioned, and return to tell the national Assemblies of their homelands that the Mother Country considered her own temporary convenience before the vital and permanent interests of her daughter States.

The question may be asked: What are those vital and permanent interests on which the Colonies place so much emphasis? The answer is that, in a final analysis, they concern the political, economic, and social existence of our kith and kin beyond the seas. Where England deems that the exclusion of the Asiatic from the shores of her distant dominions impedes the smooth working of her foreign policy, the States of the Empire are convinced that by this means alone can they ensure their own independence and integrity. And so they have built strong ramparts against the Eastern tide, and they know well that if they permit the smallest breach to be made in those ramparts it can only be a question of time before they become engulfed in the rushing torrent of Asiatic humanity. Can they be blamed for protecting themselves against absorption or annihilation?

Doubtless there are many people in this country who will scoff at the extravagance of the picture. It is, however, quite unnecessary to look so far into the future to seek for the justification of the policy of exclusion. If the principle of free entry were to be applied in Australia, New Zealand, or British Columbia it is reasonable to suppose that a long period might elapse before the Asiatic became a positive menace in the political sense. But it is undeniable that this period would be marked by an economic tension, wrought by the introduction of labour serving under a standard alien to the land of its adoption, that sooner or later would drive the white man from his own markets. It is equally beyond dispute that grave questions, affecting the moral well-being of the white communities as a whole, would arise from the inclusion in their midst of large numbers of Asiatic men, whose ethical conceptions and practices were in sharp conflict with the ideals of Christendom. The advocates of universal brotherhood and of the equality of mankind believe that the solution of this last problem lies in racial assimilation. But no one who understands the clean manhood of the Colonies will believe for a moment that it would be wise to preach such a doctrine within their borders. Some two years ago I had occasion to make certain inquiries in connection with the subject of Oriental immigration, and my quest led me to the most responsible quarters in London. Tersely the economic desirabilities of cheap coloured labour were laid before me; even the political aspect was touched upon; but the primary objection, and it was emphasised, appeared to be a fundamental racial dread of assimilation. "Our minds are made up. We will not tolerate it," was the final answer given me, and I left with the conviction that Herbert Spencer must have been inspired when he wrote that he was "entirely in favour of the policy of excluding Asiatics . . . or restricting them within the narrowest limits, and for this reason—if they come in large numbers either they will mix with the population or they will not. In the latter event they will ultimately become, if not slaves, practically in the position of slaves. If they do mix they will form a bad hybrid. In either event difficulties must arise, and in the long run immense social disorganisation."

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

At the present stage in the world's history it is safe to assert that there would be little in the nature of servitude to mark the lot of those Asiatic hordes who would settle upon the fair territories of our overseas dominions were Colonial Governments to raise the barrier that keeps them now in check. But the "immense social disorganisation" of which Spencer wrote would bring catastrophe to the Empire and to the age.

THE EMPIRE MOVEMENT

By the Earl of Meath

What is the Empire Movement, and what is its meaning? Such is the question which is sometimes asked. I would reply:—It is an earnest, organised effort to arouse the people who constitute the British Empire to a consciousness of the serious duties which lie at their door. Its watchwords are "Responsibility, Duty, Sympathy, and Self-sacrifice." It was started in 1902, when advantage was taken of the presence in London, for the Coronation of the late King Edward, of many Colonial Prime Ministers and Governors to bring the subject to their notice, and the idea was so enthusiastically taken up that in 1909 May 24th was observed as "Empire or Victoria Day" in practically all the Dominions, Colonies, and Dependencies of the Empire. From reports already received "Empire Day" this year will be observed in the United Kingdom in over 21,000 schools with an average attendance of nearly 4½ million scholars, whilst throughout the Empire the day will be kept in some 57,000 schools with an attendance of about 8½ million scholars.

I propose to show why this movement should receive the enthusiastic support of every one who wishes to see the Empire maintain that leading position in the world which, through the sterling qualities of our ancestors, it has for so many years enjoyed.

What are the qualities which ensure success in civil life? Are they not moral rectitude, concentration of purpose, knowledge of the business in hand, indefatigable industry, a doggedness of will which knows not the meaning of the word failure, and the possession of strong physical health? Are not all these more or less the outcome of wise direction in youth, founded on the basis of knowledge, and of a firm discipline, training the soul, mind and body to overcome weakness and to conquer in spite of disabilities?

Our virile ancestors received little education in the modern sense of the term, but their fibre was not weakened by an hysterical humanitarianism which considers pain and discomfort the greatest of all earthly evils. They were trained in a hardy school. The allotted task, whatever it might be, had to be performed, the duty had to be fulfilled—come health, come sickness—or punishment, and that of no light character, inevitably supervened.

It may be said, and justly, that the school in which our grandparents were trained was a severe one. Granted; but if they erred on the side of severity, in the opinion of some of us we have gone to the other extreme, and are erring now in the direction of too great a laxity. Whatever the faults of our ancestors may have been, at all events they were trained to endure, to resist, to make light of physical discomfort, to bear pain cheerfully, and to overcome victoriously. They never heard the modern doctrine that no man is responsible for his actions, and that if he errs it must be through the fault of his parents, his superiors, his teachers, or, in default of any more definite scapegoat, of that vague entity known as society in general.

This doctrine, so delightful for the criminal, for the slacker, had not been evolved, with the result that, hardened by a wholesome, though perhaps extreme, discipline, our ancestors handed down to us the Empire that we enjoy to-day of one-fifth of the earth's surface—an Empire acquired and maintained by an unstinted expenditure of British blood and treasure.

Is the rising generation, to whose hands are shortly to be intrusted the future maintenance and welfare of this the greatest Empire the world has ever known, being trained for its honourable but overwhelmingly onerous duties in as hardy and strenuous a school? Some thoughtful men and women are of the opinion that our modern boys and girls are being brought up in too soft and luxurious a manner, and in this connection I would mention some leaflets published by Messrs. Cassell and Co., of London, under the title of the "Duty and Discipline" Series. The essays are written by men and women, eminent in very different walks of life, whose opinions vary on many subjects, but who are all agreed that no small proportion of the social and national dangers which threaten the very existence of our beloved country are due to lack of proper training, which neglects the interests of national welfare.

Now, I would appeal to all, especially to parents, to remember that it is in their power either to injure or to benefit their country. It is in the nursery and in the schoolroom that the characters of the future men and women of the Empire must be formed. Unless the discipline and training carried on there are calculated to turn out alert, virile, hard-working, duty-loving, self-sacrificing men and women, the citizens of the future are hardly likely to be fit either to carry on the noble civic traditions of their ancestors, or to assist in the defence of their country should they unfortunately ever be called upon to sacrifice themselves on its behalf. I would ask all patriotic parents who desire to aid in the bringing up of a moral, hardy, disciplined race of men and women to encourage their children, girls as well as boys, to join General Baden-Powell's excellent Scout Patrol movement, which teaches alertness of mind and body, obedience, respect for authority, loyalty, patriotism, courage, endurance, and many other virtues as useful for girls as for boys, and for times of peace as for those of war.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

And in this connection I would desire to point out that from a national point of view the disciplinary training of girls is as important to the country as that of the boys; for the girls are to be the mothers of the future, and they also must learn to subdue self, to be brave, to suffer pain and hardship cheerfully and without flinching; they must be taught to realise that the duties they owe to their country are as honourable, as onerous, as dangerous, as painful, and as important—if not more so—as those demanded by their brothers; they must learn to subordinate selfish interests to those of the State; they also must nourish noble ideals, and glory in any personal loss or suffering which in the interests of their Sovereign or of the Empire they may be privileged to endure.

I would specially appeal to the young to discipline themselves and to do their best to become good citizens of the magnificent Empire. Let us all see to it that, as far as we individually are concerned, through our example, and by every means in our power, we endeavour to raise up in the future a generation of disciplined men and women, imbued with a burning sense of their responsibilities, and determined to make themselves worthy citizens of an Empire containing no less than four hundred millions of human beings, and covering one-fifth of the earth's surface—an Empire the like of which the world has never known.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

M. STOLYPIN—DICTATOR OR DEMOCRAT?

By Lancelot Lawton

Political affairs in Russia are slowly but very surely drifting towards an acute crisis. In The Academy of April 22nd I wrote that "naturally the Russian people have become very jealous of the new and precious gift of representative government, and their Parliament is not likely to accept mildly M. Stolypin's ruling that in no circumstances has it a right to question the Government's action in enforcing Article 87. If the Premier is wise he will avoid another conflict with the Legislature. In any case, it would seem that a situation has been created from which he will find it very difficult to escape, and before long his resignation may be expected." Since this paragraph appeared M. Stolypin has "faced the music" of an angry Duma, and his action in applying the Emergency Clause for the promulgation of the South-Western Zemstvos Bill has been condemned by an overwhelming majority. The Premier's latest defence of his policy leaves us more than ever in doubt as to the real character of his convictions. In the first place, he figures as an out-and-out autocrat. Because, he says, the Senate, or Council of Ministers, is presided over by the Sovereign, the Duma has no legal right to challenge its promulgation of any measure. In the next breath he executes a volte face and appears as the champion of popular government. He declares that the Administration would employ the Emergency Clause only in respect of a measure sanctioned by the Duma and rejected by the Upper House. And, finally, he falls back upon attacking the members of the Upper House, who, he says, are not representatives of the nation, but representatives of class interest. Here we have M. Stolypin in the delightful rôle of demagogue. Yet opinion is practically unanimous, at home and abroad, that by flouting both branches of the Legislature he has virtually constituted himself Dictator of the Russian Empire. M. Stolypin is, of course, very much perplexed. He has stated his arguments with the object of showing that he has met the wishes of all parties, but he succeeds in convincing none. Surely there is no more misunderstood man in Europe to-day than the Russian Premier! The only consolation left to him in his isolation is the reflection that it is an undiscriminating and ungrateful world. His assertion that there can be no question as to the right of the Senate to advise the Sovereign in the application of the Emergency Clause is intended to gratify the friends of Autocracy. But they steadfastly refuse to be reconciled, declaring that M. Stolypin is merely shielding his own dictatorship behind the Throne.

Then the Premier, with sweet words, valiantly tried to win back the loyalty of the representative Chamber. The Duma, it will be remembered, originally passed the Western Provinces Zemstvos Bill, afterwards rejected by the Upper Chamber. M. Stolypin did not wait to reintroduce the measure. He promply invoked the aid of Article 87 of the Fundamental Laws, suspended both branches of the Legislature, and in the interim the much-debated Bill was promulgated. Thereupon both Houses considered that their constitutional powers had been wantonly usurped. Hence they had grounds for making common cause against M. Stolypin.

In Russia, as in Great Britain, the two branches of the Legislature are in conflict. The political conditions of each country are, of course, as widely apart as the poles; but let us, for illustration's sake, imagine that M. Stolypin's policy were applied in our own case. The Cabinet would take the place of the Senate, or the Council of Ministers. They would have the right, whenever they considered that circumstances warranted, to advise the Sovereign to suspend both Houses of Parliament, and in the meantime the Bill upon which they were intent would be promulgated. M. Stolypin, however, is careful to explain that such tactics will only be employed in regard to measures passed by the Duma and rejected by the Upper House. In other words, he proposes to use autocratic means for the purpose of securing the ends of democracy. Such is the Russian way of ensuring the ascendancy of the Lower House. Perhaps it will suggest something to the mind of Mr. Asquith! Were M. Stolypin's policy to be accepted there would indeed be Single Chamber Government in Russia. But the crisis has arisen not over any fear on this score, but because of the belief among all parties in the State that at heart the Premier cares nothing for constitutional liberty.

Yet M. Stolypin refuses to be otherwise than perplexed. He has enforced the will of the Duma, rebuked its enemy the Upper House, and has given notice of his intention to uphold at all costs the ascendancy of the representative institution. The conservative and reactionary elements in the Empire complain bitterly that he is arrogating to himself sovereign powers, while the Duma roundly scolds him for usurping the constitutional privileges of the people. That is the situation in summary. But it is further complicated by the fact that M. Stolypin says one thing to the Upper House and another thing to the Duma. A few weeks ago he declared to the former that the Government, or, in other words, the Council of Ministers, was alone competent to decide when the circumstances were sufficiently extraordinary to justify resort to the Emergency Clause. He then made mention of his resolve, subsequently expressed in the Duma, to use this means only in cases where its measures had been rejected by the Upper House. The final outcome of his methods, as I have already said, is to alienate the sympathy of all parties in the land. Even leading Nationalists who are the sponsors of the Zemstvos Bill assail him on the constitutional principle. According to law the measure must again be presented to the Legislature within two months of its promulgation under the Emergency Clause. It is believed that this condition will be complied with on May 25th, and that the very next day both Chambers will be prorogued. This course will save M. Stolypin from immediate defeat. It discloses a subtle plan of escape. But the nation, already incensed by "tactics," will not readily forgive so patent a ruse. The Premier may "save his face," but he certainly will not retain his position.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Diplomacy and Commerce

A question has been asked in Parliament, by Mr. Houston, which bears a relation to the subject discussed in last week's issue of The Academy. Sir Edward Grey replied that he had no reason to believe that German Consuls give more assistance or information than British Consuls afford. This statement is opposed to the experience of the commercial world. How does Sir Edward Grey account for the undeniable fact that our Consular reports are hopelessly belated, and that from many important centres where Consuls reside it is not deemed necessary to publish reports of any description?

The Triple Entente

From the very beginning I have insisted in these columns that the Triple Entente was unaffected by any negotiations that may have taken place between the two Emperors at Potsdam. This week an inspired article appeared in the Rossiya, making it clear that Russia was loyally supporting her ally over the question of Morocco. In the opinion of the Times correspondent at St. Petersburg, "the Rossiya's statement puts an end to any doubts regarding the much-debated Russo-German negotiations and their possible influence in Russia's relations towards her allies. The article affords convincing evidence that the foreign policy of this country cannot be diverted from the Triple Entente."

SOME CHARACTERISTICS OF MODERN IRISH POETRY—II.

Dr. Kuno Meyer, speaking of the ancient literature of Ireland, refers to the "loftiness, tenderness, and purity" which characterise it; and in this also the new race of poets are the inheritors of past tradition. For them the love of man and woman is still a natural and wholesome human feeling—not a sex problem. It is for them but another, it may be a higher, manifestation of the nature they love in all her forms, and consequently it falls into its proper place in the scheme of things, and is viewed by them in its just relation to the other joys and sorrows and problems of life.

It is, indeed, remarkable how few, proportionately, are the love-songs of modern Ireland, and against those we have it may be urged with some truth that they lack the fervour of individual feeling which marks the great love poetry of the world. They are addressed to abstractions rather than living women; like Angus, the lover of Irish myth, the poets seek their loves

> At the edge of the rainbow well, whose whispering waters tell
> Of a face bent over the rim, rose-pale and as roses red (1).

Only very rarely do we find a hint of the authentic human thrill, as in Moira O'Neill's "Cuttin' Rushes," or in "Across the Door," by Padraic Colum, which I quote in full:—

> The fiddles were playing and playing,
> The couples were out on the floor;
> From converse and dancing he drew me,
> And across the door.
>
> Ah! strange were the dim wide meadows,
> And strange was the cloud-strewn sky,
> And strange in the meadows the corncrakes,
> And they making cry!
>
> The hawthorn bloom was by us,
> Around us the breath of the south,
> White hawthorn, strange in the night-time—
> His kiss on my mouth!

In that, simple as it is, there is a hint of love as the eternal mystery which lends strangeness to familiar things, and of the warmth and the thrill of its purely human side.

But if love poetry, pure and simple, is lacking to some extent, we find no dearth of what Wordsworth would have called Poems of the Affections—of the tenderness of friend for friend, of husband for wife, of mother for child. Some of the lullabies are charming, with their sleepy refrain of "Shoheen, shlo lo," and there is a wonderfully tender note in poems like Padraic Colum's "Cradle Song," where the mother, hushing her baby to sleep, says to the men entering—

> O men from the fields!
> Come softly within,
> Tread softly, softly,
> O men coming in!
>
> . . . .
>
> O men from the fields!
> Soft, softly come through—
> Mary puts round him
> Her mantle of blue.

This tenderness of feeling for helpless things—for children, for the old, for the poor—is very marked. We find it in Emily Lawless's pathetic "Stranger's Grave," in Stephen Gwynn's "Out in the Dark," in S. O'Sullivan's "Piper," who played till

> Little bare feet that were blue with cold
> Went dancing back to the age of gold,
> And all the world went gay, went gay,
> For half an hour in the street to-day;

and in the sympathy touched with humour of Padraic Colum's "Old Woman of the Roads," "weary of mist and dark, And roads where there's never a house or bush," and cherishing in her mind a vision of a "little house, a house of me own," and a

> "Dresser filled with shining delph,
> Speckled and white and blue and brown."

It is from the common life of the peasant in his fields or in his home, of the wanderer on the road, of the drover following his cattle, that the poets in most cases draw their inspiration, making their songs of homely things told in a simple and direct speech which is yet, somehow, the true language of poetry. They attain at times, though it may seem presumptuous to say so, the ideal first set up by Wordsworth, which he himself, when he most studied simplicity, only rarely achieved. The feelings described are of a simple kind, but they are real feelings, and there is a total absence of anything approaching to sentimentality.

I have tried to show some of the characteristics of the subject matter of the poems of Ireland to-day, and it may fairly be asked, But what place do her poets take as craftsmen, as weavers of words and inventors of measures? This is a more difficult question to answer, and only one versed

(1) Ethna Carbery.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

in the technicalities of the poetic art could answer it rightly. In this respect, it seems to me, the poets of to-day have broken with ancient tradition. The bards of old framed such stringent laws for the regulating of verse that ultimately matter was subordinated to form; they bound themselves so rigidly that the freedom of poetic inspiration was strangled in the meshes of a complicated system of verbal arrangement. Their modern successors have to a certain extent rejected the ordinary standards of prosody, and the result is rather chaotic. They seem to be feeling for new methods of expressing sound in verse, and if as yet they have achieved no notable reforms, and have had many failures, still, here and there we find a fine and unfamiliar rhythm or a subtle cadence which arrests the ear as something new. It is impossible here to give a sufficient number of quotations to illustrate these experiments in versification, but the following lines strike me as original in rhythm, or at least as variations of more familiar measures:—

Peace and holy gloom possess him, last of Gaelic monarchs of the Gael, Slumbering by the young eternal river voices of the Western vale.

—T. W. Rolleston.

. . . . .

I wish I'd be forgetting it, a blue September morning,
The blowing grass, the torn nets, and one girl's scorning.

—Theodosia Garrison.

. . . . .

It is a whisper among the hazel bushes;
It is a long, low whispering voice that fills
With a sad music the bending and swaying rushes:
It is a heart-beat deep in the quiet hills.

—S. O'Sullivan.

In the irregular rhythm of S. MacCathmaoil's Coronach there is a broken music which suggests the rise and fall of the caoine for the dead:—

Come, pipes, sound
A crooning coronach round,
Till hill and hollow glen and shadowed lake o'erflow
With welling music of our woe.
Beat, beat, ye muffled drums, ye drones and chanters wail
With heartbreak of the baffled, battle-broken Gael.
The clay is deep on Ireland's breast:
Her proud and bleeding heart is laid at last to rest . . .
To rest . . . to rest!

In a short sketch such as this it is obviously impossible to make a satisfactory study of the tendencies and achievements of even a few of the poets of modern Ireland, but the writer hopes enough has been said to tempt the lover of poetry to follow for himself a by-path of literature which offers many alluring glimpses of a comparatively new and undiscovered realm.

R. D.

COLONIAL INVESTMENTS

THERE are many reasons why we should prefer Colonial investments to those in foreign countries, but the main reason why they are so popular and consequently give a lower yield than investments in foreign countries is that most of us have been in the Colonies, and those who have not been abroad have one or more members of their family who are Colonials. We know what we are buying. We also feel at the bottom of our hearts that the nation as a body is at the back of Colonial investments. This is, of course, pure sentiment, for each Colony stands on its merits, and the Government specially declares upon every dividend warrant of Colonial stock that it is not in any way responsible for either principal or interest. Yet we feel that the Empire hangs together morally and financially, and we believe that one day all the Colonial debts will be merged into one huge Imperial debt. The old idea that the Colonies were a burden and almost a nuisance has died. The modern man thinks that the State must recognise its responsibilities and that the Colonies should reciprocate. Sentiment tells in finance as in everything else, and most of us would prefer our money to earn $3\frac{1}{2}$ in Canada than 5 in the Argentine.

Canada is the great Colonial borrower to-day. Twenty years ago the Australian Colonies were perpetually asking for loans. They borrowed too much, but they had the sense to stop, and now their debts appear small compared with their ever-growing assets. Canada does not, however, borrow direct as a Government. Her debt is only 14 millions as against nearly 40 millions of New South Wales. It is the Canadian financier who borrows. This he does with courage. The Mackenzie and Mann group finance their railway, lumber, and other schemes with great skill, and, in spite of the fact that certain people in the City shake their heads, they are likely to pull through, and make successes of the greater number of their companies. The Canadian Pacific total indebtedness is only 46 millions, which, considering the length and importance of the line, is a record. Canadian Pacific Ordinary shares only yield 4 per cent., but they are strongly held both in England and Canada, and even at present prices are bought by Montreal investors. The Preference and Bond issues yield less, and may be considered gilt-edged Canadian securities. The Grand Trunk has now a capital indebtedness of 65 millions, and a further heavy liability in its Grand Trunk Pacific. Sooner or later the Grand Trunk securities will appreciate, and even the Ordinary stock appears a good lock-up with a dividend prospect after half a dozen years have passed. Hudson Bay is another great Canadian Company whose shares are equally sought for, with the result that the yield is under 4 per cent. The great banks of Canada are the Bank of Montreal, whose shares yield only 4 per cent., a lower yield than any English Bank, and the Canadian Bank of Commerce, on whose shares an investor can only obtain a shade over 4 per cent. The fashion to-day turns towards Canadian Industrials. Promoters by the score have made combines, or "mergers," as they are called, of groups of factories. The purchase price has been obtained by Bonds, and the promoter has usually taken most of the common stock for himself. How long these mergers will continue prosperous depends upon the growth of Canada. In most cases the Bonds may be considered a fair speculative investment and the common stock a poor gamble. Bonds of Municipalities in Canada give the investor 4 to 5 per cent., and in most cases are reasonably secure. But Bonds issued by towns that depend for their existence upon mines are very dangerous. The Municipal Bonds of the leading cities like Montreal, Quebec, Toronto, Winnipeg, Vancouver, are good, but not cheap.

Australia was once a great borrower, but to-day the City turns a cold shoulder upon this great Colony, as, for example, when Queensland offered her last loan, which was a complete failure. But the Governments of Australia, large as is their indebtedness, are quite solvent, and the public realises this and readily buys anything that gives a yield over $3\frac{1}{2}$. Prices of all the Colonial Government Loans have appreciated during the past few months, and if, as appears likely, we are in for a period of cheap money, then we shall see a still greater rise in such investments. They are, most of them, invested Stocks. The Municipal Loans of Melbourne, Sydney, Auckland, Wellington, Christchurch, are perfectly sound, and yield about 4 per cent. The railways in the Australian Colonies belong to the Commonwealth; therefore we get no railway securities from the Antipodes. But Land Companies are occasional borrowers, and as they have

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

NEW FROM COVER TO COVER

WEBSTER'S NEW INTERNATIONAL DICTIONARY.

CONTAINING OVER

400,000 Defined Words and Phrases.
2,700 Pages. 6,000 Illustrations.

A COMPLETE ENCYCLOPÆDIA IN ONE COMPACT VOLUME

Mr. Theodore Watts-Dunton says:—

"I have no hestitation in affirming that it is the most marvellous and exhaustive one-volume dictionary in the English language. Altogether, the book is a monument of human intelligence and ingenuity."

Professor Saintsbury says:—

"I do not think that a one-volume dictionary, not hopelessly unwieldy in size, could be made much better; and I shall continue to use and to recommend 'Webster' as long as I can use or recommend anything."

Dr. Sidney Lee says:

". . . 'Webster's New International Dictionary' is indeed a library in itself, and no collection of books, whether small or large, should be, in my opinion, without a copy."

SEND A POSTCARD mentioning "The Academy," for a copy of the Illustrated Booklet, with Specimen Pages, describing the "NEW INTERNATIONAL."

London: G. BELL AND SONS, Ltd., Portugal Street, W.C.

THE CHURCH ARMY.

LABOUR HOMES throughout the land for reclamation of criminals, tramps, loafers, and social wreckage generally, of both sexes.

FARM COLONY. Homes for Youths. 50 per cent. gain a FRESH START IN LIFE.

EMIGRATION for Men, Families, and Lads.

Aid for respectable UNEMPLOYED by provision of work.

FRESH AIR HOMES for Mothers and Children stifling in slums.

LEAGUE OF FRIENDS OF THE POOR, for personal service, by those having some leisure, to distressed families.

MANY OTHER BRANCHES,
Including widely extended MISSION WORK.

URGENTLY NEEDED:—Funds; Old Clothes for Men, Women, and Children; Orders for Firewood (3s. 6d. per 100 bundles); Needlework and Laundry-work; Waste Paper and Rags for sorting.

Visitors and Inquiries Welcomed.

Cheques, &c., crossed "Barclays a/c Church Army," payable to Prebendary CARLILE, Hon. Chief Secretary; or Mr. W. F. HAMILTON, K.C., Hon. Treasurer, Headquarters, 55, Bryanston Street, Marble Arch, London, W.

MACMILLAN'S NEW BOOKS.

NEW AND CHEAPER EDITION IN ONE VOL.

MODERN EGYPT.

By the Earl of CROMER. With Portrait and Map.
Cheaper Edition in One Vol. 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

VOL. II. JUST PUBLISHED.

The Herkomers. By Sir HUBERT VON HERKOMER, C.V.O., R.A., D.C.L., &c. With Illustrations. In Two Vols. Vol. II. 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

 Previously published. Vol. I. 7s. 6d. net.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

The Agonists: A Trilogy of God and Man (Minos King of Crete—Ariadne in Naxos—The Death of Hippolytus). By MAURICE HEWLETT, Author of "The Forest Lovers," &c. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

The Golden Bough. A Study in Magic and Religion. By J. G. FRAZER, D.C.L. In Six Parts. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. 8vo.

Part II. Taboo and the Perils of the Soul. One Vol. 10s. net.

World Literature and its Place in General Culture. By RICHARD G. MOULTON, M.A., Ph.D. Extra crown 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

The Unknown God. By PUTNAM WEALE, Author of "The Human Cobweb," &c.

COUNTRY LIFE.—"Mr. Putnam Weale's story of Mission-life in China is extremely interesting."

EVENING STANDARD.—"A remarkable book, and worth a careful reading."

TRUTH.—"This extraordinarily clever and thoughtful novel."

Nina. By ROSALINE MASSON.

Trevor Lordship. A Love Story. By Mrs. HUBERT BARCLAY.

MACMILLAN & CO., LTD., LONDON.

THE

"EMPIRE ILLUSTRATED."

The Tariff Reform Monthly.

40 pages. Profusely Illustrated.

Interesting to every Unionist and Imperialist and convincing to Liberals and Little Englanders.

Price 3d.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

had a prosperous cycle of years they get what money they require.

The Cape Colony Government Loans yield $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{3}{4}$, according to the date of redemption, and the Natal Loans about the same. Both are sound and will improve in value. The total debt is under 50 millions, whilst the Transvaal Loan, which is guaranteed by Great Britain, amounts to 35 millions and only yields $3\frac{1}{4}$. The Transvaal has also been a big municipal borrower, for Johannesburg alone is responsible for 9 millions. As the mines will not go on for ever, this amount appears out of all proportion to the value of the Rand apart from mining, and the securities are much overvalued. The Pretoria 4's are under par, as are the Bloemfontein 4's. The Transvaal is very over-weighted with debt, and its assets are rapidly vanishing. The Rhodesian Railways, the interest on which is guaranteed by the Chartered Company, have become favourite investments of late, and will continue popular as long as the country progresses. The yield is high and they are good investments. The Mines of the Rand are by many considered as investments, but they require careful choosing, for the lives of the outcrop mines are short, and the Deep Levels are not so rich or so cheaply worked. Those in the central portion of the Rand are the soundest, but purchasers must always take out a sinking-fund policy for the return of the capital invested, and even then there is considerable risk.

The Crown Colonies have all borrowed as freely as they dare, but their total indebtedness is not much more than 12 millions, of which Ceylon is responsible for nearly 4 millions. The yields vary slightly, but an investor can obtain nearly $3\frac{7}{8}$ all round and rest easy that he is in sound loans.

India Loans yield quite as much as the Colonial Stocks, and are, of course, equally safe. There are about £163,000,000 of Trustee India Stocks yielding $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{5}{8}$, and they must appreciate in value as we grow accustomed to cheap money.

Indian Railway Loans to the amount of 45 millions offer varied yields, according to the risks. Most of them are quite good, and it is a pity that they are not more in favour. Even the Debenture Stocks can be bought to pay nearly 4 per cent.

The newly-discovered industry of rubber in the Malay cannot be left out of any list of Colonial investments. Prices of rubber shares are to-day very low, and such good companies as Linggi, Anglo-Malay, Vallombrosa, Pataling, Consolidated Malay, Cicely Selangor, Highlands and Lowlands, are all cheap enough to yield well over 10 per cent. No rubber share should be purchased unless it yields this, but the best are certainly sound speculation at to-day's prices.

IN THE TEMPLE OF MAMMON

The City Editor will be pleased to answer all financial queries by return of post if correspondents enclose a stamped, addressed envelope. Such queries must be sent to the City Offices, 15, Copthall Avenue, E.C.

If last week was dull, the present week is still duller. The public appears to have lost all interest in speculation, and they decline either to buy or sell. Indeed the British public never sell; that is why they are such bad speculators, and is one reason why they invariably lose their money. They are always on the bull tack, and when anybody is a bull a fall is inevitable. We want gamblers on both bull and bear tacks. To-day we are apparently suffering from stale bull accounts in process of liquidation. When it will end I cannot say. A good many brokers do not expect any revival before the Coronation, as they think that the excitement in the West will stop any similar feeling in the East. But if we continue in our present state of lethargy prices will drop back to the old levels at which the year started. This will be an excellent thing for people with money to invest, for they will be able to get 5 per cent.—a chance such as seldom occurs.

Not only does the public refuse to buy shares on the Stock Exchange, but it also refuses to apply for shares in the new companies that are being brought out. I do not blame them, for the promoter to-day apparently considers that the majority of mankind are fools. We have been asked to subscribe for sheer downright gambles like the Malayan Tin, or impudent so-called Banks like the Credit Bank, against which the whole Press has warned the investor. I suspect this Mr. McCann will continue to run his "Bank" on the old lines, and will not be provided with money to discount "Guaranteed Commercial Bills"—whatever they may be. I am surprised that Mr. Parry, whose A B C Rubber Handbook has been so useful and so accurate, should have put his name upon the Sennah prospectus. He says in the second edition of his A B C that he calculates the profit on rubber at 1s. per lb. for 1913, yet in the prospectus he allows a valuation at 50 per cent. more. Mr. Parry as expert and Mr. Parry as promoter-vendor are evidently possessed of two brains that work independently. The Sennah land is not worth half the price asked, and as Rubber is an industrial proposition the valuation of the estate is the vital point in all Rubber prospectuses. The Bahia Blanca offer of debentures guaranteed by the Buenos Ayres and Pacific was a cheap offer, for the security is good enough.

Money is much easier, and now that the Budget is well under weigh, will become easier still. Indeed, except for the desire of the great Banks to keep a steady 3 per cent. rate, I see no reason why the Bank of England should not reduce the official rate to $2\frac{1}{2}$. But whether this happens or not, we shall surely get a low Bank Rate right through the summer.

Foreigners have been dead idle. Even the bulls of Perus could not twist the preference beyond 43 and keep them there. The French Banks are marking up Russians in readiness for the Railway Loan, and they extended their operations to London, where quite a reasonable market sprang up on Tuesday.

Home Rails are bought in small lots by little investors and sold in big blocks by stale bulls whose bankers decline to finance them any longer. Thus we get days of dulness punctuated with hours of brisk trade. Prices are a shade more attractive, and they will soon be at a level that will bring in a fresh lot of buyers. We must not forget that Home Rails grow fatter each day with dividend. This is an important matter to an investor. The end of the year is rapidly approaching, and in a few weeks we shall be able to calculate with great accuracy the dividends for the June half-year. Nearly all the lines show admirable increases, and, as working expenses have been cut down, an addition to last June dividend distributions seems certain. The present account looks as though it would be a dull one, but I should advise investors to watch the Home Rail Market and buy in upon flat days. I again repeat that Brums, Great Westerns, Lancashire and Yorkshires, and North Easterns are thoroughly sound gilt-edged stocks, and that they are undervalued in the market when all the dealers are short of shares.

Yankees.—The Trust Decision came to the hour, as Mr. Vanderlip declared it would. The big banks cabled over here large buying orders, and the London market went in and bid hard. The decision was a bear point, yet Yankees rose all round. This shows how futile it is for an outsider to gamble in Yankees, for the note is struck to suit the big finance houses, and they are quite cynical in their disregard of hard facts. But though the New York bankers will not allow any banging of markets, they are equally determined not to allow any wild speculation. They are determined to

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Smith, Elder & Co.'s List.

NEW 6s. FICTION.

The Last Galley: Impressions and Tales.
By A. CONAN DOYLE.

Brazenhead the Great. [2nd Impression.
By MAURICE HEWLETT.

The Major's Niece. [2nd Impression.
By GEORGE A. BIRMINGHAM.

A Budget of Tares.
By AUSTIN PHILIPS.

Large post 8vo., 7/6 net.

Ruskin: A Study in Personality.
By ARTHUR C. BENSON,
Author of "From a College Window," &c.

Daily Telegraph.—"A mellow, matured judgment broods over all his conclusions, and gives it vigour and authority. Mr. Benson is to be congratulated upon a meritorious service to Ruskin's illustrious memory."

In Two Vols. Large medium 8vo., 31/6 net.
With 3 Photogravures and 20 Pages of Half-tone Illustrations.

The Family and Heirs of Sir Francis Drake.
By Lady ELIOTT DRAKE.

Times.—"Francis Drake's association with the most pressing of the country's perils, the miraculous nature of his exploits done beyond the ken of man, the great wealth which he brought home, his final committal to the seas which he had sailed. Every word of the romantic story has its fascination in these delightful volumes."

Large crown 8vo., 5/- net.

Chalkstream and Moorland: Thoughts on Trout Fishing.
By HAROLD RUSSELL,
of the Inner Temple and Midland Circuit.

Scotsman.—"Already well known as a writer on trout-fishing, his book sums up in a series of lively chapters, written in a happy, personal style, his views and experiences on the pursuit of the gentle craft of the disciple of Izaak Walton . . . this volume will be read with pleasure by all who can enjoy a day's angling."

With 32 Pages of Illustrations. Small demy 8vo., 10/6 net.

An Outpost in Papua.
By the Rev. ARTHUR KENT CHIGNELL,
Priest of the New Guinea Mission.
With a Preface by the Archbishop of BRISBANE, Metropolitan of the Province of Queensland.

Scotsman.—"Missionaries are sometimes said to lack humour. Nobody can say that of the writer of this volume . . . and no one who reads the unconventional story of Mr. Chignell's persevering efforts will fail to admire both the man and his mission."

Church Times.—"Mr. Chignell's book on Papua is missionary literature of a refreshing kind. It is brimful of humour and humanity."

Four Portraits in Photogravure. Small demy 8vo., 10/6 net.

Memoirs and Memories.
By Mrs. C. W. EARLE,
Author of "Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden."

Ready May 25. Large post 8vo., 7/6 net.

Two Centuries of the English Novel.
By HAROLD WILLIAMS, M.A.,
Late Scholar of Christ's College, Cambridge.

London: SMITH, ELDER & CO., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.

THE PUBLISHERS ANNOUNCE THE PUBLICATION OF THE FIRST FIVE VOLUMES OF A NEW SERIES OF FRENCH CLASSICS, TO BE COMPLETED IN 100 VOLUMES, AND WHICH EMBRACES THE WHOLE PERIOD OF FRENCH LITERATURE

Tous les Chefs d'Œuvre de la Littérature Française

A Companion Series in French to "EVERYMAN."
1s. net each Volume in cloth.
Send for complete Descriptive Prospectus of the Series.

"In every respect an unusual and original book."—The Times.

JOHN MASEFIELD'S NEW NOVEL

THE STREET of TO-DAY

Crown 8vo., 6s.

"Gleams with dazzling, penetrative thought."—World.

THE NATIONAL POET OF POLAND

ADAM MICKIEWICZ

By MONICA M. GARDNER. Demy 8vo., 10s. 6d. net.

A study of the greatest figure in nineteenth century Polish literature based upon original Polish authorities. The main purpose of the book is to give English readers, for the first time, a complete picture of Mickiewicz himself as a patriot, poet, and mystic.

INTERNATIONAL LAW

By F. E. SMITH, K.C., M.P., & J. WYLIE, Barrister-at-Law.

A very much enlarged and revised edition of a standard work. Many chapters have been entirely re-written, and the various provisions of the Declaration of London are discussed.

Large demy 8vo., 7s. 6d. net.

SPAIN

By A. F. CALVERT. 2 Vols. Royal fcap. 4to., £2 2s. net, with 1,700 Illustrations.

"Concise, informative, and well arranged, Mr. Calvert's text forms an ideal accompaniment to the illustrations. There are few things worth knowing about picturesque Spain of which one would be ignorant after a perusal of this delightful book."
—Glasgow Herald.

PROBLEMS OF TO-DAY

A New Book in this Series by
G. LOWES DICKINSON.

RELIGION AND IMMORTALITY

By the same Author.

LETTERS FROM JOHN CHINAMAN
Cloth, 1s. net per Volume.

Send for Prospectuses, post-free on application to

J. M. DENT & SONS, Ltd.,
87, Aldine House, Bedford Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

place all the short-dated notes they can, and they must have peace and dulness to do this satisfactorily. I do not believe that we shall see any boom, but I feel almost certain we shall not get a slump.

RUBBER.—I should not be surprised to see a rise in this market. Prices have now fallen almost to a 15 per cent. level, and even if raw rubber falls to 4s. a lb. the leading rubber companies can make handsome profits at this price. The cost of production averages 1s. 6d. all over the Malay States, and with rubber at 4s. most of the well-managed companies should get an average price of 3s. 6d. This gives 2s. for the net profit. But we must not forget that rubber has been moderately high for some months, so that 2s. is an understatement. I do not suggest a purchase of any but the best companies, whose names you know as well as I do. However, it is worth repeating that Highlands, Linggi, Anglo-Malay, Consolidated Malay, Vallombrosa are free markets and good, sound companies; that Pataling, Selangor, Cicely, Golconda, Batu Cares, Lanadron, Kapar, Para, Rubana, and Straits Rubber are sound concerns in which there is usually a market, though the two latter shares are sometimes difficult to purchase. No one can go wrong here. But never be deluded into buying so-called "cheap shares," they may look cheap, but you will find them dear in the end.

OIL.—The promoters keep a steady market in Black Sea, Premier Oil and Pipe, Maikop Victory, and Maikop Pipes, but they wish to dispose of shares. I do not see much chance of any further rise in Oil shares. They have had a good spurt, and, were I a holder, I should take my profit.

KAFFIRS.—It would seem to me that the big houses do not intend to do anything to move this market, which must drop to a lower level. The Rand will be short of labour during the next few months, and we are warned that what labour there is will be dear; therefore I say, Keep out of Kaffirs.

RHODESIANS.—A move is to be made in Willoughbys, and Percy Marsden is sending out circulars. Marvellous reports are issued. But I am sick of this Rhodesian market, for any good news always brings in a host of sellers, and I should not dare to buy for fear the "shop" were selling. Mines are out of fashion.

MISCELLANEOUS.—'Bus stock has given us plenty to talk about, but the dealings are very select, and though the price moves backwards and forwards, the jobbers really control the whole business.

RAYMOND RADCLYFFE.

THE PREMIER OIL AND PIPE LINE COMPANY

SHAREHOLDERS in the Premier Oil and Pipe Line, Limited, are shortly to be afforded the opportunity of subscribing further share capital upon very advantageous terms. The new capital is required in connection with the acquisition of some valuable properties, by means of which the company will annex a large number of producing wells in addition to others which are now being sunk. The whole of the new acreage is over 7,000 acres, while rights of selection will be secured over a further 80,000 acres of virgin oil-bearing land, and, of course, possibilities of future benefits to be derived from the latter are very considerable. The Premier Oil and Pipe Line Company, with which the well-known City firm of Messrs. Van den Bergh is so prominently associated, in its representation on the Board, has achieved such marked success in its comparatively short history that the successful fruition of the scheme is undoubtedly assured. The Company will have an estimated earning basis of 25 per cent. when the new property is taken over, and will then be in an absolutely impregnable position. Already £200,000 is the figure mentioned as the annual profits from the existing production of seventeen wells, and this amount, of course, will be considerably increased in the future.

CORRESPONDENCE

FELO-DE-SE

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—May I say a few words with respect to your welcome article in the current issue of your paper?

We have but to do away with our hereditary principle of government, and we rid ourselves of that principle which distinguishes national from non-national rule. We shall, in fact, no longer have any original or constitutional basis of government, but merely a predatory ground of legislation.

For instance, our hereditary principle of government—that is to say, the House of Lords—must not be confused, as it appears to be, with personal forms of heredity; such forms being allied, more or less, to negative forms of heredity. There is such an hereditary principle of Government as an impersonal, national, or legal hereditary principle—a principle relative of positive and not merely negative forms of heredity.

It is upon such a principle that our House of Lords is based, for, apart from this supreme or entirely impersonal basis of government, all other hereditary principles must be varying principles—that is to say, idealistic and therefore empirical forms of heredity.

Thus our House of Lords has no political value in an empirical sense of heredity, but only in this supreme or national sense of heredity.

Surely, Sir, it will not be argued that our Constitution was based upon empirical or personal formulas of government? And if not, how on earth is the House of Lords, as a national or impersonal principle of heredity, to be justly termed a degenerate principle of government? If, as a national principle of heredity, it is to be termed "rotten," then the British Constitution, in this fundamental sense, has always been rotten.

No, Sir, the fact of the matter is we have degenerated in an individual and not in a national sense. The very fact of the attempt on the part of the Commons to smash the magnificent structure of the British Constitution (for this attack on the Lords is virtually an attack upon the Crown, since the destruction of the former cannot be made without the destruction of the latter) is proof enough, Once let an empirical or elected Second Chamber be substituted for a real, national, or hereditary Chamber, and the people of these islands (since the Government is supposed to act under orders from the people) will have completely forfeited the liberties obtained for them by that glorious script Magna Charta.

One great and noble Baron of the realm (the Earl of Wemyss, in a letter to the Times) has had the courage to make a public protest against such a suicidal act of policy premeditated through the voice of the people.

Is this grand old Peer, with but a handful of loyal comrades, to stand alone? Are there no true and faithful hearts to be found among the Commons of this benighted land who will answer to the rallying cry thus made for England's salvation?

If not, then, Sir, as you have surmised in your article, it would be more to the glory of England if the Lords, since they have got to go, died with some semblance of nobility.—Yours obediently,

H. C. D.

THE ORCHARD HOUSE AT CONCORD

To the Editor of THE ACADEMY

SIR,—It may interest some of the many English men and English women who as children enjoyed Louisa Alcott's "Little Women" and other stories to know that at Concord, Massachusetts, U.S.A., a movement has been started to keep intact the Orchard House in which the Alcott family lived for many years. Americans of late have shown a disposition to preserve such literary and artistic shrines as there are in their country. The birthplaces or former residences of Longfellow, Poe, Irving, Whittier, Whitman, Whistler, and others have been commemorated. This year, although financial conditions in the States are not altogether so propitious as at some times, the Woman's Club of the New England village, through its President, Mrs. Henry C. Rolfe, has been appealing to all lovers of Miss Alcott's books to contribute toward a fund of at least £1,600 to guarantee the preservation and maintenance of this ancient historic home. A portion of the fund has already been subscribed, mostly in small amounts, and is in the hands of Henry F. Smith, junr., Middlesex

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

New and Forthcoming Books.

A GUIDE TO THE BEST HISTORICAL NOVELS AND TALES. By J. NIELD. With large Supplement. Fourth Edition (6th Thousand), Revised (pp. xviii. + 522). Pott 4to., 8s. net.

THE DIARY OF DR. JOHN WILLIAM POLIDORI, 1816, RELATING TO BYRON, SHELLEY, &c. Edited and Elucidated by WILLIAM MICHAEL ROSSETTI. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

MRS. ALFRED TRENCH. By the Author of "The Views of Christopher." Fcap. 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

CANZONI OF EZRA POUND. Crown 8vo., 3s. 6d. net.

SONNETS. By "LUCILLA." Medium 8vo., 2s. 6d. net.

SYLVA. By THOMAS HOWITT MASON. Fcap. 8vo., 1s. 6d. net.

MIRAGE AND OTHER POEMS. By DOUGLAS AINSLIE. Small 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

POEMS. By DOLLIE RADFORD. Crown 8vo., 4s. 6d. net.

VIGO CABINET SERIES—New Volumes.

Royal 16mo., wrappers, 1s. net; cloth, 1s. 6d. net.

THE DREAM-MERCHANT. By BLANCHE EDWARDS.

CORONATION POEM AND LOVE SONGS. By K. H. D. CECIL.

THE GREEN FIELDS. By KENNETH HARE.

THE MASTER'S ADVENT. A Prologue. By EVERARD WYBALL.

ANGELS AND SYMBOLS. By A. V. MONTGOMERY.

SONGS OF THE BIRDS. By IDA NORMAN.

THE SONG OF A TRAMP AND OTHER POEMS. By CONSTANCE MORGAN.

CONFESSIONAL AND OTHER POEMS. By WILFRID THORLEY. With a Preface by MAURICE HEWLETT.

London: ELKIN MATHEWS, Vigo Street, W.

The most Delightful TRAVEL BOOKS of 1911.

NOW READY.

1. Letters from Finland.

By ROSALIND TRAVERS. 7s. 6d. net.

A series of bright, unconventional letters from all parts of the Duchy to half-a-dozen correspondents of divers types and tastes, but forming a consecutive narrative. They touch upon every phase of Finnish life and character. The volume is fully illustrated.

2. The Fair Dominion.

By R. E. VERNEDE. 7s. 6d. net.

Mr. Vernède has seen and describes delightfully many aspects of Canadian life unfamiliar to most visitors. The book will contain a number of reproductions in colour of beautiful Drawings by MR. CYRUS CUNEO.

3. Through the Alps to the Apennines.

By PAUL G. KONODY. 12s. 6d. net.

A charming account of a motor trip along the highways and byways of Northern and Central Italy. With a striking Cover Design by W. SIMPSON, and a great number of very interesting Illustrations.

KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH, TRÜBNER & CO., Ltd., Dryden House, Gerrard Street, London, W.

Messrs. Stanley Paul & Co.'s

NEW 6s. NOVELS (Just Ready)

THE ASCENT OF THE BOSTOCKS	Harold Storey
A WOMAN WITH A PURPOSE	Anna Chapin Ray
THE WHITE OWL	Kate Horn
IN FEAR OF A THRONE	R. Andom
THE BROKEN BUTTERFLY	Ralph Deakin
HONOUR'S FETTERS	May Wynne
TWO GIRLS AND A MANNIKIN	Wilkinson Sherren
SUFFRAGETTE SALLY	G. Colmore
WHEN WE ARE RICH	Ward Muir
A MAN WITH A PAST ...	A. St. John Adcock
THE LION'S SKIN	Rafael Sabatini
CANTACUTE TOWERS	Cecil Adair
WHERE TRUTH LIES (2nd Edition)	Jane Wardle
THE RIDING MASTER (4th Edition)	Dolf Wyllarde
FOR A WOMAN'S HONOUR ...	Christopher Wilson

POLICE AND CRIME IN INDIA

By Sir EDMUND COX, Bart

Illustrated. 12/6 net.

THE TIMES says:—"Sir Edmund Cox has written an interesting and timely book, and has thereby rendered useful service to the force with which he was so long connected and to the Government of India. The portions of the book which will probably attract most interest are those which deal with the amazing variety of Indian crime. Sir Edmund tells many remarkable stories, particularly with regard to the manufacture of false crime, which will probably astound readers to whom the ways of the East are unknown."

A WOMAN OF THE REVOLUTION

By FRANK HAMEL

Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 16/- net.

THE DAILY TELEGRAPH says:—"Madame Sarah Bernhardt, in a romantic drama dealing with the life and death of Théroigne de Mericourt, has carried the memory of her brave patriotism into the fierce glare of the footlights, and now the 'brown eloquent beauty' is to be accounted doubly fortunate in having fallen into the hands of a biographer so competent, so broad-minded, and so sympathetic as Mr. Frank Hamel, who has certainly done nothing better than this vigorous and picturesque study of a highly elusive character."

UNPRECEDENTED DEMAND for Mr. Charles E. Pearce's New Thrilling Work
THE AMAZING DUCHESS
(Second Large Edition at Press).
Being the Romantic History of that fascinating Court Beauty Elizabeth Chudleigh. Recognised by all as a REMARKABLE BOOK.
Over 250 columns of Press Notices have already appeared.
In 2 vols., demy 8vo. Illustrated. 24/- net the set.
 Illustrated Prospectus post-free on Application.

THE GAY KING By DOROTHY SENIOR

Demy 8vo. Illustrated. 12/6 net.

EVENING STANDARD:—"An eminently readable book, which gives a far truer portrait of Charles and a better idea of his Court and times than can be found in many a more pretentious attempt."

LYING LIPS WILLIAM LE QUEUX

New 2/- net Novels.

TROPICAL TALES DOLF WYLLARDE

Each in Cloth Gilt, 3-Coloured Wrapper.

STANLEY PAUL & CO., 31, Essex Street, London.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

Institution for Savings, Concord, Massachusetts. In view of the international interest in Miss Alcott's works the management of the Woman's Club has felt itself justified in issuing an international appeal for assistance.

The Orchard House at Concord is situated near the house owned by Ralph Waldo Emerson. It was first occupied by Bronson Alcott and his family in 1857. It continued to be their home for twenty-five years, when it was sold to the late William T. Harris, for many years United States Commissioner of Education. In it were written "Little Women" and several others of Miss Alcott's best-liked stories. On the woodwork in places may be seen little paintings and sketches by "Amy," Louisa's younger sister, whose death, shortly after her happy marriage to Ernest Nieriker, a young Swiss gentleman, was one of the tragic events of the author's middle age.

This house, about which cluster so many memories of one of the most helpful writers for the young, it is hoped not only to purchase but to maintain as a permanent Alcott memorial. A plain wooden dwelling, after the fashion common in New England, it is almost unchanged in its general features, but now so desolate as to move the commiseration or indignation of visitors who have loved Miss Alcott's stories and the characters she has created. Restored to its original state, it will charm the many people from overseas who include in their American itinerary the most famous of New England villages.

F. W. Coburn.

May 2nd, 1911,

BOOKS RECEIVED

FICTION

The Ship of Coral: a Tropical Romance. By Henry de Vere Stacpoole. Hutchinson and Co. 6s.

Across the Forest and Far Away. By Geraldine E. Hodgson. Illustrated by Gerald G. Hodgson. J. Baker and Son. 1s. 6d. net.

The Russian Wife. By Gertrude M. Foxe. George Allen and Co. 6s.

The Pieces of Silver. By Nora Vynne. Andrew Melrose. 6s.

The School of Love. By Priscilla Craven. T. Werner Laurie. 6s.

VERSE

Musical Echoes. By Marcus S. C. Rickards. J. Baker and Son. 4s. 6d. net.

Queen Herzeleid, or Sorrow-of-Heart. An Episode in the Boyhood of the Hero, Parzival. A Poetic Play in Three Acts. By Isabel Hearne. David Nutt. 2s. 6d. net.

Vistas of Time and Hope, and Other Poems. By A. D. Howell Smith. Published by the Author, 33, Larkhall Rise, S.W. 2s. net.

Mirage. Poems by Douglas Ainslie. Elkin Mathews. 3s. 6d. net.

The Dream-Merchant, and Other Poems. By Blanche Edwards. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Poems. By Emery Pottle. Methuen and Co. 5s. net.

The Agonists: A Trilogy of God and Man. By Maurice Hewlett. Macmillan and Co. 4s. 6d. net.

Characters in Outline and Other Poems. By James Roxburgh McClymont, M.A. Kegan Paul and Co. 3s. 6d. net.

The Castle by the Sea. By Arnold Safroni-Middleton. The Walter Scott Publishing Co. 1s. 6d.

Sylva. By Thomas Howitt Mason. Elkin Mathews. 1s. 6d. net.

The Song of a Tramp, and Other Poems. By Constance Morgan. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Confessional, and Other Poems. By Wilfrid Thorley. With a Preface by Maurice Hewlett. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Angels and Symbols. By A. V. Montgomery. Elkin Mathews. 1s. net.

Manin, and the Defence of Venice. By John Presland. Chatto and Windus. 5s. net.

The Florentines. A Play in Three Acts by Maurice V. Samuels Samuel French. 2s. net.

THEOLOGY

"This Church of England." A Course of Addresses by the Rev George A. Cobbold, B.A. With a Preface by the Rt. Rev Charles C. Grafton, S.T.D., Bishop of Fond du Lac, U.S.A Mowbray and Co. 1s. 6d. net.

The Church and the Children: a Handbook of the Graded Sunday-school and the Catechism. By the Rev. R. E. Johnston, M.A. Mowbray and Co. 1s. 6d. net.

The Six Students of St. Edmund Hall Expelled from the University of Oxford in 1768, with a Note on the Authorities for their Story. By S. L. Ollard, M.A. Illustrated. Mowbray and Co. 2s. net.

HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, AND MEMOIRS

The American War of Secession: 1863, Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. (Special Campaign Series, No. 13.) By Colonel P. H. Dalbiac. G. Allen and Co. 5s. net.

David Garrick et ses Amis Français. By F. A. Hedgcock. Illustrated. Hachette and Co. 5f.

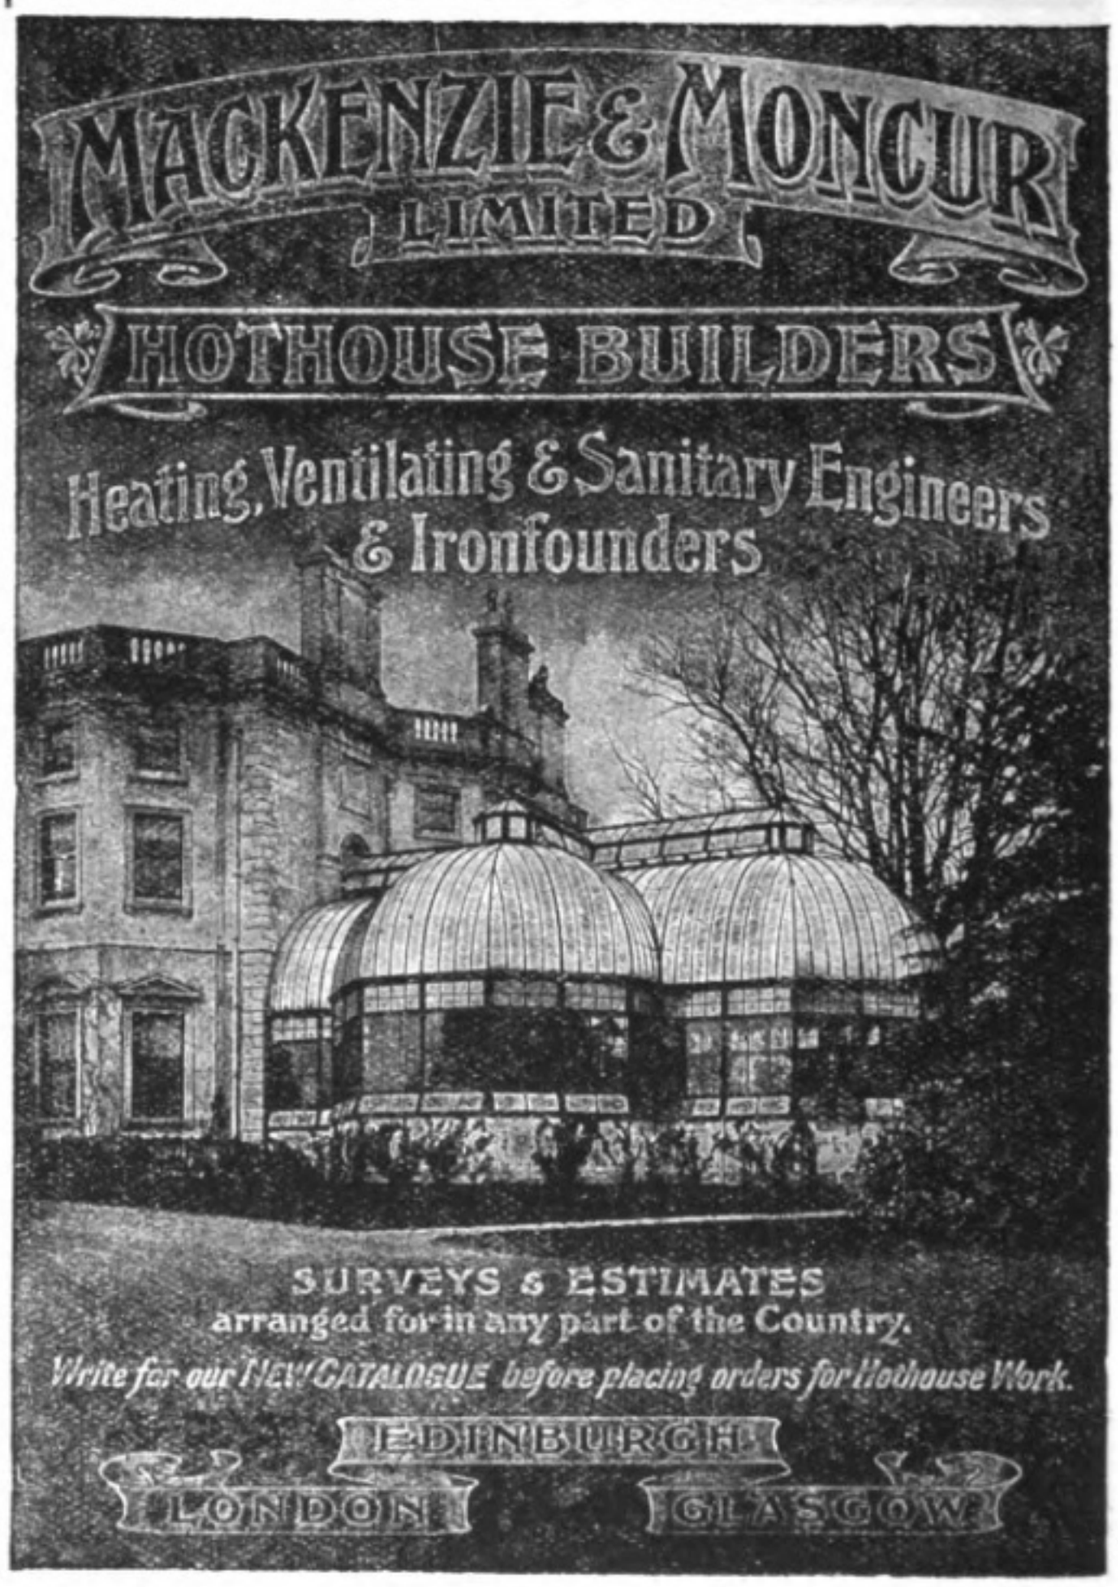
Thomas Hardy, Penseur et Artiste, Etudié dans les Romans du Wessex. By F. A. Hedgcock. Illustrated. Hachette and Co. 10f.

La Vie Politique dans les Deux Mondes. Edited by A. Viallate and M. Caudel. Fourth Year, October 1st, 1909—September 30th, 1910. Félix Alcan, Paris. 10f.

Central America and its Problems: An Account of a Journey from the Rio Grande to Panama, with Introductory Chapters on Mexico and her Relations to her Neighbours. By Frederick Palmer, F.R.G.S. Illustrated. T. Werner Laurie. 10s. 6d. net.

MISCELLANEOUS

The Superstition called Socialism. By G. W. de Tunzelmann, B.Sc. George Allen and Co. 5s. net.



Water-Colour. By Neville Lytton. Illustrated. Duckworth and Co. 2s. 6d. net.

Facsimile of the King's Letter to the Nation on his Majesty's Accession to the Throne. With Emblematic Border designed by Sir Lawrence Alma-Tadema, O.M., R.A. Raphael Tuck and Sons. 1s. to £3 3s.

Letters from Finland, August, 1908—March, 1909. By Rosalind Travers. Illustrated. Kegan Paul and Co. 7s. 6d. net.

PERIODICALS

La Grande Revue; Revue Critique; M.A.B.; The Bodleian; Cambridge University Reporter; United Empire; Manchester Quarterly; Century Magazine; Bookseller; Wednesday Review; Publishers' Circular; Revue Bleue; Southern Sphere; University Correspondent; Constitution Papers.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

SHIPPING.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

OCEAN AND RAIL SERVICES TO AND . . THROUGH CANADA. . .

TRANSATLANTIC—Fast and luxurious "Empress" Steamers to Canada. Only Four days' open sea. TRANSCANADA—Finest Trains in the World, running through the world's grandest scenery. Direct connection with every part of Canada. Fastest route to Western States. TRANSPACIFIC—Fast Route to Japan and China. All-British Route to Australia and New Zealand by Canadian-Australian Mail Service vid Vancouver.

For further particulars, apply

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY,

62-65, Charing Cross, S.W.; 67-68, King William St., LONDON, E.C. 24, James Street, Liverpool. 120, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow. 41, Victoria Street, Belfast. 18, St. Augustine's Parade, Bristol.

UNION-CASTLE LINE ROYAL MAIL SERVICE

TO

SOUTH and EAST AFRICA.

WEEKLY SAILINGS.

MONTHLY DIRECT SERVICE TO EAST AFRICA.

Viâ the SUEZ CANAL.

Calling at MARSEILLES and NAPLES.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO THE CONTINENT.

(Hamburg and Antwerp.)

Reduced fares for Tourists during Spring and Summer, to MADEIRA, LAS PALMAS and TENERIFFE.

For further information apply to:—

DONALD CURRIE & CO., MANAGERS, LONDON AND SOUTHAMPTON.

Branch Offices of the Company at Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester and Glasgow.

CUNARD LINE PLEASURE CRUISES

LIVERPOOL

to the

MEDITERRANEAN & ADRIATIC

by the

"SAXONIA" AND "CARPATHIA"

. . . Ports of Call . . .

CADIZ, TANGIER, GIBRALTAR, ALGIERS, MALTA, SYRACUSE, ALEXANDRIA, ATHENS, CORFU, TRIESTE, FIUME, PALERMO, NAPLES.

• • •

For full particulars apply—

THE CUNARD S.S. CO., Ltd., LIVERPOOL.

SOMETHING NEW IN COLLARS (Latest Invention)

For LADIES, GENTLEMEN & BOYS,

The EVERCLEAN 'LINON' COLLAR

Is the Ideal Collar—always smart, always white, cannot be distinguished from linen. Others limp and fray, others need be washed. Everclean "Linon," when soiled, can be wiped white as new with a damp cloth. No rubber. Cannot be distinguished from ordinary Linen Collars. Others wear out, but four Everclean Collars will last a year.

Great saving in laundry bills. Great comfort in wear.

SPECIAL TRIAL OFFER.

2 Sample Everclean "Linon" Collars 2/6
6 Everclean "Linon" Collars 6/-
Sample set of Collar, Front, and pair of Cuffs with Gold-cased Links 5/-

Order at once. All shapes and sizes can be had.

THE BELL PATENT SUPPLY CO., Ld., 147, Holborn Bars, London, E.C.

"THE BOOK MONTHLY."

The May "Book Monthly," which is now ready, Sixpence net, contains an interview with Mrs. Gertrude Atherton, the well-known novelist. It also has various other articles of a literary interest, and all the news about the new books. Its illustrations are an engaging feature as usual, and, in fine, the May "Book Monthly" is worth getting. The publishers are Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Stationers' Hall Court, London, who will send a specimen copy free on application.

P & O Passenger Services.

EGYPT, INDIA, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA, JAPAN, AUSTRALASIA, and all Eastern Ports

(Carrying Mails under Contract with H.M. Government.)

Frequent and Regular Sailings from and to LONDON, MARSEILLES & BRINDISI.

P & O Pleasure Cruises

Throughout the Year, according to Season.

AROUND THE COASTS OF EUROPE, NORWAY and the MEDITERRANEAN.

Programme on Application.

For Passage, Freight and all information apply—

PENINSULAR & ORIENTAL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY,

122 Leadenhall Street, E.C., or Northumberland Avenue, W.C., LONDON.

P & O Round the World Tours

R.M.S.P.

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.

(Royal Charter dated 1839.)

Fortnightly Sailings from Southampton to—

ARGENTINA & BRAZIL

via SPAIN & PORTUGAL.

WEST INDIES, BRITISH GUIANA, SPANISH MAIN, CENTRAL AMERICA, NEW YORK.

From LONDON to—

MOROCCO & CANARY ISLANDS,

EGYPT, CEYLON, STRAITS, CHINA & JAPAN.

(By Shire Line.)

For further particulars apply to

THE ROYAL MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY

18, Moorgate Street, E.C., & 32, Cockspur Street, S.W.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

BLACKWOODS' NEW BOOKS.

AN EASTERN MISCELLANY. By the Earl of Ronaldshay, M.P., Author of "On the Outskirts of Empire in Asia," "Sport and Politics Under an Eastern Sky," "A Wandering Student in the Far East." 10s. 6d. net.

"Lord Ronaldshay adds to an already high reputation by this 'Eastern Miscellany.'"—Pal Mall Gazette.

"Lord Ronaldshay's volumes have all been good reading. His latest work is a striking testimony to the variety of his journeys and his interests. The most valuable chapter in the book is undoubtedly that on 'India and Imperial Reciprocity.' It tells the whole story in a nutshell, and is evidently the result of careful research."—The Times.

THE TREASURY OF ANCIENT EGYPT. Chapters on Ancient Egyptian History and Archæology. By Arthur P. Weigall, Inspector-General of Upper Egypt Department of Antiquities; Author of "Travels in the Upper Egyptian Desert," "The Life and Times of Akhnaton, Pharaoh of Egypt," "A Guide to the Antiquities of Upper Egypt." With Illustrations, 7s. 6d. net.

". . . This delightful exposition; . . . always interesting and readable in no common degree."—Scotsman.

"Mr. Weigall is a fascinating writer on a fascinating subject."—Liverpool Courier.

"Full of charm and interest."—Manchester Courier.

LETTERS FROM INDIA. By Lady Wilson. 7s. 6d. net.

A charming volume of letters by a lady long resident in India, whose official position gave her special opportunities of observing all the facets of life there. Lady Wilson is the wife of an eminent civilian, and is herself the daughter of the celebrated Dr. Norman Macleod.

A HOLIDAY IN SOUTH AFRICA. By the Right Hon. Sir H. Mortimer Durand, G.C.M.G., K.C.S.I., K.C.I.E. 6s. net.

"Messrs. Blackwood have the reputation of discovering new and gifted authors."

BLACKWOOD'S NEW NOVELS. 6s.

PETER'S PROGRESS. By Christopher Heath.

"Gives us very successfully the world of military Anglo-India."—The Times.

"Written in a vivacious and breezy style, this novel should find many readers."—The Globe.

"One of the most delightful stories it has been our pleasure to read for a long time."—Belfast News Letter.

THE SINISTER NOTE. By A. Whisper, Author of "Black Mark," "King and Captive."

"A story which will be read with avidity by all into whose hands it may fall."—The Daily Telegraph.

"Cleverly constructed and admirably written."—Standard.

"Replete with sunlight, air, and fragrance; artistic, and readable."—Dundee Advertiser.

"Full of romantic lore, clever, and eminently readable."—Daily Chronicle.

KAPAK. By Alexander Crawford.

"A full, well-written story, claiming a high place in the literature of realistic extravaganza."—Times.

THE GENERAL PLAN. By Edmund Candler, Author of "The Mantle of the East."

"Since Kipling has abandoned Indian stories no one has written any half so good as these Mr. Candler gives us."—Birmingham Post.

"'The General Plan' is one of those books that compel one to return to them again and again; it is a work of surpassing merit."—Dundee Courier.

THE GREEN WAVE OF DESTINY. By Philippa Bridges, Author of "An Incident by the Way," in "Blackwood's."

"An able and interesting novel."—Scotsman.

"Subtly conceived and cleverly constructed, the tale is strong and impressive."—Glasgow Herald.

"A singular story of more than ordinary interest."—Manchester Courier.

DOLORES. By I. Compton-Burnett.

"An unusually original novel."—Times.

"Has style, atmosphere, and distinction. 'Dolores' is literature."—Daily Mail.

"The conversation is brilliantly handled."—Scotsman.

"Possessed of an exquisite skill in dialogue."—Globe.

OH! FOR AN ANGEL. By Marguerite Curtis, Author of "The Bias" and "Marcia—A Transcript from Life."

"This story has many fine qualities. It is written with grace and enthusiasm . . . the characters are charmingly drawn."—Liverpool Courier.

THE LORD DOLLAR. (Don Dinero.) By Harper Curtis.

"A skilfully told story."—Times.

"Mr. Curtis may be congratulated upon having produced a very readable story indeed."—Financial Times.

"The reader is thrilled at every turn, and the final scene is quite tremendous."

"'The Lord Dollar' is a book that should on no account be missed."—Western Mail.

THE PRICE OF EMPIRE. By E. Hobart-Hampden.

"A novel of good literary quality."—Times.

"A well-told, exciting narrative."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"A novel of distinction and interest."—Newcastle Chronicle.

"Well written, and most readable from first to last."—Manchester Courier.

RUTH WERDRESS. FATHER O'HARALAN, AND SOME NEW CHRISTIANS. An Anglo-Irish Tale. By John Zachaary Fitzgerald.

"There is a great deal of good reading in the book, and much praise is due."—Times.

"Clever, ingenious and persuasive."—Scotsman.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, Edinburgh & London.

OUR SONS: Second Edition.

Their Start in Life.

With Two Articles on

Professions & Occupations for Women.

In paper cover, 1s. 2½d., by post; cloth, 2s. 6d., by post 2s. 9d.

"They contain a great deal of sound and practical advice conveyed with sense and knowledge."—Pall Mall Gazette.

"The book will give a good bird's eye view to the anxious parent."—Daily News.

"Parents will appreciate the advice given."—Nottingham Guardian.

"This little volume . . . will be welcomed by parents who are faced with the serious problem of choosing professions for their children. . . . In every case finance has been carefully considered, and estimates are made of the probable cost of qualifying for any given position, as well as of the emoluments likely to be derived from it when it is acquired."—Oxford Chronicle.

"These articles . . . are the most practical and highly condensed things of their kind that have come under our notice for a long time. They may be recommended with confidence."—Country Life.

"Parents intending their sons for a professional career may read the book with interest and profit, and those whose daughters have an ambition beyond domesticity will find much useful information in the articles devoted to professions and occupations for women."—Glasgow Herald.

"The book explains how the various professions may be entered, and gives some hints as to the prospects offered by each. The articles are marked by strong common sense."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"THE GUARDIAN" OFFICE,
29, King Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.

THE ACADEMY

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF LITERATURE SCIENCE AND ART

PRICE THREEPENCE

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION:

Inland, 15s. post free; Foreign & Colonial, 17s. 6d. post free

This may be sent to any Newsagent, or to the Publisher of THE ACADEMY, 93 & 94, Long Acre, W.C.

To .....

.....

.....

Please send me THE ACADEMY for the next .....

months. I enclose remittance value .....

Name .....

Description .....

Address .....

.....

Printed and Published for the Proprietor by Odhams Ltd., 25, Floral Street, Covent Garden, and 93-94, Long Acre, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

SUPPLEMENT TO "THE ACADEMY," MAY 20, 19

Empire Supplement

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE

MAY 20, 1911

JOHN BULL'S LETHARGY

By Sir William Bull

The chief mental vice of our generation is apathy. It is hard to judge whether it is the apathy of satiety—whether we are so saturated with news, "sensations," tonics of scientific discovery, discussions on art and its developments, political instruction, new theories of ethics, and popular education that we do not respond suitably to further stimulus—or whether it is apathy of indifference, the consequence of an indifference that has become habitual. There is very little excitement about the Parliament Bill, and such excitement as there is is most feeble among the masses. Yet the Parliament Bill effectively deprives the people of this country of their liberties, and brings them under a system of Cabinet tyranny. It has a worse effect, for, while giving the Cabinet the power of a tyrant, it makes this tyrant the tool of a minority of the electorate, whose strength lies in the survival of sedition in Ireland. To-day the power of the British people is suspended in the interest of Mr. Redmond; to-morrow it may be suspended in the interest of Mr. Keir Hardie. But there is no excitement.

For bread and freedom we depend upon the Navy. Probably three-quarters of the electors do not clearly understand whether or no the Government still adheres to and is prepared to maintain the Two-Power Standard. But there is no excitement. Probably three-quarters of the electors do not know whether we should be able to fight the Triple Alliance two years hence with a sure prospect of success. But there is no excitement. Probably the great majority of the electors could not give a considered opinion on the point whether, if it be admitted that our naval preparations are not now adequate to meet contingencies in the near future, they could be made so in time; and again there is no excitement. We have been told often and often that the supreme need of this country is cheap corn; there are cogent reasons for believing that the proposed reciprocity agreement between the United States and Canada will raise the price of bread to the British consumer much above the imaginary figure which terrifies Cobdenites when they contemplate a system of Imperial preference; and there is no excitement.

Perhaps it is well that John Bull should be phlegmatic. But then he, like others, in medio tutissimus ibit—good qualities become bad if they are carried to extremes. And there is one matter of an eminent importance which it is wholly mischievous to treat with indolent disregard. It is the problem of Imperial consolidation. That is a life or death problem for John Bull.

When our fathers chose industrial development à outrance, letting the devil take agriculture, they made us a dependent nation. We are dependent upon markets abroad for the sale of our products, and if we cannot sell our products we cannot feed our people. Markets outside the Empire are being steadily closed to us. Japan has supplied the latest example of the process. We must secure our markets within the Empire as best we may, and opportunities are slipping from us. Moreover, if this country becomes an isolated island Power, faced by walled-in markets, the decay of its prosperity and the decrease of its population will be inevitable. In its decline the burden of a predominant Navy would become too great for it. It would cease to be able to protect its independence, and would either exist as a small Power because the balance of rival forces in Europe gave it an unstable lease of that status, or would be absorbed.

Further, when our fathers, departing from their ancestral tradition, staked the nation's future on industrialism, they made the additional mistake of accepting the laissez-faire principle. To the former error we owe the crowding of our people into the towns; to the latter, the unregulated slum. And we now have the familiar problem of physical degeneracy among the poorer classes. It is also the problem of recruiting for the British Army. We have been exporting much of the best of our thews and sinews for half a century and more. If we could not call to our aid that proportion of it which has vitalised the Dominions overseas, could we withstand a strong military power in Persia, in India, in any part of the world? Could we, without that aid, endure the strain of a prolonged campaign against a powerful enemy even if we consented now to make the sacrifice involved in accepting Universal Service?

A man need not be far advanced in age to remember the three phases through which British public opinion has passed in relation to the Colonies. There was the pre-Imperial phase. The current belief was that the Colonies—homes of our surplus population and convenient fields for the fruitful use of our surplus capital—would mature to readiness for independence; and there was only a slack desire that history should be otherwise written. When an Australian contingent volunteered for service in the Soudan a quarter of a century ago that phase grew obsolete; a new light influenced opinion at home. We were ready for the instruction of Kipling, and we passed to the first Imperial phase, which reached its fullest development in the years of the South African War. There was a widespread, enthusiastic belief that the Empire should be and could be an organic whole as an extension of the United Kingdom. Realisation of the difficulties of the case and study of them in a calmer mood showed that the imperial élan could not and should not denationalise growing nations which geographical, social, industrial and ethnical circumstances were moulding into separate development. The prose of Mr. Jebb succeeded the lyrics of Kipling, and the accepted plan for consolidation became a scheme of federation for kindred nations in which Britain is contemplated rather as senior than as primus inter pares.

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

How is such a scheme to be made operative? Of the two bonds which preserve unity sentiment rests upon community of ideals and traditions, kinship, and the living desire to maintain the historic relation; interest should provide a connection with innumerable ramifications, well trained and fostered, reaching interdependently even to the smallest communities in the Empire. The disruptive force is the compulsion which rightly urges each State to meet the contingencies of its history in its own national spirit and in accordance with its predominant interests. But the disruptive force can be annulled by a wise policy of all for each and each for all. The immunity from attack, the power in upholding a just claim, the strength in diplomacy, which each State of the Empire would derive from the solidarity of the whole would be a willingly accepted means of combining distinct nationality with federal union; and any sacrifice of the separate interests of one member of the federation would be amply compensated by the right of using the power of the united members for the promotion of all interests consistent with solidarity. The bond that unites the States must be flexible and adaptable, for in a community of nations there are constant changes of balance; and in these early stages of consolidation such changes will be rapid and of strong momentum. To-day the hegemony belongs justly to the old realm; the Navy is at once the guard and the guarantee of the independence and integrity of the Empire; and the upkeep of the Navy has hitherto fallen almost wholly to the share of the mother country. The working Army too has stood, for the main part, to her charge, both for men and money. Therefore, the supremacy of the Parliament of these islands has been natural and just. But these conditions are changing. The Dominions are taking up the burden of defence, and sooner or later they must have a co-ordinate, not a subordinate, power of counsel and control as to the use of the forces which they supply and support.

The States must have a foreign policy in common; they must have mutual trade bonds which have acquired the ease of use and familiarity in their bearing. To secure the adjustment and unity which these requirements involve there is no means but a slow growth of solidarity. No cut-and-dried formula of unity will endure the strain or meet the conditions. But it is a truism that there are favourable and unfavourable conditions of growth, and we all know that the bending of the twig gives the direction of the branch. The success or failure of the unifying process will probably result from action taken in its initial stages; and the present is the time of the early growth.

It would be admirable if this subject could be kept clear of party conflict. But that desideratum is beyond attainment, from no fault of the Unionist party. It is the bane of the present Government that the principles of an obsolete Liberalism constrain them to cut into both the bonds—sentiment and interest—which ought to keep the Empire united. The silly insolence of "banging and bolting and barring" the door against Preference is a blow to the good will of the Dominions and a blow to commercial solidarity. The blow is dealt for the sake of a dead and dry generalisation from conditions that have disappeared off the face of the earth—the Cobdenite formula, which is without relation to the governing facts in the business world of our day. The Liberal Government is bound by its economic superstition to sacrifice the living to the dead.

The Imperial Conference is close upon us. At that Conference we can either continue the work of consolidation sagaciously and effectively, or we can once more let opportunities slip past us and become irrevocable, jeopardising the cause of Imperial Union with all that it means for us. The progress of unity cannot be forced, but if it is aided on the side of the mother country by statesmen worthy of the task those who are in their early years among us need not despair of seeing in Westminster Hall—the cradle of our great tradition of rule by representatives—a truly Imperial Parliament. That the Government should undergo a change of heart and show a regenerate spirit in this matter is beyond the bounds of reasonable hope; they are the hierophants in the musty temple of Free Trade, declaring that the fetters on our own commerce are the insignia of its glorious freedom, and repulsing our kinsmen from the door.

What is needed is that the nation should rouse itself to insist that its rulers should accept the offer of assured security and prosperity for the Britain of the future, and preserve the Cobdenite fane solely as a museum of antiquities. It would be easy to name many suitable curators. But there is no excitement among the public. John Bull is happy and confident in his apathy, and the Cobdenite superstition prevails. Some day John will be startled into recognition of what it has cost him, and the anxious hope of every Imperialist is that the day may not come too late.

THE FESTIVAL OF EMPIRE

With the opening of the "Festival of Empire" on May 12th it may safely be said that the Crystal Palace takes a new lease of life. There may be two opinions upon the propriety of disturbing the beautiful grounds, of "desecrating" them, some might say, by the erection of stiff buildings and by the cutting of a ceinture railway, but there can be no question of the lively and lasting interest of the new venture. To be present on the opening day was to realise how fine a thing is true Imperialism—devotion to King and Queen and country. Patiently the crowd inside the palace awaited the arrival of their Majesties; patiently the crowd outside waited in the sunshine until the concert should be over; and then, when the Royal party had passed and the cheers had subsided, the real business of the day might be said to have begun. That business was, of course, to explore the Dominions from end to end, and to observe, by the wondrous array of curiously clad gentlemen and ladies who flashed and glinted and glowed in the strong light, how we have developed in manners and attire since the gay old times when our predecessors dwelt in caves, or went on pilgrimages, or chopped off offending heads incontinently, or wore their ladye's glove on their helms, or fought armadas, or did other of the gallant and glorious things which we admire—but cannot do—to-day.

With the magic pass we travelled round the comfortable little electric "All-Red Route" through half a world of wonders. India, Canada, New Zealand, South Africa—at any of these and other stations the explorer may alight, to find himself inspecting some industry, manufacture, or peculiarity of the country associated with the name of his stopping-place. The views on the route itself are very cleverly conceived and constructed, especially those which have to do with the sea—the famous harbours and ports, for example. The Indian Jungle, with various wild-looking fauna assembled at the most convenient view-point, is perhaps rather too palpably "constructed" for the benefit of the ignorant onlooker; but the natives of the vales and dells over which the train passes are very obviously genuine—also very obviously amused at the attention they attract.

Needless to say, at such an Exhibition as this there are any number of "side-shows" for those who tire of the charms of acquiring knowledge. "Joy-wheels," mountain railways, and other hilarious pleasures familiar to Londoners of late years through the medium of Earl's Court or Shepherd's Bush are here abounding, and will doubtless be patronised freely during the course of the summer, if the record attendances are followed up. The best thing to do on Friday, however, was to take a seat near one of the bands in the open-air and to watch the pageant of the crowd. Almost every third or fourth person seemed to have stepped from some volume of old-time fashion-plates. Two jesters of the Middle Ages, equipped with cap and bells and motley all complete, hob-nobbed with two dames of the Early Victorian era: sundry gaolers who scowled fiercely when they remembered their austere office, various tormentors who tormented not, were hail-fellow-well-met with ladies of the ultra-modern school. Damsels wearing the most atrocious crinolines walked—or waddled—cheek-by-jowl with devotees of the "hobble" skirt, and the effect was certainly most instructive and illuminating. Knights and scriveners, clowns and peasants, Elizabethans and Carolians, all were represented, and probably had we inquired we might have discovered King Alfred in some doleful corner dreaming over his burned cakes. Twilight fell: the vivid golden flames from the summits of various domes and towers mingled with the softer flames of sunset, and still the endless pageant passed by, still the laughter of happy voices ascended to the deepening skies. And after twilight came the fireworks, for the joy of those who must ever be watching for eye-sensations and thrills.

Digitized by Google Original from PENN STATE

And the good of it all? Well, the "Festival of Empire" is more than a mere Exhibition, although to dub it "educational" is to call up very undesirable, dry, and dusty visions. To learn while being entertained is the ideal condition of absorbing knowledge: such a condition is fulfilled by the festival now in progress. Many columns would be needed to describe all that is to be seen even inside the Palace of Crystal; the only satisfactory solution of the difficulty lies in an actual visit and tour of the transformed grounds. Many Londoners, we cannot doubt, will realise as never before how splendid is the Empire of which they and their city form a central part.

AUSTRALASIAN LITERATURE

We are your loyal daughters
  From 'neath the Southern Cross
Swift as the following billows
  Strong as the albatross,
Owning one Throne, one Empire,
  Sounding true friendship's ring,
Bending the knee in loyal Devotion to the King.

If we are supposed to wait for a national growth and national traditions upon which to base a country's literature, then that of Australia is a forward and precocious growth. For nearly half a century after the principal classics were produced under the Southern Cross, critics were wont to say that Australia possessed no literature, that the Australian prose-writers and poets were without character or distinction, without any special qualities which should make them Australian and not merely localised English writers.

And until quite recently this charge was not an unjust one. The birth-history of Australia is not an inspiring theme. The infant struggles were uninteresting. And so for three-fourths of a century the literature of the Colonies consisted mainly of official reports, domestic and travel narratives, and controversial correspondence in which the diatribes of W. C. Wentworth, Dr. J. Dunmore Lang, and Robert Lowe (Viscount Sherbrooke) loomed large. Wentworth and Lang turned out a mass of material, chiefly connected with the struggles for the cessation of transportation and for representative government. But it was strictly utilitarian, and its popularity belonged to the day only.

The echoes of these diatribes were still ringing throughout the Mother Colony when the first hapless generation of Australian writers was born. They were a strange triumvirate—two poets and a novelist—who for a generation held the stage and gave to Australia the first fruits of its literary genius. It was a barren field for early singers. They all struggled. They all died young and poor, leaving their bones in a desert to show the way to following bards.

What a remarkable trio! One of them, the melancholy, shy, but sweet-tongued Henry Clarence Kendall, was in the truest sense an Australian. The son and the grandson of colonists, he had known nothing but the hearts and hearths of the Great Pacific. And yet he did not know Australia in its manliness and robustness. He knew squalor and poverty young, but young also he knew James Lionel Michael, a poetic solicitor of high culture; and the muse of the introspective, studious lad was saved and flourished. Kendall was passionately fond of Australian Nature, and also of the fragments of prose and verse that then stood for Australian literature. He was an acquaintance of the first poet of the South, C. H. Harpur (author of "The Creek of the Four Graves"), and he was to some extent a protégé of the great Australian Henry Parkes, then struggling in the editorship of a Sydney newspaper. Kendall was essentially a dreamer, a lover of that Nature which he painted so well:—

It seems to me, my friend, and this wild thought
  Of all wild thoughts doth chiefly make me bleed,
That in those hills and valleys, wonder-fraught,
  I loved and lost a noble creed.
For now my soul goes drifting back again.
  Aye, drifting, drifting like the silent snow:
While scattered sheddings in a fall of rain
  Revive the dear lost Long Ago.

Kendall was twenty-one when he published his first poems in 1862. He had no sympathy with the robust joys and sports of life, and he died, at forty-one, a hopeless alcoholic.

By the side of Kendall sang Adam Lindsay Gordon, an Englishman by birth. But how different his muse! Gordon was a wild youth. It was his youthful recklessness that made him an Australian. He looked life in the eyes: played and gambled: rode hard: lived fast. And he wrote as he lived: of sport, manliness, horses, and deeds. In this, indeed, he was the prophet of Australia, setting the keynote for the Australian literature of to-day. Gordon is epitomised in his verse:—

Life is mostly froth and bubble.
  Two things stand like stone—
Kindness in another's trouble,
  Courage in your own.

Yet Gordon himself failed of the latter. The world was unkind to genius in those days. Poverty dogged also the footsteps of the gay Gordon. The man who wrote this verse and won three steeplechases in one day, committed suicide at the age of thirty-seven, afraid of debt.

The third of the trio was Marcus Clarke, who came early to Australia, and soon left the prose classic of the generation, "The Term of His Natural Life." He made much money in fourteen years of writing, but was hopelessly improvident, and died poor at thirty-six.

But even with this work achieved, there was still substantial ground for saying that Australia had no literature of her own. If there was something freer, more rollicking,

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

more racy in the verse of Gordon than in that of contemporary English bards, it was no more than the expression of the freer and less conventional life he led, or the reflection of the freer and less conventional public for whom he wrote.

There was little in the diction or the outlook of Gordon, Kendall, and Clarke to distinguish them from contemporary English writers. Clarke led up naturally to a later batch of novelists of no small distinction, but of no particular individuality. "Rolf Boldrewood" (T. A. Browne) put his experience as a police magistrate to account, and became famous in London in 1888 for the romance "Robbery under Arms," which his own countrymen had almost ignored; he added later "The Miner's Right" and "A Sydney Side Saxon." Ada Cambridge, Mrs. Campbell Praed, Mary Gaunt, Hume Nisbet, Guy Boothby, and, perhaps we may add, Louis Becke, have all told their tale in English with English mannerisms. They belong to the pre-Bulletin school.

That school and the present school, which is coming to be recognised as Australian, have setting and theme in common. It is in character and expression that we see the distinctly Australian literature forming—bold, rapid, reckless, unorthodox, frequently irreverent. There is probably no other case on record in which a single journal has exercised the influence of the Sydney Bulletin in forming, through its reading, the character of a people. Politically the Bulletin has stood for a form of nationalism which was at first far in advance of the day; but its political creed included the encouragement of Australian talent in every form, and so the new Australian school of literature grew up under its ægis.

The writers who have been named worked chiefly after English models and forms. Their output was simply a localised contribution to the English literature of the day. In between the two schools, and forming a sort of connecting link, we find Brunton Stephens. Though he, too, was a Scot by birth, and came to Australia late in life, he ranks as much more an Australian than either Gordon or Clarke. That he was a contemporary of these two is often overlooked, inasmuch as he lived into another era, and did much of his best work when the new Australian literature had dawned. In fact, the author of "Convict Once" and Essex Evans, whose fine, emotional poem, "The Repentance of Magdalene Despar," appeared in 1891, combine most pleasantly the demands of English poetry and the special characteristics of Australia.

It is rather strange to find the Australian school set up by the Bulletin adopting the note struck by Adam Lindsay Gordon. Farrell, Daley, A. B. Paterson, Dyson, and Henry Lawson all worship at the shrine of the reckless young Englishman—all singing the same songs of horses and men, and honesty, and the bush, and most of them subject to the recurring pessimism which persists in what we know as Australian verse. The essentially Australian characteristics are the diction, the originality, the irresponsibility of sequence, the cynicism, the occasional blasphemy, and the repeated lapses into morbid melancholy, In the prose there is incongruity of expression, a tendency to abruptness, exaggeration for the sake of humour, and much flippancy. There is the impress of the Bulletin over the whole of the literature of the present day, both verse and prose, because the Bulletin, alone of the great Australian journals, has given any encouragement to the Australian writer.

The great lack of the island continent from the literary point of view is the lack of an indigenous history. There was little or no legend rooted in the soil when the whites arrived. The narrative of 150 years of white occupation contains so little romance, so little of heroics, and wars and jehads, that the writer and the poet sigh vainly for inspiration, and are driven to the bush, and the backblocks, and the parched plains to describe, and caricature, and lampoon, and paint sympathetically the men and women who live "away back." The convict days gave inspiration to Clarke and Brunton Stephens, but they were not Australians. The theme is not so pleasant for the native-born. The material for treatment is not particularly abundant, and it is not varied or surpassingly attractive. It is in treatment that the Australian poet and prose-writers excel. It is their treatment of commonplace subjects that has built up a literature which is not to be despised for so young a people.

If the arguments which have been used to extenuate the former literary barrenness of Australia have any weight at all, there is no excuse whatever for New Zealand, Here we have a country bathed in historical incident, soaked in tradition, exuding romance—a perfect elysium for the imaginative. It was peopled by a superior class. Education is general and good. What of its literature, then? Alas!

The bibliography of New Zealand is indeed a very large one—larger than of any other country of like importance. A great deal of the writing, too, is the work of New Zealanders, but so much of it is political, controversial, official, and quasi-scientific, that the real literary work is limited and unimportant.

Somehow the beauties of the country have failed to inspire any distinctive muse, and its romantic history, both in the storied days of the Maori domination and throughout the long struggles of the white colonisers, have not furnished the cue to any New Zealand literary works of particular merit. Generally the classics are exotic. A country colonised only in 1840 could scarcely have produced a native classic before the appearance of Domett's "Ranolf and Amohia" (1872). But Domett was an English barrister and graduate, and he was thirty years old before he reached New Zealand, so that the beautiful interweaving of description of scenery with legends of the Maori race can scarcely be claimed for New Zealand literature. The first novels which can be properly attached to the soil of New Zealand are those of Vincent Pyke (1873-4), who made brilliant use of his goldfields experience.

In 1877 the most popular of the New Zealand poets, Thomas Bracken, published his "Flowers of the Free Lands." A great deal of his verse is ephemeral, and distinctly poor. The only poem which is really well known is the pathetic ltttle lyric upon which his popularity rests, "Not Understood."

Unlike the Australians, the people of New Zealand are strangely indifferent to their own writers and poets. Such a singer as Arthur Adams is practically unknown for his work. Yet it was he who wrote "The Nazarene," "Maoriland," and "London Streets." What hope, then, for the minor bards—Church, Lawson, Jessie Mackay, Dora Wilcox, Mrs. Glenny Wilson, and Charles Regan (who died with his finest songs unsung)?

The trouble, is, no doubt, that New Zealand poetry is too orthodox. There is nothing distinctive in form or expression; nothing of the bold departures, the swing and pace, of Australia, to excuse it from comparison with the finished products of the orthodox bards of England. The prose writers of the Dominion have generally fallen in the same great gulf. Lacking special distinctiveness, they are lost in the literature of London instead of being judged by any standard of their own. In that greater world Farjeon succeeded. Vogel and Marriott-Watson are working with success. "G. B. Lancaster" possesses the vigour of style to command distinction if she also possesses the method.

G. Raith Garson

Digitized by Google

Original from PENN STATE

SOUTH AFRICA

We from the veldt and kopje,
We from the ostrich farm,
Fresh from the drift and crossing,
Fresh from the desert's charm,
Now that the fight is over,
Now the death struggle's done,
Come to renew our service
To the Lord of the Southern Sun.

To speak or write of South Africa as though it were one country is, in a certain sense, a mistake. With regard to its industries and products, it may safely be termed a dozen or a score of countries, so widely do they differ; wine and fruit, ostrich-feathers, cotton, coffee, oil—the list might be indefinitely extended. Yet, in the wider sense, these various spheres are united as an inseparable part of the Empire.

The resources of so rich and fertile a land are enormous, and are as yet but very partially developed. Cotton-growing, for instance, which has been a matter of experiment for the last six or seven years, is still in a comparatively restricted stage, although the Zoutpansberg district of the Transvaal alone produced last season 100,000lb. of seed-cotton. If as yet the industry has not been a commercial success it will soon become so, for the farmers are rapidly gaining experience as to the most suitable methods of cultivating a crop which is somewhat strange to them. In the Western Province, according to a writer in the "South African National Union Annual," successful experiments have been made; on the coast-belt of the Eastern Province and in Rhodesia also the crop is of excellent quality. There is nothing that British manufacturers desire more than a new and enlarged area of production which would render them to some extent independent of the existing limited sources of supply. But if South Africa can produce a sufficient supply of cotton for export purposes there is no reason why ultimately its manufacture into textile commodities should not be undertaken. At the present time, of course, every article in cotton manufacture is imported, but if it can be produced and locally manufactured the possibilities are enormous. This may seem like a counsel of perfection, but the possibility should nevertheless be kept in view.

The average man who hears South Africa or one of its various component countries mentioned imagines, we fear, that diamonds and Kaffirs—whether stocks or natives—are its sole output, forgetting the immense possibilities of the fruitful land which have developed since the war. Dry farming in South Africa, in one sense, has been practised since the waggon of the Voor-trekker first nosed its way into the trackless wilderness of the North. "What a good digestion is to an athlete, so is the properly-prepared ground of a progressive dry-land farmer—every atom of moisture and nutriment is made by soil culture to do its part towards preparing the ultimate crop." The appearance of the country in the maize markets of the world has fixed attention upon the problem of production, and the individual has been asking himself some very pertinent questions concerning his own and his neighbour's work. It is now a commonplace trip for a farmer to journey to Australia and New Zealand in order to choose sheep, and the widening influence of travel, the influx of new ideas, and the gradual opening up of distant parts by railway are all factors contributing to the creation of a new outlook and a new attitude. There is very little doubt that in ten years' time the seed of example which is being sown to-day officially and privately will bear ample fruit in an enormously increased production.

Mr. Guy Radford, a member of the London Committee of the Union, writing from the London market point of view, notes that "the old monopolies of the favoured few are becoming things of the past," and that the financial and trade depression which has enveloped South Africa is giving way to returning confidence and increasing business. "The machine is being tuned up to greater and greater speed and bigger work. The past year has seen an appreciable move on the part of South Africa's manufacturing to nearer the centre of the river of the world's activities where the current runs fastest. It is withdrawing more and more from the sleepy backwaters where the motion of the current is almost imperceptible."

The mineral industry, which is of course the one most appreciated by the public, shows steady improvement. The total increase in the value of the mineral production during the last year is £1,650,000, of which gold has contributed £1,200,000 sterling.

For the year 1909 the total value produced by the mineral industry was £33,602,515; for the year 1910 it is £35,247,000 (estimated).

The fine work of Miss Hobhouse in her schools in the Transvaal and the Free State, introducing the weaving of woollen textile fabrics, is commented upon in an interesting article in the annual already alluded to. We quote one paragraph:—

> At the Women's Industrial Union Exhibition, held in Cape Town early in December, 1910, there was excellent work from Port Elizabeth, in the way of rugs and woollen things, and good linen and cotton webs from the native mission at Tsolo—these also from South African raw material; and if they do nothing else, the spinning schools serve as local experimental stations where new products can be tested. Wild cotton has proved itself a good spinning material, and it is likely that this product of the Transvaal may find itself placed under cultivation; when woven it proves a strong web, with a fine, glossy surface; and as it is of natural growth in the Northern Transvaal, one would hope that it would be immune from diseases. Then there is ramie, and the fibre of the mealie, and many other things which are now mere waste by-products. It would be well to have small local industries just to use them up.

On such lines is the development of South Africa proceeding; and although it may not boast of being a whole Continent, as is Australia, or a huge Dominion such as Canada, in the next decade we shall hear much more of the country and its products than is at present suspected by the man who only thinks of it as "the place where diamonds come from."

THE BOILING LAKE IN DOMINICA

By Sir Charles Walpole

Dominica is almost in the centre of the chain of the Lesser Antilles, a range of mountains rising sheer from the floor of the Caribbean Sea, the peaks alone visible above the surface of the ocean. All the islands are of volcanic origin, and most of them more or less active volcanoes. Although there has been no serious eruption recorded in Dominica since its discovery by Columbus, the volcanic action takes care to let the people of the island know that it is only slumbering, by slight recurring earthquakes, by an occasional shower of dust, and by the everpresent activity of its Souffrière and its Boiling Lake.

I paid a visit to the Boiling Lake on March 11th, 1890, in company with the Governor's Private Secretary and two gentlemen who were planters and merchants at Roseau, the capital of the island. It is a day's journey from Roseau to the Lake—a very hard day's work—involving some stiff climbing, in the damp tropical heat of 15deg. N., the temperature ranging between 85deg. and 95deg. in the shade; but any one who has seen the place will admit that the remarkable and unique phenomenon to be witnessed is well worth the expenditure of energy.

Digitized by Google
Original from PENN STATE

